On June 21, General Sherman, in an official letter to General Burbridge, gave orders in reference to what he is pleased to call guerilla warfare in Kentucky—the said guerillas being soldiers enlisted in the Confederate service, and serving under officers duly commissioned by the Confederate Government. The guerillas are to be treated as 'wild beasts,' and all men and women who encourage or harbour them are to be arrested and sent out of the country. General Sherman gives a curious definition of what constitutes a soldier. He says: 'To be recognised as soldiers, they must be enlisted, enrolled, officered, uniformed, armed, and equipped by a recognised belligerent power; and must, if detailed from a main army, be of sufficient strength, with written orders from some army commander to do some military thing.' Some Northern papers have remarked that, according to this rule, those who fought in the first war of independence were 'wild beasts,' and not soldiers, for they were not uniformed. Moreover, throughout the present war the Federals have been constantly sending out expeditions which did no more than destroy and steal property, and maltreat women and children, and, so far from being able to do any 'military thing,' have fled in hot haste at the approach of a hostile force. General Sherman adds: 'Of course we have recognised the Confederate Government as a belligerent power, but deny their right to our lands, territories, rivers, coasts, and nationality, admitting the right to rebel and move to some other country where laws and customs are more in accordance with their own ideas and prejudices.' Parson Brownlow desires the extermination, and, if possible, eternal damnation, of the Southerners. General Sherman is rather more generous. If the people of the Southern will be good enough to take themselves off, leaving their country and their property behind them for the use of the Yankees, they are free to go.

Another remarkable paragraph in General Sherman's letter is this: 'The fact is, in our country personal liberty has been so well secured that public safety is lost sight of in our laws and institutions; and the fact is, we are thrown back one hundred years in civilisation, laws, and everything else, and will go right straight to anarchy and the devil if somebody don't arrest our downward progress.' Surely this grim joke is worthy of Mr. Lincoln. It is exquisitely comic to talk of personal liberty in the United States when the prisons are full of political offenders, and newspapers are suppressed at the will of the President. That the United States is going to anarchy and ruin will only be disputed by those who think that the country is already ruined.

The accounts from Missouri are not encouraging for the Federals. It was supposed that in some sections of the State the militia would go over to the Confederates, and Colonel Ford says that nine-tenths of the people of Platte county are 'disloyal.' We have no doubt that the Colonel is right. It is under these circumstances that General Rosecrans has appealed to the people of the State to help the Yankee troops against the Confederate force under General Thornton.

It is said that a conspiracy has been discovered for the formation of a North-western Confederacy, and that some citizens of St. Louis have been arrested.

We elsewhere copy from the New York Daily News an article on the mutilation and theft of the statue of Washington by General Hunter. The Wheeling Register commented severely on this act of vandalism, and therefore General Hunter suppressed the paper and imprisoned the editors and proprietors.

During the last few months there have been strikes in most of the trades in New York for an increase of wages, and in nearly every instance the operatives have been successful. There is now a combined movement in progress to compel the Legislature to pass a Bill making eight hours a legal day's work.

Mr. Fessenden has failed to procure a loan of $50,000,000 from the bankers, and intends to offer a popular loan. Meantime the Government is getting into debt at the rate of about $3,000,000 a day, and those who are usually well informed think that Mr. Fessenden will be compelled to resort to a further issue of greenbacks. On July 23, gold at New York was quoted at 254¾.

ENGLAND.

The Right Hon. the Lord Mayor of London entertained Viscount Palmerston and Her Majesty's Ministers at dinner at the Mansion House on July 27. The Duke of Somerset returned thanks for the navy, and Earl de Grey and Ripon for the army. The Swedish and Norwegian Minister returned thanks in French for the Corps Diplomatique. The noble Premier responded to the toast of Her Majesty's Ministers; but his speech merely contemplated the prosperous condition of the nation, and was entirely free from political sentiments.

Her Majesty the Queen visited the gallant ship Royal Sovereign on Thursday last, and expressed to Captain Cowper Coles her admiration at the work accomplished by him. It is to be observed that the late Prince Consort first pressed the plan of this ship upon the Government; and that, had it not been for the energies of His Royal Highness, a long period might have elapsed before the country came into the possession of the great cupola ship.

Major-General Sir W. Brereton, K.C.B. and K.H., of the Royal Artillery, died last week in his 77th year. He served in Spain from December 1809, and was present at the defence of Cadiz and of Fort Matagada. He served at San Sebastian, Barossa, Vittoria, the Pyrenees, Orthes, and Toulouse; at Quatre Bras and Waterloo. He was present at the storming of the forts of the Bocca Tigris in the Canton River and at the capture of Canton. He was in the Crimea and was on board the Britannia at the bombardment of Sebastopol in 1854, when he directed the fire of the rockets.

The House of Lords has delivered judgment in the famous case of Yelverton v. Longworth (or Yelverton). We have already given an outline of the facts on which the case rested; but inasmuch as the judgment of the highest court has now been delivered, it may be well once more to recapitulate the story. In 1852 Maria Theresa Longworth met, on board the Boulogne boat, the Hon. Major William Charles Yelverton, the youngest son of Viscount Avonmore. Both parties were about twenty-seven years of age. A doubt exists as to the manner of the first introduction; but at least a conversation was sustained for some hours, and on their arrival in London the lady invited the officer to her lodgings, where some of her relatives were staying. He remained with her for some hours. Ten months elapsed, and at the end of that time—that is, in the spring of 1853—Miss Longworth wrote to Major Yelverton requesting him to forward a letter for her to a friend. A correspondence sprang up, and was continued till the autumn of 1855. In that year Miss Longworth went to Galata as a Sister of Mercy in the French hospital. There Major Yelverton called on her. The parties met again at the house of Lady Straubenzee, whose husband was in command of the Light Division. In February 1857 the parties again met at Edinburgh; on this occasion, as was alleged by Miss Longworth, a ceremony of marriage was gone through sufficient, as was contended, to constitute the parties man and wife according to the law of Scotland. They subsequently met at Waterford, in Ireland, and at Rostrevor were married according to the forms of the Roman Catholic Church. They travelled together after that time as man and wife, until in 1858 Major Yelverton married a Mrs. Forbes. In the Irish courts a decision was given in favour of the validity of the Irish marriage, and that decision remains unreversed. In the Scotch courts Major Yelverton brought an 'action of declaration of freedom and putting to silence,' and Miss Longworth brought 'an action of declaration of marriage' in the nature of a cross action. Lord Ardmillan decided in favour of Major Yelverton; but this decision was overruled by the full court. Major Yelverton appealed against this last decision to the House of Lords. Sir Hugh Cairns, Mr. Rolt, and Mr. Anderson were heard for the appellant, and the Attorney-General, the Lord Advocate, and the Queen's Advocate for the respondent. The respondent sought to show that in April 1857 she and the appellant read over by themselves the marriage service of the English Church, and thereby pledged themselves to one another as man and wife—that, therefore, there then was a contract per verba de præsenti, valid at law in Scotland. In case of failure in this proof, the respondent further contended that there was a promise de futuro subsequente copula, and that, as the copula followed in dependence on the promises, a contract of marriage was made valid by the Scotch law. The question, however, as to whether the copula must take place in Scotland necessarily arose; for, strangely enough, Major Yelverton denied the promise, but swore that the cohabitation first took place in Scotland. Miss Longworth alleged that no cohabitation took place till after the religious ceremony in Ireland. Thus it seems that, in obedience to a religious feeling, Miss Longworth was only too careful to allege that state of things which alone jeopardised her case. The Lord Chancellor delivered judgment at great length in favour of Miss Longworth, holding that the respondent, in consenting to cohabitation in Ireland, relied on what had passed in Scotland, although she desired it to be hallowed by a religious ceremony, and further holding that the mere fact that the copula in the first instance took place out of Scotland interposed no barrier between the promise and the subsequent cohabitation in Scotland. The Lord Chancellor then proceeded to read the judgment of Lord Brougham, which agreed with his own. He was, however, called to order by Lord Chelmsford, on the ground that the judgment of an absent Lord could only be read when it agreed with the opinion of the majority. Lord Wensleydale gave judgment for the appellant, holding that no promise to marry had been proved, nor any marriage per verba de præsenti. Lords Chelmsford and Kingsdown gave judgment to the like effect. The judgment, therefore, of the court below was reversed, but without costs.

It is said that when the decision of their Lordships was communicated to Miss Longworth she fell in a fainting-fit and did not rally for some time. She has addressed a letter to the morning journals, stating that a 'reference to oath of parties' is competent, and that therefore the matter is not finally settled. Moreover, she remarks that the Irish marriage is as yet unimpeached.

In the case of Chetwynd v. Chetwynd, now pending in the Divorce Court, a curious instance of contempt of court has arisen. A Mr. Muloch, impelled, as he says, by his duty as a Christian, has written a letter to the petitioner, Mrs. Chetwynd, threatening her with a publication respecting her if she did not withdraw from the suit. She applied to the court for protection, and Mr. Muloch appeared in person to show cause against the rule for attachment. The Judge-Ordinary told Mr. Muloch that a locus pœnitentiæ was still open to him, and that the proceeding would be stayed if he would undertake not to issue the publication. This Mr. Muloch declined to do. The Judge therefore inflicted a fine of 300*l.* on him. He further warned Mr. Muloch that, if he persisted in his design, imprisonment and a further fine would be the result. If, however, he chose to submit, the court might be induced, next term, to remit the penalty.

It will be remembered that Franz Müller, who is supposed to be the murderer of Mr. Briggs, and in quest of whom Inspector Tanner and Inspector Kerressey have sailed for New York by the mail steamer, took his passage on board the Victoria bound from London to New York. Every doubt as to the mail steamer's reaching America before the Victoria has now been set aside. On July 25 the Moss Rose spoke the Victoria in latitude 51° 16′ N., longitude 10° 15′ W., about 60 miles south of Cape Clear. The Victoria, therefore, having taken ten days to reach the south coast of Ireland, will not arrive at New York till long after the arrival of the mail steamers. News of the capture of Müller cannot be expected before the middle of September.

The last of the great annual public school contests came off on Thursday last. On that day Eton school broke up for the long vacation, and on that day also the race between the Eton eight and the Westminster eight was rowed. This interesting race was first established in 1829, and continued at intervals till 1848. It then ceased until the year 1860. In 1860-1-2 the Eton boys had been victorious. There was no race last year. The Eton eight came to the contest with a great reputation, having won the Ladies' Challenge Plate at Henley against Radley College and University College, Oxford, as was duly recorded some weeks since in The Index. Moreover, the style of rowing and the size of the men showed such a superiority to the skill and power of Westminster, that the Eton boat was decidedly the favourite. The course was on that part of the Thames which lies between Chiswick Eyot and the Star and Garter at Putney, a distance of rather more than two miles. The Eton boat, after the first hundred yards, drew ahead, and, gradually increasing the lead, eventually won easily by about eight lengths. The crew of Westminster rowed with great determination, but were surpassed in weight and power.

The two battalions of the Guards now in Canada—that is to say, the 1st battalion of the Grenadiers and the 2nd battalion of the Scots Fusilier Guards—are expected to arrive in England early in October. The officers now in England on leave, among whom we may mention Lord Abinger and Lord Dunmore, names not unknown to Southern ears, have received orders to await the arrival of their regiments.

Those whom severer toils did not detain in less joyful pursuits were enabled last week to drink to the full of the unparalleled delights of glorious Goodwood. An unclouded sky, the shades of large trees, gorgeous scenery, plenty of good horses and of good racing, a numerous and fashionable company, the presence of Royalty itself, combined to render the Goodwood of 1864 as illustrious as its predecessors. There were 32 races contested in the four days, and for these prizes about 270 horses came to the post. On the first day of the meeting the most noteworthy race was the Stewards' Cup, which commanded 89 subscribers and brought 40 horses to the post. The cup was a silver-gilt vase in the renaissance style, with groups and subjects illustrating the 'Tempest.' The race was won by Lord Westmorland's Marigold, a daughter of Teddington, who was backed heavily by her owner, and started first favourite at 6 to 1. Sir J. Hawley's Argonaut was second, and Mr. Merry's Crisis third. The Gratwicke Stakes followed, and for it three moderate animals, Peon, Miss Pickle, and Lightfinger, were brought out to fight the great Blair Athol. The Derby colt was backed as a matter of course, 100 to 15 being laid on him, and though he looked fat and jolly after the short rest given him since Paris and Ascot, yet he defeated his foes easily, Peon being second. However, the gallop gave the public an opportunity of seeing the great horse, and justified in their eyes the short odds of 2 to 1 laid against him for the St. Leger at Doncaster. On Wednesday, the Prince and Princess of Wales arrived at Goodwood on a visit to the Duke of Richmond, and were present at the races. The Goodwood Stakes were carried off by Blondin, a four-year-old horse by Voltigeur, and the property of Mr. T. Parr, who after a long interval appears in his old age to be once more able to win the smiles of fortune. Guillaume le Taciturne, the well-known horse belonging to M. Shickler, represented the French turf, but obtained only the fourth position. On Thursday, the Goodwood Cup formed the chief attraction, and for it ten horses came to the post. Lord St. Vincent's Little Stag was made the favourite at 3 to 1, and the odds of 5 to 1 were laid against the well-known Stradella, 6 to 1 against the Duke of Beaufort's Lord Zetland, 7 to 1 against Lord Falmouth's Queen Bertha, the winner of the Oaks in 1863, and 10 to 1 each against M. Lupin's Dollar, Mr. Savile's The Ranger, the winner of the Grand Prix de Paris in 1863, and Lord St. Vincent's East Lancashire. Mr. Perry's Hollyfox and the Duke of Beaufort's Esperance also started. The length of the course was two miles and a half, and the race was won in 4 min. 56 sec. Esperance made the running at her best pace, retiring at the end of a mile and a half, at which point Dollar took the lead, pursued by the Little Stag, The Ranger, and Lord Zetland. Nearer home East Lancashire closed with the leaders; but Dollar maintained his position, and won by half a length, East Lancashire, the winner of the Great Northern Handicap, being second, and the Ranger third. It is no small matter of pride to M. Lupin, who has not always the best of horses, to have won the race which bears on its list of winners such names as Priam, Harkaway, Charles XII., Alice Hawthorn, The Hero, Van Tromp, Canezou, Virago, and Tim Whiffler. This race has been twice previously won by a French horse, namely, by Jouvence in 1853, and by Monarque in 1857. It also won by the American horse Starke, the property of Mr. R. Ten Broeck of Tennessee, in 1861. The poet of our contemporary, Bell's Life, who rejoices in the nom de plume of 'Orange Blossom,' has celebrated the success of the 'almighty' Dollar in the following lines, which are not out of harmony with the present situation:—

> Wall Street swaggers and lies in vain,
> Ruin shall end the hunt for gain,
> —Gold at a hundred and fifty—
> Pause on the brink, unhappy race,
> Now Chase has resigned, resign the chase,
> Turn honest men and thrifty.
> Offspring worst of the devil's loin,
> That soul-subduing worship of coin
> Spreads like a plague around,
> And e'en as I write with giant stalk
> The curse, imported direct from New York,
> Is spreading o'er British ground.
> For on Goodwood sward, if I reason right, > (Moment ecstatic to Yankee Bright, > Lincoln's worthiest scholar),
> You shall mark the knee of laird and tyke,
> Peer and commoner, bowed alike
> Before 'the almighty Dollar.'

The Archæological Institute of Great Britain and Ireland opened its annual country meeting last week at Warwick. The Marquis Camden, Lord Leigh, the Bishop of Oxford, Mr. Beresford Hope, Dr. Hook, and Dr. Whewell were among the most distinguished persons present. In the course of the meeting Mr. Bloxam gave a history of the county of Warwick, spoke of the crowned heads by whom it had been visited, and alluded to the poets whom it had produced, such as Shakspeare, Drayton, Somerville, and Walter Savage Landor. There also Shenstone had been educated, and Sir Simon Archer and Sir William Dugdale had flourished. On the second day Warwick Castle, Stoneleigh Abbey, and Kenilworth Castle were visited.

On Saturday there was an excursion to Charlecote and Stratford-on-Avon. Charlecote is the seat of the Lucy family, and all the world knows how the name of Sir Thomas Lucy is associated with the life of the poet. The church at Stratford was visited, and the registry of the birth and death of Shakspeare investigated.

IRELAND.

The fishermen of the town of Galway are revelling in Neapolitan sloth and Irish jealousy. The sea swarms with fish along their coast, yet they lie like a tribe of lotus-eaters stretched half asleep on the heaps of filthy offal at their doors, and refuse to embark. The guardians of the poor meet and pass a rate of 3*s.* 10*d.* in the pound for the support of these lazzaroni. Meanwhile the fishermen in the neighbouring villages dare not put to sea, because these men, too lazy to work, would be quick and hot to send to the bottom of the Atlantic the adventurous fishermen who should dare to infringe their monopoly. The authorities content themselves with doing nothing.

CAPE OF GOOD HOPE.

The High Commissioner, Sir Philip Wodehouse, has announced his intention of annexing the territories between the Kee and the Bashee to British Kaffraria, and of giving out the land to settlers on military tenure.

The Confederate steamship Tuscaloosa was at Simon's Bay in the second week of June.

INDIA.

The Durbar held at Simla by the Viceroy in the month of June was more largely attended by chieftains of rank than perhaps any previous Durbar held by a Governor-General of India. For days the roads were crowded with rajahs, splendid in their own appointments, and magnificent in the multitude and uniforms of their followers. It is even affirmed that the troops of one rajah were attired in the uniform of the far-famed 42nd Regiment of Highland Infantry. The chieftains brought their 'nuzzars,' tokens of submission, and laid them at the feet of the Viceroy. He in return received them with words of kindness, and even addressed the assembly in the language of his hearers. His words were as follows:—

'Rajahs, Ranas, and Thakoors of these hills, I meet you with great pleasure. From the days of Ochterlony you have been loyal. The Goorkhas conquered you and drove you from your States. The British Government conquered the Goorkhas, drove them out of your country, and reinstated you in your ancient lands. You could not have done this for yourselves. You know that you owe all you enjoy to the power and generosity of the British Government. And you have shown your sense of this by a long course of loyalty and peaceful rest. This is well. But I would bid you to go on, and give other proofs of gratitude. Do for your people and your clans what the British Government has done for you. Rule them for their good, not solely for your own. Be just; be liberal in your revenue administration. Spread education. Set the example in your own homes. Educate your sons, and your sons will educate the people. Believe me, there is no man, rich or poor, rajah or ryot, who is not the better for knowledge. Without knowledge in a people the very orders of rulers are misunderstood; and Government seeks to be understood in all its acts by you and those under your rule. Our times are times of progress; and you must not stand still, but advance with the rest of India. This is the best, nay, the only, return that you can make to the Government which has protected you so long; and I look to you to make it.'

With earnest attention the Rajahs listened to their ruler, and loud were their protestations of loyalty to the British power.

THE CONTINENT.

THE DANO-GERMAN WAR.

The Conference of Vienna has been so far successful that a satisfactory truce has been made—satisfactory at least for the Germans, who feel the Danish blockade, and agreeable to Europe, which is tired of petty bloodshed. Some difficulties appeared to be imminent with regard to the powers of M. de Quaade, which were not as full as the German representatives desired; consequently on the evening of the 30th ult. no conclusion had been arrived at. The armistice was, therefore, prolonged to midnight on the 2nd inst. On the 1st inst. the Conference again met, and the preliminaries of peace and an armistice for three months were signed at noon by the Austrian, Prussian, and Danish plenipotentaries. The bases of peace are stated to be—1. Lauenburg, Slesvig, and Holstein, to be ceded to Austria and Prussia. 2. Arroe to remain Danish, but Alsen and the islands in the North Sea to go with Slesvig. 3. The frontier of Jutland to be rectified in favour of the Danish inhabitants of North Slesvig.

The time is now at hand to which all men have looked forward, when Denmark, having been drained to the uttermost, is flung aside like the empty carpet-bag of the dévalisé traveller, and the plunderers squabble over the distribution of their booty. Austria, Prussia, and the Federal Diet formed the triumvirate which has crushed Denmark. It must now follow the fate of all triumvirates; the weakest must go first, then the next, until one despot reigns alone. This is one view of the arbitrary occupation of Rendsburg by the Prussian troops, and it is confirmed by the significant fact that, according to the bases of peace which have now been proposed in Vienna, the cession of the Duchies is to be made, not to the Diet, but to the two great Powers. Unfortunately for Prussia, there are other Powers in Europe besides the Diet to whom her policy is offensive; and while, on the one hand, all the smaller States of Germany have protested against the overbearing conduct of Herr von Bismarck or his agents in the seizure of the fortress, on the other hand, the political journalists of France have stated semi-officially that France cannot allow the existence of a principle by which the destiny of the Duchies would be at the mercy of Austria and Prussia. The arguments used are perfectly logical, and overwhelming against all Prussian sophistry. The two great Powers took out of the hands of the Diet the execution of her decree; they applied and were permitted to act as executioners of the German nationality, a part which they have performed to the very life. But they have no more claim now to the disposal of the Duchies than they had before this war began; any claim which the Diet had is still vested in it, and is in fact one of which it cannot divest itself. Or, again, if the right of the Diet to the decision on the future of the Duchies is not recognised, it is evident that the Austro-Prussian forces marched into the land as liberators and not as conquerors; the defeat of the Danes can confer on the German forces employed no right to the possession of Slesvig-Holstein, unless indeed they are now prepared to allow that the Duchies were at the commencement of the war an integral part of the Danish kingdom. Such are the arguments of the French journals; and in conclusion they state that France will countenance no peace to which the Federal Diet is not made a principal party. The effect of the combined protests of France and the smaller German States has been to elicit from the Prussian representative at the Diet the declaration that Prussia has no objection to the return of Federal troops to Rendsburg. This is not likely to mend matters, as of course nothing but the withdrawal of all non-Federal forces from Rendsburg will satisfy the Diet that its authority is respected. Hanover is the country which feels the insult most deeply, as they were Hanoverian troops who were forced to retire from Rendsburg. Herr Niesser, the Federal Civil Commissioner for Holstein, is also a Hanoverian; he has been summoned to his own capital by a telegram from the King.

The conduct of Austria has elicited a unanimous expression of disapproval. It is said of it as of the policy of Lord Russell, that there is no principle involved in it. France, Prussia, and even England have each, from their own point of view, defended their own interests. Bismarck is Prussian, and Palmerston is English; but M. de Rechberg is not Austrian; he has no policy, but occupies his time in putting spokes into the wheels of other diplomatists, and changes his conduct almost daily; his only idea would seem to be that of Mr. Micawber in 'David Copperfield,' a hope that something might 'turn up.' In confirmation of this an anecdote is quoted; it is said that the orders given to the Austrian officers at the beginning of the war were to maintain some reserve in their communication with the Prussian officers. The order was followed out. In one week's time came a counter-order desiring them to fraternise as much as possible; this again was done, and with much greater zeal, for the Austrian officer is a good-natured soul, when suddenly appears a third order prescribing a return to the former distance and reserve!

The same want of fixed principle it has probably been which has estranged the Hungarian and Croatian dependencies of Austria at a time when they were receiving substantial concessions from her hands. A most excellent reform has been attempted of late by the Chancellor of Hungary, in the shape of a transfer of the appointment of judges from the popular election to the Crown. We in England have seen enough of American administration to teach us that by this alone can justice be permanently secured. But the reform has been pronounced illegal, because it has been made without the assent of the Diet.

With regard to the candidature for the Ducal throne, a curious story is told, which illustrates well the present state of constitutional government in Prussia. The King wrote an autograph letter to the Grand Duke of Oldenburg, requesting him to give up his claims. The fact was generally talked about. Herr von Bismarck, to whom the candidature of the Grand Duke of Oldenburg may one of these days be a political necessity, denied the truth of the story in the Kreuz-Zeitung; but the letter exists, and has been read by many of the diplomatists who were assembled at Kissingen. This denial of Herr von Bismarck's proves conclusively that the Minister was kept in total ignorance of the action of his royal master.

A remarkable piece of information is given to us by a journal of Frankfort, on authority which is scarcely unimpeachable. It is to the effect that the young King of Bavaria intends to pass some years in visiting the different countries of Europe under the strictest incognito. He is during the whole of the term to remain a complete stranger to his own Government, which is to be confided to his uncle, Prince Luitpold, as Regent.

The prosecution of the Poles by the Prussian Government still drags its weary length along. It commenced on the 7th ult. before a special tribunal, the High Court of Justice, chosen by Government from among the judges of the inferior court. The indictment contains 506 folio pages, and divides the prisoners into three classes. The first contains 102 names of those who in 1862 and 1863 committed certain acts, both in Prussia and in other countries, tending to detach Prussian Poland from its present possessors. The second class includes 36 persons who aided and abetted the former. The third class of 11 individuals is accused of having commenced certain acts in preparation for the commission of high treason. The latter indictment may seem to be somewhat refined to those who do not understand the zeal of the present Prussian Government against all who do not thoroughly sympathise with them. The pleadings in this monster trial will be conducted both in the German and in the Polish language.

DENMARK.

Advices from Copenhagen inform us that, in the sitting of the Folksthing of the 25th ult., the President of the Council advised that the address to the throne then proposed to the House should not be accepted. M. Jagd then proposed the following resolution:—'The Folksthing passes to the order of the day in consequence of the declaration made by the President of the Council, as the House is desirous of not causing any embarrassment to the Government.' This proposition was rejected on the following day after a sharp debate, and the original address adopted by 60 votes to 21. Seven members, among whom was Bishop Monrad, declined to vote on the subject.

FRANCE.

On the 25th ult. was celebrated an anniversary service in the church of Napoleon Saint Leu, for the repose of the soul of King Louis, the august father of the present Emperor. It was attended by Marshal Vaillant and his aide-de-camp to represent the Emperor. With them, most of the municipal authorities of the neighbourhood were present, and added great impressiveness to the ceremony. They may be said to have represented the whole French people on an occasion when the dynastic and family connection between the first and the third Napoleon was particularly commemorated.

The Emperor has addressed a letter from Vichy to Marshal Vaillant with regard to the rebuilding of the Hôtel Dieu. He says: 'The Opera is already in an advanced state, but the first stone of the Hôtel Dieu has not yet been laid.' He instructs the Minister, therefore, to urge the Prefect of the Seine to commence shortly the works of the Hôtel Dieu, as His Majesty, on moral grounds, considers that it is in the highest degree important that a building devoted to pleasure should not be constructed before an asylum for the suffering.

Blondin of Paris, or Blondin of Vienna—which is the real Simon Pure? Some controversy took place a short time back between two Blondins who were lately exhibiting in Paris, the result of which was to place the Blondin of the Hippodrome on the throne of funambulism. Suddenly, however, appears a letter from Blondin in Vienna, in which he states that, whatever may be the acrobatic excellence of the gentleman who now usurps his name at the Hippodrome, it was the writer and he only who walked across Niagara and cooked an omelette in the middle, who exhibited in England before the Queen, &c. In the meantime the Blondin of the Hippodrome continues to draw the Parisian public, who are perfectly satisfied with his omelette cooking, walking blindfold in a sack, and other exciting performances. It is said that the name Blondin is merely a misapprehension of the term 'Le Blondin,' or, in Italian, 'Il Biondino'—the fair-haired one—by which the real possessor of the name, a Genoese, was distinguished.

The first blow at the supremacy of crinoline has been struck. The director of the Grand Opera has just prohibited all actresses, singers, ballet-dancers, &c., to wear crinoline under the penalty of a heavy fine. The '&c.' above is very ominous: who knows how far it might extend in the hands of a vigorous Minister?

The catacombs of Rome are historical; those of Paris are mysterious; their extent is unknown, their original use is more than a question, their present existence has almost faded out of recollection, so strictly does Government keep the keys which admit to their awful gloom. Nor is the care unnecessary, for, as is well known, the safety of a great part of Paris depends on the security of the pillars of rock by which the roofs of the catacombs are supported; if these are destroyed, the house which stands above falls into the gulf. A few days ago, five brewer's men were at work in one of their master's cellars, when they chanced to notice a sort of window in the wall, guarded by a few iron bars, now falling to pieces from decay. Beyond the bars, darkness and horror. They proposed to examine these recesses, and started on their travels armed with their lanterns only. They passed through the iron bars, and went down a few steps; here they found themselves in a lofty room with a passage leading out of the further end, branching out into numberless ramifications. They were curious to discover the extent of these excavations, which they believed to be all dependent on their master's cellar. They wandered on for a long time, and at last determined to turn back; but the clue was lost. For three hours they wandered about, seeking for the door which they had left, but fruitlessly. They were beginning to despair, when suddenly one of them saw a glimpse of light. They rushed forward and found themselves in front of a closed door, on the other side of which they could hear the sound of voices and the roll of carriages. They shouted and knocked, and at last succeeded in drawing the attention of the passers-by, who informed them that they were at the door of the catacombs near the old Gate Saint Jacques. The keys of the door were procured with some difficulty from a foreman of workmen of the catacombs, and they were released more dead than alive. They were taken before a commissaire de police, and after telling their story were set at liberty.

A disgraceful scene of violence occurred in a police court at Lyons lately. A man of the name of Bertholez was indicted for sending threatening letters; he answered his name and took his seat very quietly. The first witness against him was giving his evidence to an effect very damaging to the prisoner's character, when suddenly Bertholez flung himself upon him, threw him down, and began to tear his face with his nails. He was taken off him by main force, handcuffed, and taken away; his case was heard in his absence. As soon as order was reestablished, the court proceeded to pronounce on Bertholez a sentence of five years' imprisonment and five years' surveillance for his conduct in court. The case was then finished, and he was further condemned to one year's imprisonment and 100 francs fine.

On Sunday, July 31, a child was arrested in Paris, and the circumstances of the case brought to light one of those quaint though illegal pursuits which are carried on during the dark hours. The child was observed by a policeman carrying an iron cage, and stooping occasionally at the door of a stable or house. At last he saw the child stop and speak to a cat in endearing terms. He then tried to catch the cat, but the animal escaped. The man then questioned the child what it was doing. 'Cat hunting,' was the answer; 'but this is a very bad night: they won't take, and I have only got one.' 'But don't you know you are thieving?' 'Well, it was papa told me how. It is nearly a month since I have gone out cat hunting alone. All I catch papa sells next day at the eating-houses.' The child and his cage were then taken into custody. It appears that the stories of Mr. Weller are really founded on fact, and that the mutton and kidney pins, or at least the gibelottes de lapin, of Parisian restaurants are really made of 'them noble animals.'

RUSSIA.

A terrible catastrophe has lately occurred in St. Petersburg. The Church of the Transfiguration was in the course of construction, and in fact well-nigh completed. It was to be an edifice of vast size, with a central dome supported by four granite pillars. One of these pillars had apparently a flaw in it; it cracked, and fell suddenly, bringing down with it the whole cupola in an awful crash, and breaking down the vaulting of the crypt in its fall. The accident occurred just at the hour when the workmen usually took their midday meal, and the number of victims ought consequently to have been small; but, unfortunately, an enormous crowd instantly collected, and with its usual reckless curiosity proceeded to examine the ruin. A second crash occurred, more terrible in its effects than that of the cupola. The crowd was then jammed in a compact mass within the falling walls; so dense was it that all means of communication between the building and the road soon became impossible. All the efforts of the police to reestablish a circulation in the crowd were unavailing, and soon the remainder of the edifice fell on the heads of the helpless multitude. It has not yet been possible to estimate the number of the victims; this only is known, that there are more dead than wounded, and that of the wounds nearly all are mortal. An accident of this terrible nature cannot but recall to our minds the awful catastrophe which occurred last year in the church of Santiago de Chili at Lima. True, the causes of the mischief were utterly different; and the accidental coincidence that both happened within the walls of a church is not to be noticed, but the utter helplessness of the crowd in both cases is remarkable, and the insane panic which appears to convert a mass of human beings into something less reasonable than a flock of sheep. In the Russian story this is brought out with the greater force, since evidently there was a way of escape for the crowd, had those on the outskirts refrained from pushing inwards—whereas in the South American tragedy the door by which the unfortunates might have escaped was actually shut.

ITALY.

The prorogation of Parliament has for the time put a stop to all political movement. The President of the Council has taken a week's leave of absence. Signor Minghetti is visiting the camp and the city of Milan, in the company of the King; for the present everything in Turin speaks of repose and calm. This period of rest is most necessary to give the Government time to put in force the various measures of taxation which have been so laboriously voted during the last session. At the same time the fears raised by the sojourn of Garibaldi in the neighbourhood of Naples have been allayed by the return of that formidable patriot to Caprera. His health is acknowledged to be much weaker than it was six months ago, and this is a further pledge that he will abstain from the headstrong course which before characterised him. The party of action which he represents is also in a very delicate state, in consequence of internal dissensions. The measures adopted by the Government to prevent any practical illustration of the principles of that party were most energetic. During the last days of Garibaldi's stay at Caprera, before his visit to Ischia, very positive orders were given to prevent the departure of any sort of expedition. Nay, it is even said that had Garibaldi attempted to land alone on any part of the Pontifical States, he would have found very rough measures put in force to prevent his landing. The certainty that the Government is not inclined to be led away by the vagaries of the party of action into a premature war with either Austria or France has tended to reassure men's minds, and to create a respect for the present Administration. It was feared that the movements of Garibaldi might have caused some commotion in the unquiet island of Sicily, but the Palermitans allowed the 19th ult., the birthday of the chief, to pass without further demonstration than a banquet to the principal Garibaldian heroes. The people of Palermo are somewhat sore at the yearly decreasing popularity of their patroness, Santa Rosalia, whose festival was once their greatest holiday; now that the procession is very much restricted by the orders of the police, it has lost much of its traditional splendour. Another monster trial is now in progress at the assize court of Trapani, in which a number of people are accused of having met in armed rebellion at Castellamare on January 1, 1862, nineteen months ago—rather a long time perhaps to keep men in suspense, but we must remember that Italian justice is a brau-new invention, the wheels of which do not as yet work very easily. 125 persons are implicated in the affair, of whom the ringleaders have not been brought to justice; six will be tried in default. Among those arrested there are ten landholders, a doctor, and an attorney. According to the custom of Sicily, every effort has been made either to corrupt or to intimidate the judges and the witnesses. Two of the latter had received anonymous letters, filled with the most awful menaces, but they had taken no notice of them, and gave their testimony in due course; as they were returning home they fell into an ambush which had been laid for them, and were killed. Another trial for riot has taken place lately at Girgenti, in which twenty-five persons have been condemned to penal servitude for life, and six to servitude for a long term of years. In the course of the riot for which they are now punished, eight of the principal inhabitants were massacred. In spite of all severities, the crime of assassination is still of almost daily occurrence in the country. A fresh attempt to stop it is now being made by a redistribution of troops in small detachments throughout the country.

Prince Humbert is about to visit that European seminary of military science, the camp at Châlons, before he makes his intended expedition to England.

SPAIN.

The Gazette of Madrid publishes a royal decree instituting a committee for the erection of a monument to Christopher Columbus. One of our contemporaries proposes that on the pedestal of it should be engraved the chains in which he was brought back from America by order of the Spanish monarch, and which he kept till his death as a memento of the gratitude of princes.

TURKEY.

The Sultan is anxious to learn all that is possible in Châlons, to which place he will shortly despatch a military commission, composed of three officers of high rank

The various foreign diplomatic agents of Turkey have informed the Governments to which they are accredited that the Turkish merchantmen will henceforth carry a green flag, in the centre of which will be a white crescent on a green disc. The old red flag charged with a white crescent is to be reserved for the Imperial navy.

MEXICO.

General Doblado has disbanded the remainder of his disaffected army. He is about either to submit to the Emperor or to take refuge in the United States. It is also said that General Uraga has submitted to the Imperial Government.

A sum of 5,000,000 piastres has been sent to France under escort. Part of this sum is to be devoted to the payment of the loan. There is every reason to believe that the exports of specie will for the future be on a much more extended scale.

TUNIS.

By letters from Tunis, of the 27th ult., we hear that the Arabs having completed their harvest have marched in a body upon Tunis, and advanced until they were within six miles of the capital. The army of the Bey surrendered without fighting. The chief of the insurrection declares that he is willing to remain subject to the Bey, and that he only demands the dismissal of the present Ministry and the abolition of an iniquitous tax.

PARLIAMENTARY NOTES.

EMIGRATION TO THE UNITED STATES.

On Thursday, in the House of Commons, Lord E. Howard moved an address for papers in reference to emigration to the United States, and in doing so entered into an elaborate statement of the cruel manner in which emigrants were deceived and kidnapped into the Northern armies. His Lordship said that in the course of his duty as a member of the Distress Relief Committee at Glossop, one of the towns most affected by the cotton distress, it became necessary to have a census made of the population of the district, and one of the elements of that census was the character of the emigration which prevailed. There had been a very large emigration, and in the increase which supervened he found it was also large from the cotton districts in general. In 22 towns, taken promiscuously from the cotton districts, there had been within a few months, setting aside single men, no less than 1,460 married men who had left the country for the United States of America, of whom no fewer than 780 had deserted their wives and families, leaving 2,160 chargeable on the rates. He had also the names of 14 persons who had emigrated within three months from one spot near Manchester, and of these no fewer than 12 had deserted their wives and children. These men in all probability were young and strong men, not long married, and their emigration was attended with such calamitous results as must show that there were deep causes at work for the present state of things, which was to be lamented, not only for its anti-social results, but for the country generally. It would not do to say that these men had emigrated with a view afterwards to send for their families, because when Americans sent for manufacturing hands from England, and paid their passage, great caution was exercised by the agents employed, and written agreements were not given to the emigrants till they were on board ship. In order to present the case in the most condensed form, he should mainly confine himself to printed or written statements. Here was a well-authenticated case:—

'A young man in a company of Volunteers was decoyed over to New York as follows:—A companion of his had seen an advertisement in some newspaper requiring first-rate mechanics for a workshop in Canada. He searched out and found the advertiser, who assured him that work was plentiful in Canada, and that he would have permanent employment at 35*s.* a week. At the next interview with the advertiser (which took place on the steps of the Manchester Exchange) the man went with his friend, and they agreed to go. They were only told to provide for their voyage, because on their arrival in Canada they would obtain employment immediately, and could get cash on account of their wages. Six men were thus induced to go. When they arrived at Liverpool there was a conveyance waiting for them, and they were driven down to the pierhead. On getting on board the steamer (called the Virginia), however, they found she was bound for New York, and in reply to their enquiries were told that they would be reshipped at New York for Canada. However, when they arrived at New York, the advertiser sent them to a place to get some refreshment, paid for it, and also intimated that he had paid their passage to Long Island. He then disappeared, and they never saw him afterwards. The poor fellows knew nothing about Long Island, and went. They were penniless and friendless. Two enlisted at once. Four escaped to New York, and then enlisted. One man concealed himself in the hold of a Cunard steamer, and returned to England, sadly ashamed of himself, and a miserable victim of Yankee rascality.'

Long Island, mentioned in this letter, was a place where recruits bound themselves for service in the Federal army. It was not a solitary case. He held in his hand the statement of a man named Macartney, whose case was before the Foreign Office, who had been drugged, and while in a state of stupefaction enlisted in the Federal army. Another case had been told to him by an hon. and gallant member of that House. A man sailed from London in a ship for America. He did not like the provisions, but a very civil and kind person who was on board produced a quantity of potted meats, and induced the emigrant to partake of them. When about to land, this person asked the emigrant to come to his house in New York; the emigrant consented, was drugged with whisky, and found himself a Federal soldier. Here was another case. A letter had been received by Mr. Wheelhouse, of Hull, from his nephew who stated that he left Liverpool in an American ship. On the voyage he was very much ill-used by the captain and crew, and he stated that immediately on being landed he was seized by seamen and taken up town to an hotel, near New York, the name of which he did not give. Here he met with several other Englishmen, all of whom had been impressed into the Federal service. The latter writer also stated that the recruits were being treated in such a manner that they were almost hourly expected to receive orders to join the army. He complained loudly that the British Government did not interfere to protect these seamen as outrages upon Englishmen, apparently forgetting that by going to America and on board an American ship he forfeited all protection when upon the country he deserted. Similar cases were referred to by Justice Fitzgerald in Ireland. There was also a proclamation of the Lord Lieutenant on the subject, and the fact of notices being put up everywhere showed that they ought to be respected. He was aware that some recruits were of opinion that when their ranks were full many of the persons who had gone to America would return to this country. He could not indulge in such a hope. In the first place, [illegible] would never turn up again, being under the [illegible] from fear for payment. Others [illegible] being better wages than they received at home, [illegible] would have found new friends and connexions [illegible] from returning. He therefore thought it was a great mistake for the municipal [illegible] to [illegible] upon the large emigration, and he was informed that in some parts of the country farmers were getting [illegible] when happier times should arrive, and [illegible] played, the manufacturing interest would be [illegible] increased. He hoped that the municipal [illegible] to work if each only to a limited extent, as it would be [illegible] but an act of wisdom and prudence to do so. It was known that all the passages on board the steamers to America were engaged for months in advance and he learnt from the newspapers that there were 10,000 men from Switzerland waiting for passages to join the Federal army. What was the condition of emigrants when they got to America? He had a letter from a young man who wrote from Lawrence, Massachusetts, in which he said—

'I am very much surprised that people keep coming to this country, knowing that paper money is at such a discount and provisions so very high—clothing the same. Ted Cowen —— from me that 15*s.* per week in England is better than $5 per week, which is as much as he would get. For board he would have to pay $4 per week; that would leave $1, which would be of the value of 6*s.* in English money. I am getting $3½ per week, which is worth no more now than 16*s.* per week, so you see that I am doing worse than I was in England. The war is ruining the country: flour, that used to sell for $7, is now $15 per barrel. Sugar is 35*c.* that was 12*c.* per lb. Coals are $14 per ton that sold for $7. Wood is $11 per cord that was $6. Tea, that was 60*c.* per lb. when we were here before, is now $1 40*c.* per lb. Things are still advancing, and likely to do so. Prints and calicoes are selling at a monstrous price. Clothing of every description is enormous. We are trying to make the best of a bad job. Caution any one that thinks of taking on with ——. He is misleading scores, telling them what good wages they get here, but not telling them what they have got to pay for everything; 30*c.* in England will bring more than $1 here, take things altogether. Things are very uncertain here. I should not be very much surprised if all the places of business are stopped up in three months from now. My wages are not worth half as much as when we came here first.'

That was not a very encouraging prospect for those persons who left this country in the hope of improving their position in the United States. Within the last few days some papers had been presented to the other House, and had also been issued to the House of Commons, which were well worthy of the consideration of hon. members, and he thought that few would rise from their perusal without deep feelings of sorrow. The scene opened, as it were, upon a melodrama; only in this case, unhappily, the more jocose portions of a melodrama were wanting. The melodrama opened with two rascals—the one pretending to have the means of giving employment upon railways in America, and sending forth the other rascal—whom, he hoped, he was not uncharitable nor indecorous in styling an imp of the devil. The other man went to Ireland. There he plotted and made his bargain so well that, upon the plea of railway employment, he induced many persons—even some who were receiving good wages—to take up with him and to accompany him to America. He got 120 men to go with him in a steamer. It seemed as if one of these men was a match for him, for that man wearing his hat in a peculiar manner over his eyes, it was not until they arrived in the middle of the Atlantic that it was discovered that he had only one eye. The man was, therefore, not fit for a soldier, although he would have been qualified as a navigator or railway labourer. The agent Feeny, however, complained that he had been deceived, thus showing that he wanted the men for soldiers and not for railway works. He need not enter into the sad history of that transaction, which hon. members might have read in the newspapers. He would only briefly state that when they arrived in America these men were supplied with abundance of whisky even before landing. When they did land they were again dosed with whisky, made drunk, and got into the police cells, when, through the collusion, it was said, of the police with the recruiting agents, many of them were induced to become soldiers in the Federal army. It appeared that they did not like their position, for they applied to the British minister and consuls, the result of which was the correspondence which had been laid before Parliament, from which he would read one or two extracts. Consul Lousada, at Boston, on March 15, 1864, wrote:—

'The bounties both of the United States and of the several States, added to local premiums, amount to $700, and even $820, besides $15 to $25 to the bringer in of a recruit, and as the poor Irish are generally made drunk and given at the outside $25, the sharks who prey on them collect the balance, and thus a cargo of 120, as in this instance, would net a very large profit to the speculators. There are some features in these transactions which involuntarily recall to my mind my experiences in Cuba; I trust, however, that the publication of what those who hire themselves as labourers may expect on this side will check the traffic.'

It was also stated that the recruiting agents cleared $500 by each man. It must also be stated, in order to show how plausibly these things were carried on, that this man Feeny, who took out a cargo of what might be called slaves, had been arrested in Ireland upon a charge of inducing men to enlist in the United States army, but he was released because it was thought he showed sufficient proof that his enterprise was legitimate, and that his object was simply to obtain men to work upon railways. With regard to many of the men who were thus taken out, they could not help enlisting. As soon as they arrived in America they were surrounded by enlistment brokers, were threatened with 60 days' imprisonment for being drunk and disorderly, and, by the collusion to which he had referred between the police and the recruiting agents, they finally became soldiers in the United States army. Consul Murray, in a letter to Lord Lyons, dated April 7, 1864, wrote:—

'There can be no doubt that there was a systematic attempt made to get these emigrants drunk for the purpose of enlistment. Policeman Berrick's evidence on this subject is most important. He states: "While in Mr. Bradley's (liquor store) there were two or three well-dressed men—I do not know their names, but have seen them in this city—who appeared to be liberal with their money. These men were not drinking themselves, but the emigrants were. I saw a man who said he was from Augusta, who appeared to be talking with the men out on the railroad track. This man said to me he was a recruiting officer, and wanted some of my help to get some of the men. I told him the police had nothing to do with business of that kind. He insinuated to me that if the men wanted liquor to aid them in getting it. I told him no, that I did not drink myself, and would not assist in procuring any for the men."'

Consul Murray further said:—

'The evidence given by the police officers and recruiting officers proves that there was a very good understanding between these functionaries, and that the latter were even called and admitted to the cells with the object of inducing the men to enlist.'

That showed that persons might, without secondary or improper views, be taken out to America, and there, finding themselves in difficulties, might be compelled to enlist. There was the case of a man named Ainsworth, who left Blackburn for Canada with the praiseworthy motive of finding the means of employment for his distressed fellow-townsmen. Two bodies of 30 each went out, but the enterprise appeared not to have been successful, and Ainsworth was last heard of at Portland, while it was unknown what had become of his companions. He did not desire to raise any charge against the American Government, but he only wished to warn his fellow-countrymen of the dangers they might incur. He had brought the case before the House of Commons because he believed that the circulation of these facts throughout the country might, at all events, enable some who might otherwise be deluded and inveigled to steer clear of the dangers which lay in their path. He would now read an extract from a despatch of Lord Lyons, dated Washington, May 3, 1864, and in doing so he would state that all his information had been obtained from this side of the water, and that he had had no correspondence at all upon the subject with any person in America. Lord Lyons, writing to Earl Russell, said:—

'Washington, May 3, 1864.

'My Lord,—The number of British subjects who are serving in the United States army and navy is very considerable; and complaints are constantly made to me of the practices by which the enlistment of many of them has been effected. I may say, indeed, that the most laborious and most painful and unsatisfactory part of the duties which have devolved upon this Legation since the breaking out of the civil war is connected with these complaints. No pains have been spared by Her Majesty's consuls and myself in investigating them, and every effort has been made by us to obtain redress for those which have appeared to be well founded. In few cases, however, have our efforts produced any satisfactory results.'

Lord Lyons then went on to give the following extracts from a report by Major-General Dix, the military commandant of New York, to the Secretary of War:—

'Almost every imaginable form of outrage and deception has been developed in the cases in which Mr. Clapp was agent for the payment of bounties. . . . In some cases boys have been seduced from their homes to secure their enlistment. In others men have been drugged, and enlisted while unconscious. . . . In short, there is no artifice or fraud which has not been resorted to in carrying out this system of pillage. . . . Old men and boys, and persons labouring under incurable diseases, were, in numerous instances, thrust into the service under this system of public plunder, alike fraudulent to the recruits and the Government. . . . The enormous sum of $100,000 has been plundered by the brokers. . . . The outrages practised on recruits are too unjust to be borne, and, in some cases, too loathsome to be detailed. Boys have been seduced from their families, drugged, and then enlisted. Two were so sadly drugged that they died—one on his arrival at Rikers Island, and the other on the following day.'

He would not attempt to deny that this system was discountenanced by many honourable men, not only in the United States, but also in the ranks of the army. General Dix, in writing to General Wistar, said:

'There seems to be little doubt that many—in fact, I think I am justified in saying the most—of these unfortunate men were either deceived or kidnapped, or both, in the most scandalous and inhuman manner in New York city, where they were drugged and carried off to New Hampshire and Connecticut, mustered in, and uniformed before their consciousness was fully restored. . . . Nearly all are foreigners, mostly sailors, both ignorant of and indifferent to the objects of the war in which they thus suddenly find themselves involved. . . . Two men were shot here this morning for desertion, and over thirty more are now awaiting trial or execution.'

He would particularly call the attention of intending emigrants to the concluding sentence of the extract which he had just read. He saw that General Dix had expressed his determination to do his best to prevent the recurrence of those outrages; but when they remembered the enormous profit which accrued to the kidnappers of those poor wretches, they would at once perceive the difficulty, if not the impossibility, of putting an end to the system. The system itself was contrary to the express regulations issued by the Government to recruiting officers:—

'They will not allow any man to be deceived or inveigled into the service by false representations, but will in person explain the nature of the service, the length of the term, the pay, clothing, rations, and other allowances to which a soldier is entitled by law, to every man before he signs the enlistment.' It was, however, evident that people, after being drugged, had been admitted into the army even before their return to consciousness. He did not wish to be unfair to the United States Government, but he must say that he feared that evasions were oftentimes practised, and justice impeded. Lord Lyons had asked the Government to keep seven or eight men from going into battle until their cases had been decided, but the result of his efforts was recorded in the following despatch:—

'Washington, May 23, 1864.

'My Lord,—Since I first became acquainted two months ago with the circumstances under which some of the Irish passengers on board the Nova Scotian had been enlisted in the United States army at Portland, I have never ceased to urge the United States Government to take measures to prevent their being brought into collision with the enemy pending the investigation of the lawfulness of their enlistment. The copies of notes to Mr. Seward which have been enclosed in my despatches to your Lordship will have shown your Lordship how often I have insisted upon this in writing. I have pressed it still oftener and still more urgently in verbal communications. My endeavours have, however, been of no avail. One of the men called at the Legation the day before yesterday. He had been badly wounded in the head, and sent back from the army to a hospital here. Another of the men had, he said, been wounded; a third was reported to be killed; three others, when he last saw them, were advancing against the enemy under a heavy musketry fire.'

From another statement elsewhere it appeared that two of these men were killed, and possibly the third might have met with the same fate. For his own part he must say that he deplored the fate of the poor wretches who met with such treatment. It appeared to him that a war of defence might be justly urged, and that in such a war it was the duty of men to join for the defence of their country. He believed also that a war of aggression was undoubtedly very wicked, but when persons who had nothing to do with the dispute took part in the warfare, such conduct was in reality nothing better than murder. It was true that there were a class of filibusters and buccaneers whose conduct was frequently viewed with a certain amount of approbation by some portions of mankind. They knew what an evil effect the adventurous deeds of such highwaymen as Dick Turpin and Claude Duval had had upon the minds of large numbers of youths, and even older people; and the same feeling of approbation would, to a certain extent, be accorded by many to those who distinguished themselves by bravery, although they might have been engaged in a quarrel in which internatıcnal law and justice were alike against them. He did not, however, believe that such a feeling would be entertained when hordes of people went from this country and mingled in the distressing conflict now going on in the United States; and when their participation in that warfare was the result of treachery and deceit everybody would exclaim against it, and demand that every exertion should be made to put an end to such a system. He had no desire to say anything against either the Government or the army of the United States. He cared not what form of government regulated the affairs of a country, so it protected industry and international right, so it took means fairly to administer justice and find employment for the energies of mankind, and so that it were a Government under which the people could live and enjoy a fair amount of happiness, and, as long as that was the case, he cared not whether the Government were monarchical, constitutional, or republican. Still less did he desire to say anything against the brave army of the United States, which, as well as its opponents, had exhibited powers of endurance and fighting rarely paralleled in history. The character of the United States army for bravery would never in future be disputed, but he thought it would be but justice to those brave soldiers that the slaughter, if it could not cease, should not at all events be upheld by supplies from other countries. Their bravery entitled them to something better than being reduced to dust and being made food for gunpowder, and it was high time that we should cease to contribute to such a result by sending forth such hosts of emigrants from this country. The widows, orphans, and mourning relatives of these brave men were entitled to some consideration. He believed that many on both sides were now praying most fervently, though, from motives of fear, the prayer might not be readily expressed, for the cessation of this conflict. It was due to them as well, that we should do all we could to prevent any fuel being supplied to this devouring flame. What was the opinion of the man in this country who, from his position, was most competent to decide upon this question, who held in his hand the various webs of negotiation within the last few years, and who, he hoped, when the proper time came, would have the discretion to exercise his power in the interests of peace? The wishes of the Government must, of course, be to give peace to an afflicted continent, and to take away so great a stain from the human race. Meanwhile, Earl Russell had expressed the following opinion in a despatch to Lord Lyons dated May 27, 1864:—

'Her Majesty's Government have considered, in communication with the law advisers of the Crown, your Lordship's despatches of March 14 and April 19, relative to the case of the Irishmen recently enlisted at Portland and Boston for service in the United States army; and I have to state to you that it appears to Her Majesty's Government to be clear from these papers, and from the reports on the same subject which have been received from Her Majesty's Consuls at those ports, that no doubt can be entertained that the enlistment of these Irishmen was the result of a fraudulent scheme, contrived and executed in disregard of the laws and neutral rights of Great Britain. Her Majesty's Government consider that the men enlisted at Portland were induced, in evident bad faith and under false pretences, to leave their own country for the purpose of obtaining employment, which was not really ready for them on their arrival in the United States; that on landing at Portland they were designedly plied with drink, and that they were then dealt with in a manner which (although it might be the legal consequence of their disordered condition) made it natural and almost inevitable that they should easily yield to the persuasions of the recruiting officers, who were on the look-out for them, and who obtained access to them while in confinement, by the aid of the police authorities.'

Two or three weeks ago, feeling it to be his duty to bring the case before the House, he had placed a notice on the paper upon this subject, in order to warn those who might otherwise be exposed to these calamities. He had communicated with the Secretary for the Colonies, thinking that he might, through the emigration agent at Liverpool, give to intending emigrants information which might have the same effect. The right hon. gentleman had since shown him a ticket which was delivered to emigrants, advising them to take care of persons whom they met, and giving them other suggestions which were, no doubt, of value. All he objected to in the ticket was this statement, 'Remember the American dollar is equal to 4*s.* 2*d.* English money, and the cent. is equal to a halfpenny.' Now the dollar was worth nothing like that, and he hoped that upon this point some further information would be supplied to emigrants. He had made this plain statement in the interests of humanity, and hoped that it might do some little good by keeping, if possible, some few of these poor wretches away from the war, and by thus contributing to put a stop to a struggle which was a disgrace to humanity. He did not wish to embarrass the Foreign Office or the Government, or to give rise to any bad feeling, but he appealed to Mr. Layard and the House of Commons for some expression of feeling on this subject, if it were possible. No doubt the Foreign Office would do all it could to get redress for these poor wretches, who, though they might be foolish and misguided enough to 'seek the bubble reputation in the cannon's mouth,' were still, so long as they remained British subjects, entitled to the protection of the British Government, and should be looked on as the erring children of this country. He wished to use no threats towards any other nation. But the House had lately been told that our ships of five guns were now as efficient as our ships of 130 guns used to be; our resources were ample; our wealth never was greater; we were in a position to be the arbiters of the world; and at all events our voice should have the weight which had always attached to the voice of England. He trusted that the Government, conscious of the national strength, conscious of the goodness of the cause, and conscious moreover of the truth of what he had stated—for he had not stated one-hundredth part of the evil—would lose no opportunity of remedying and relieving the sufferings of these poor people, and of distributing information so that other persons might not be led astray. He trusted also that they would take every means in their power, if the opportunity presented itself, by a kind and charitable mediation, of bringing to a close this disastrous internecine war, so that peace might once more resume her sway over the American continent. He begged to move an address for papers on the subject of emigration to the United States.

Mr. Layard said the speech of Lord E. Howard would do good service, for the only possible remedy for the deplorable evil was to warn people of the risk they incurred in crossing the Atlantic. It was not surprising that the promise of high wages should induce a large emigration to the United States, and though many were forced to become soldiers, a large number were not exposed to that risk. The persons who seduced emigrants to go to the United States for the purpose of enlisting them so carried on their business in this country that it was impossible for the Government to touch them. It was exceedingly difficult to bring home the offence to these persons, because they took care, while under the laws of this country, not to infringe them openly. The description which Lord E. Howard had given as to what awaited these unfortunate persons on the other side of the ocean was too true. Almost daily communications on the subject were received at the Foreign Office. In fact he was constantly receiving letters from hon. members on the subject. It was only the other day that an hon. and gallant friend gave him a letter which disclosed a most melancholy case. A man went to the States in search of employment, intending, as soon as he obtained it, to send for his wife and family. He fell in with an agent on board the ship who gained his confidence, and invited him to his house on their arrival at New York. There the poor man was made drunk, and found himself next day engaged, without his knowledge or consent, as a soldier in the Federal army. In a fit of desperation he deserted; and his wife had lately received from him the last letter probably he would ever write, announcing that he had been arrested, convicted by a court-martial, and sentenced to be shot. The Government had done all in their power to prevent these unhappy proceedings. Lord Lyons had been quite indefatigable in his efforts for the protection of British interests in the States. A return was moved for in the other House of the number of cases in which representations had been made as to the lives and property of British subjects in America. It took a gentleman in the Foreign Office three months to prepare that return, and in doing so he had to consult many thousand documents. He did not say that the United States Government had not, in most cases, expressed themselves willing to do justice; but the references from one office to another, and the evasions of officers in command of regiments, who were unwilling to surrender any of their men, defeated the ends of justice. It sometimes happened that when they had traced a man he was killed or removed out of reach before measures could be taken for his release. Every endeavour would be made to give protection to these unfortunate emigrants; but nothing would be of greater practical utility than the able speech of Lord Howard. He trusted that that speech would go throughout the country and serve as a warning to intending emigrants of the tricks and seductions to which they would be exposed on the other side of the Atlantic. It was the duty of all persons connected in any way with emigration, as, for instance, residing in districts from which emigration was taking place, to circulate the warning as much as possible. Lord Howard's remark as to the change in the value of the dollar and the cent. was perfectly true, and he would take care to bring the matter under the notice of the Colonial Office in order that the circular might be corrected. All the facts stated by Lord Howard were, he believed, strictly true, and had been brought forward, not in any spirit of hostility to the United States Government, which all must deprecate, but in a way that could give offence to none. He could not but hope that the United States Government would do what they could to prevent these great abuses from taking place in the seaport towns. If the authorities desired, they might do a good deal in that direction, and he hoped the speech of his noble friend would produce an impression on the other as well as on this side of the ocean. If such a state of things existed in this country, he was sure every honourable man would desire to put a stop to it, and no Government would hesitate to punish those who attempted to infringe the laws. The laws of the United States were opposed to any such proceedings. Of course nothing could be done to check emigration, but emigrants might be put on their guard as to the reception they had to expect in New York. A despatch had been received within a few days from Lord Lyons, stating that five or six men had recently been released from the army, and that Mr. Seward had promised to institute a stringent enquiry, and to set free any others who had been improperly enlisted. He would endeavour, during the recess, to collect the information which his noble friend desired.

Messrs. Ferrand, Lindsay, and Hennessy, and Sir Robert Peel, supported the motion. Mr. P. Taylor amused the House with an ultra New York Herald account of Northern 'triumphs.' After a brief reply from Lord E. Howard, the motion was agreed to.

THE EMPIRE OF MEXICO.

On Thursday, in answer to Mr. Kinglake, Mr. Layard said there was some difficulty in ascertaining exactly what portion of Mexico was actually in the hands of the new Mexican Government or of the French troops. Recent Presidents had rarely held more than the capital, Vera Cruz, and one or two of the ports of the country surrounding the capital. The rest of the republic had generally been in a state of insurrection. It had hitherto been the custom, from necessity, to recognise the Government that was in possession of the capital, and the Archduke Maximilian was now in possession not only of the capital, but of a considerable portion of the country. Her Majesty's Government had informed the Emperor of the French confidentially that when the Archduke Maximilian was actually in Mexico, and had notified to the European Powers that he had taken possession of the government, it was their intention to advise Her Majesty to recognise the Archduke as Emperor of Mexico. He could give no assurance that before that acknowledgment of the Emperor de facto was made the Archduke would have to be able to show that the greater part of Mexico was in his hands. The peculiar state of the country was such that he did not believe it would be possible for the Archduke Maximilian to do that. There were always a number of chiefs in arms, who took possession of a district and held it against the Government, and a state of anarchy was the consequence. He hoped, however, that when the Government of the Archduke Maximilian was established in Mexico a better condition of things would ensue. At any rate, it was very desirable for the interests of British subjects that there should be at least some de facto Government in Mexico in possession of the capital and some of the ports of the country.

On Friday Mr. Kinglake again brought forward the subject, and spoke against the recognition of the Emperor Maximilian, since he only occupied about one-tenth of the territory of Mexico. The Government appeared to have promised to recognise the Archduke. There might, possibly, be some reason for such a course which the papers for which he asked would disclose, but he could not but regard the course which had been pursued as one which differed from the ordinary practice of English statesmen. Over and over again English statesmen had been asked to say what they would do in the case of some future contingency, and their answer had always been that it did not become them to say, because the Government of this country was a Parliamentary Government, and their duty, therefore, was to avoid as much as possible doing anything which would tend to fetter the hands of their successors. In promising the French Government that this recognition should take place, it appeared to him that the Government had departed from that wholesome principle.

Lord Palmerston said: 'The course which Her Majesty's Government intend to pursue in this case does not differ in principle from the course which the Government has invariably pursued in similar cases. It has been our practice to acknowledge established Governments. Without going into minute questions as to the origin of the Government—whether it be a republic or a monarchy—when we find a Government established, we enter into friendly relations with that Government. My hon. friend says with regard to Mexico that we proceeded prematurely to acknowledge the empire before it was practically and regularly established. I don't think our engagements went to that extent. We were applied to by the Archduke to acknowledge his future empire when he was in Europe. We were not inclined to do that, and we said it would be entirely at variance with our practice and our principles; but that if on his arrival in Mexico he was received by the people and his Government regularly established by the people, our wish was that Mexico should have a stable Government. My hon. friend says that the portion of Mexico occupied by French troops is limited. That may be so; but it does not follow that in other parts of the country not occupied by French troops the people may not be inclined to support the Government of the Emperor. And we have information—we may be misled, but our information is to the effect that the Indian population, who form a large portion of the total number of the people, are well disposed towards the Emperor. No doubt, there is still a number of troops commanded by native leaders in opposition to the French army, but we are told that the French Government are employing transports to bring back a number of their soldiers, which fact implies that the disposition on the part of the people of Mexico to acquiesce in the rule of the Emperor is considerably greater than my hon. friend has been informed it is. All I can say is that our course will depend on what we hear as to the manner in which the authority of the Emperor is established. If we find there is a prospect of a permanent Government being established, we shall be very glad to acknowledge it. Such a Government will be for the advantage of Mexico and of Europe. If, on the other hand, we find matters still uncertain, and a war still going on, which may result one way or the other, we shall say the Government is not of a kind that would justify us in acknowledging the Archduke as Emperor of Mexico.'

THE PROROGATION.

Parliament was prorogued on Friday by Commission. The Queen's speech was unusually uninteresting. To balance the failure in Europe and the nonsuccess of the Conference, Her Majesty announces that her 'relations with the Emperor of China continue to be friendly.' The following are the paragraphs that relate to America:—

'Her Majesty deeply laments that the civil war in North America has not been brought to a close. Her Majesty will continue to observe a strict neutrality between the belligerents, and would rejoice at a friendly reconciliation between the contending parties.

'Her Majesty has observed with satisfaction that the distress which the civil war in North America has created in some of the manufacturing districts has to a great extent abated, and Her Majesty trusts that increased supplies of the raw material of industry may be extracted from countries by which it has hitherto been scantily furnished.'

THE FEDERAL KILLED AND WOUNDED.—The New York Correspondent of the Times, under date July 19, writes: 'No one knows, or ever will know, the number of the slain; but when it is remembered how bloody were all the battles of M'Clellan and his successors down to General Grant, and that Grant himself has lost 100,000 men since he crossed the Rapidan more than nine weeks ago, one half of whom were killed, it can scarcely be considered an exaggerated computation to put down a quarter of a million among the dead, but perhaps unburied, victims of the war. The number of the maimed who have lost arms and legs in the pursuit of victory is as difficult to arrive at as that of the slain unless a special census were taken; but any one who walks the streets of New York may observe a sufficient number of these mutilated heroes to justify him in the belief that, if New York be in this respect a fair specimen of the other cities of the North and West, there is as large a number of wounded men as of dead ones to be placed to the debit side of the struggle. If Governor Seymour, for instance, would but undertake to bring these living 'braves' together, and pass their ghastly legions in view, there is no open space within the limits of the city which would contain them, and he would have to summon them to meet in the flats of New Jersey, if he would afford to his countrymen and to the world so new but so suggestive a spectacle of the horrors of war.'

The New York papers give an account of a fire that occurred in Brooklyn on the 15th instant. A bonded warehouse called Schenck's Stores, a brig, and other property were destroyed. The total loss is estimated at one million dollars.

THE PEACE PROPOSALS 'MARE'S NEST.'

THE following is the corrected text of the so-called Peace Proposals Correspondence, interchanged between Mr. Horace Greeley, Editor of the New York Tribune, and Major Hay, President Lincoln's private secretary, on the one side, and Messrs. Clay, Holcombe, and Thompson, distinguished citizens of the Confederate States, on the other side, Messrs. G. N. Saunders, of 'Dixie,' and W. C. Jewitt, of Boston and of Colorado Territory, acting apparently as intermediaries and prompters to 'the party of the first part.'

Clifton House, July 12.

Dear Sir,—I am authorised to say that the Hon. Clement Clay, of Alabama, Professor J. B. Holcombe, of Virginia, and G. N. Sanders, of 'Dixie,' are ready and willing to go at once to Washington upon complete and unqualified protection being given by the President or Secretary of War. Let the permission include the three names and one other.—Yours respectfully, (Signed) GEO. N. SANDERS.

To Hon. H. Greeley.

Niagara Falls, July 17.

Gentlemen,—I am informed that you are duly accredited from Richmond as the bearers of propositions looking to the establishment of peace; that you desire to visit Washington in fulfilment of your mission, and that you further desire that G. N. Sanders shall accompany you. If my information be thus far substantially correct, I am authorised by the President of the United States to tender you his safe conduct on the journey proposed, and to accompany you at the earliest time that will be agreeable to you.—I have the honour to be, gentlemen, yours truly, (Signed) H. GREELEY.

To Messrs. C. C. Clay, Jacob Thompson, and J. B. Holcombe.

Niagara Falls, July 18.

Gentlemen,—I have the honour to acknowledge the receipt of yours of this date by the hand of W. C. Jewitt, the statement of facts therein presented being materially different from that which was understood to exist by the President when he intrusted me with the safe conduct required. It seems to me on every account advisable that I should communicate with him by telegraph, and solicit fresh instructions, which I shall at once proceed to do. I hope to be able to transmit the result this p. m.; at all events I shall do so at the earliest moment.

(Signed) H. GREELEY.

To C. C. Clay and J. B. Holcombe.

Niagara Falls, July 18.

Sir,—We have the honour to acknowledge your favour of the 17th inst., which would have been answered yesterday but for the absence of Mr. Clay. The safe conduct of the President of the United States has been tendered, as we regret to state, under some misapprehension of facts. We have not been accredited to him from Richmond as the bearers of propositions looking to the establishment of peace. We are, however, in confidential employment of our Government, and entirely familiar with its wishes and opinions on that subject; and we feel authorised to declare that, if the circumstance disclosed in this correspondence were communicated to Richmond, we would be at once invested with the authority to which your letter refers; or other gentlemen, clothed with full powers, would be immediately sent to Washington, with the view of hastening a consummation so much to be desired, and terminating, at the earliest possible moment, the calamities of war. We respectfully solicit through your intervention a safe conduct to Washington, and thence, by any route which may be designated, through your lines to Richmond. We would be gratified if Mr. Sanders was embraced in this privilege. Permit us, in conclusion, to acknowledge our obligations to you for the interest you have manifested in the furtherance of our wishes, and to express the hope that in any event you will afford us the opportunity of tendering them in person before you leave the falls. C. C. CLAY and J. B. HOLCOMBE.

Niagara Falls, July 19.

Gentlemen,—At a late hour last evening, and too late for communication with you, I received a despatch informing me that the instructions left Washington last evening, which must reach me, if there be no interruption, at noon to-morrow. Should you decide to await the arrival, I feel confident that they will enable me to answer definitely your note of yesterday. Regretting a delay which I am sure you will regard unavoidable on my part, (Signed) H. GREELEY.

To C. C. Clay and J. B. Holcombe.

Clifton House, July 21.

Sir,—The paper handed to Mr. Holcombe yesterday, in your presence, by Major Hay, as to the application in our note of the 18th inst., is couched in the following terms:—

'Executive Mansion, Washington, July 18.

'To whom it may concern: Any proposition which embraces the restoration of peace, the integrity of the whole Union, and the abandonment of slavery, and which could be made by and with an authority that can control the armies now at war against the United States, will be received and considered by the Executive Government of the United States, and will be met by liberal terms on substantial and collateral points, and the bearer or bearers thereof shall have safe conduct both ways.

(Signed) 'ABRAHAM LINCOLN,
'President of the United States.'

The application to which we refer was decided by your letter of the 17th inst., in which you inform Mr. Thompson and ourselves that you were authorised by the President of the United States to give us safe conduct, on the hypothesis that we are duly accredited from Richmond as bearers of propositions looking to the establishment of peace, and desired to visit Washington in the fulfilment of this mission. This assertion, to which we gave, and still do, entire credence, was accepted by us as the evidence of an unexpected but most gratifying change in the policy of the President, a change which we felt authorised to hope might terminate in the conclusion of a peace mutually just, honourable, and advantageous to the North and to the South, exacting no condition but that we should be accredited from Richmond as bearers of propositions looking to the establishment of peace, thus proffering a basis for a conference as comprehensive as we could desire. It seemed to us that the President opened a door which had previously been closed against the Confederate States for full interchange of sentiments, free discussion of conflicting opinions, and untrammelled efforts to remove all causes of controversy by liberal negotiations. We, indeed, could not claim the benefit of a safe conduct which had been extended to us in a character we had no right to assume and had never affected to possess, but the uniform declaration of our executive and Congress, and their thrice-repeated, and as often repulsed, attempts to open negotiations, furnished a sufficient pledge that this considerate manifestation on the part of the President of the United States would be met by them in temper of equal magnanimity. We had therefore no hesitation in declaring that if this correspondence was communicated to the President of the Confederate States, he would probably embrace the opportunity presented for seeking a peaceful solution of this unhappy strife. We feel confident you must share our profound regret that the spirit which dictated the first step towards peace had not continued to animate the councils of your President.

Had the representatives of the two Governments met to consider this question, the most momentous ever submitted to human statesmanship, in temper of becoming moderation and equity, followed as their deliberations would have been by the prayers and benedictions of every patriot and Christian on the habitable globe, who is there so bold as to pronounce that the frightful waste of individual happiness and public prosperity which is daily saddening the universal heart might not have been terminated, or, if the depletion and carnage of war must still be endured through weary years of blood and suffering, that there might not at least have been infused into its conduct something of the spirit which softens and partially redeems its brutalities? Instead of the safe conduct which we solicited, and which your first letter gave us every reason to suppose would be extended for the purpose of initiating a negotiation in which neither Government would compromise its right or dignity, a document has been presented which was not originally offered, and is unlike any paper which ever before emanated from the constitutional executive of a free people. Addressed to whom it may concern, it precludes negotiations, and prescribes, in advance, the terms and conditions of peace, the return to the original policy of 'no bargaining, no parleying, no truce with the enemy, except to bury their dead, until every man should have laid down his arms, submitted to the Government, and sued for mercy.' What may be the explanation of this sudden and entire change in the views of the President, of this rude withdrawal of a courteous overture for negotiations, at the moment it was likely to be accepted? Whether this emphatic recall of words of peace just uttered and these fresh blasts of war be the better, we leave for the speculation of those who have means or inclination to penetrate the mysteries of his Cabinet or fathom the caprice of his imperial will. It is enough for us to say that we have no use whatever for the paper which has been placed in our hands. We could not transmit it to the President of the Confederate States without offering him indignity, dishonouring ourselves, and incurring the well-merited scorn of our countrymen. Whilst an ardent desire for peace prevails, the people of the Confederate States are rejoiced to believe that there are few, if any, amongst them who could purchase it at the expense of liberty, honour, and self-respect. If it can be secured only by their submission to terms of conquest, the generation is yet unborn which will witness its restoration. If there be any military authority in the North who is entitled to proffer the conditions of this manifesto, there is none in the South authorised to entertain them. Those who control our armies are the servants of the people, not their masters, and they have no more inclination than they have right to subvert the social institutions of sovereign States or to overthrow their priceless heritage of self-government. This correspondence will not, however, we trust, prove wholly barren of good results. If there is any citizen of the Confederate States who has clung to the hope that peace was possible with this Administration of the Federal Government, it will strip from his eye the last film of such delusion. If there be any whose hearts have grown faint under the suffering and agony of this bloody struggle, it will inspire them with fresh energy to endure and brave whatever may yet be requisite to preserve to themselves and their children all that gives dignity and value to life, or hope and consolation to death. If there be any patriots and Christians in your land who shrink appalled from the lengthened vista of private misery and public calamity which stretches before them, we pray that in their bosoms a resolution may be quickened to reclaim the abused authority and vindicate the outraged civilisation of their country. For the solicitude you have manifested to inaugurate a movement which contemplates results the most noble and humane, we return our sincere thanks, and are most respectfully and truly your obedient servants, (Signed) C. CLAY, J. B. HOLCOMBE, } Commissioners.

To the Hon. H. Greeley.

WHERE THE CONFEDERATES GET THEIR COAL.—The American Coal Trade Review published in New York says: 'There are extensive coal mines lying on both sides of the James River, a few miles above Richmond. The area of this coal field is about twenty miles from north to south, with an average breadth of five miles. The coal is bituminous, and it has been largely used for steam purposes and for the production of gas. These mines were probably the earliest worked of any in the United States, mention being made of them in the American Journal of Science of 1818 as having been in operation for thirty years previously. The works, as now carried on, are at a greater depth than have ever been reached at any other mines in this country—the deepest shaft sunk being about eight hundred feet. Anthracite coal mines have been opened within a few years in Montgomery, Pulaski, and Wythe counties, and also along the range of mountains in the western part of Augusta county. In Brush Mountain, along the northwestern line of Montgomery county, and in Price's Mountain, six or seven miles south-east of this, some very good coal is mined — that from the former locality being free-burning, semi-bituminous; and that of the latter a very pure anthracite. These mines are in close proximity to the Virginia and Tennessee railroad, which is only a mile and a half distant. The amount of coal mined in the State of Virginia during the year 1860 was 382,000 tons, valued at about $700,000 at the mines. There are extensive beds of bituminous and semi-bituminous coal in North Carolina, in Chatham and Moore counties on Deep River. There are also extensive beds of semi-bituminous in Rockingham and Stokes counties, on the Dan River; but previous to the rebellion there had been no great amount mined there. The only mines of importance in Southern Tennessee are on the Sewanee River, at the north end of a branch railroad sixteen miles long, which leaves the Nashville and Chattanooga railroad at the tunnel where it crosses the mountains.'

TO OUR FRIENDS AND SUBSCRIBERS.

THE INDEX was established in May 1862, in the darkest hour of Confederate fortunes, by earnest friends of Southern Independence, with the distinctly expressed object of being the representative, in English journalism, of a gallant and struggling people appealing to the world not only for political, but still more for moral recognition. Since accepting this great trust, THE INDEX has unceasingly laboured, by the combined aid of English and of Southern writers, to enlarge and extend the common ground upon which two nations may cordially meet, which need only to understand each other in order to cherish the warmest mutual appreciation and lasting friendship. The chief and almost the sole difficulty has been, and is still, the callous indifference of the British Government on the one hand, and, on the other, the perplexity, to the European mind, of the unsolved and unprecedented problems involved in the management and education of four millions of the African race, intermingled with a population of the highest Caucasian type. This difficulty could be met only by a liberal fairness to every shade of honest opinion, by an inflexible adherence to truth under all circumstances, and by a bold avowal of convictions, even though ill received. THE INDEX does not claim to be neutral, but it claims to be independent in the highest sense of that word. It is because it must reflect and appeal to, at one and the same time, the public opinion of two countries as yet only imperfectly acquainted, that this somewhat unusual self-description is called for.

Thanks to arrangements now in successful operation, by which the Letters of regular Correspondents and Newspapers from all parts of the Confederate States are received within from twenty-five to thirty days from their date, THE INDEX is always enabled to present the very Latest Direct News from the South, as well as a faithful reflex of the tone and spirit of the Southern Press.

All communications intended for publication should invariably be addressed to 'the Editor of THE INDEX, 13 Bouverie Street, E.C.,' and unless authenticated by a responsible name, can receive no attention.

THE INDEX.

THURSDAY, AUGUST 4, 1864.

The Peace Comedy at Niagara Falls.

THE Falls of Niagara are one of the world's great sights, visited yearly, during the summer season, by tens of thousands of pleasure-seekers. For the shelter and comfort of these there stands, within view of the mighty cataract, on the Canadian side of the river, and at a few rods' distance from the beautiful suspension-bridge which connects British America with Federal Republican America, a spacious and commodious hotel, the fame of whose table d'hôte has spread over two continents. So constant and close is the communication between the two shores that to stay at the 'Clifton House' is almost equivalent to residing within Mr. LINCOLN'S dominions, bating the disagreeable incidents connected with such residence. No wonder, therefore, that this advantage, added to the natural beauties of the spot, should have attracted many and various persons to this far-famed inn. Americans of the North and Americans of the South, and Americans who are neither of the North nor of the South—men of influence at Washington and men of influence at Richmond, and men without influence anywhere—distinguished statesmen and ubiquitous political adventurers—might there meet on neutral ground, and discuss over sherry-cobblers and mint-juleps the great question of the day. It was scarcely probable, but certainly not impossible, that from such promiscuous gatherings should grow serious proposals of peace. Wild projects and vague speculations were sure to spring up in profusion.

It so happened, as it appears, that towards the end of July there were among the guests at the Clifton House three Confederate gentlemen of note and position—the Hon. C. C. CLAY, ex-senator from Alabama in the Federal and afterwards in the Confederate Congress; the Hon. JACOB THOMPSON, ex-member of the Federal House of Representatives from Mississippi, and Secretary of the Interior in President BUCHANAN'S Cabinet; and the Hon. J. B. HOLCOMBE, a distinguished jurist and publicist from Virginia. It was understood that Messrs. CLAY and THOMPSON had been intrusted by their Government with a delicate confidential mission, though by no means that of proposing terms of peace to President LINCOLN. To Mr. HOLCOMBE'S mission as the legal representative of the interests of the Confederate Government in the adjudication of the Chesapeake case before the colonial tribunals of Nova Scotia, we alluded in these columns at the time. The presence of these three gentlemen so near the frontiers of the United States might well excite curiosity, and Dame Rumour, who nowhere more than in Yankeedom uses her mythological attributes, did the rest. At all events, this auspicious coincidence was made the occasion for amusing the Yankee nation with a little amateur diplomatic burlesque, in which Mr. HORACE GREELEY was selected to play the heavy comic part, assisted by Major HAY, the private secretary of President LINCOLN, with Mr. GEORGE N. SANDERS as prompter and stage-manager, and Mr. W. C. JEWITT as 'generally useful' supernumerary.

These dramatis personæ deserve each a brief biographical sketch. Mr. HORACE GREELEY, editor and proprietor of the New York Tribune, has long been known by the affectionate soubriquet of the 'white-hatted philosopher;' but his eccentricities of dress, gait, and manner are as nothing to the eccentricities of his editorial and political career. He has in turn, and sometimes all together, advocated disunion, free love, spirit-rapping, communism, women's rights, abolitionism, and 'miscegenation,' besides many other 'isms' which we do not at the moment recall. He was the first man who denounced the 'star-spangled banner' as a 'flaunting lie,' and his journal once published some very spirited poetry on this patriotic theme. He is the author of the thrilling axiom, 'Let the Union slide,' which in the earlier stages of secession was the standing motto at the head of the columns of the New York Tribune, but which, when taken down in April 1861, was succeeded by daily frantic appeals for the 'extermination of the rebels.' Mr. HORACE GREELEY, despite his ill-balanced mind, his innumerable crotchets and tergiversations, his utter lack of judgment, and childish credulity, is at heart an amiable and benevolent man, with overflowing affections for all human kind, and the most honest, perhaps the only honest, man in the Administration party. We can well believe that his better nature revolts at the atrocities which he had no small share in bringing about, and that his eager belief in overtures of peace did only respond to an anxious wish long and devoutly cherished.

Of Major HAY, who holds the proud position of confidential secretary to ABE LINCOLN, little is known, except that he was the hero of the ill-starred Federal expedition into Florida, undertaken to procure three electoral votes for his patron at the ensuing Presidential election, on which occasion Mr. LINCOLN wrote from the Executive Mansion at Washington, under date of January 5, to General GILMORE: 'I have given Mr. HAY a commission as major, and sent him to you with some blank books and other blanks to aid in the reconstruction.' This letter, in which the President-candidate avows in terms his purpose and desires 'the thing to be done in the most speedy way possible,' was brought to light by a Congressional Investigation Committee, and will be found on page 300 in our number of May 12. It is all we know of 'Major' HAY.

Mr. GEORGE N. SANDERS is the king of 'wags.' No man living enjoys a joke better than he, and no one knows better how to give it universal publicity. He can perform miracles on the telegraphic wire which would put BLONDIN utterly to shame. He has, moreover, the faculty of always lighting upon his legs, no matter how desperate may be his politico-acrobatic feats, and dexterous indeed must be the man who can ever prove him in the wrong. Withal Mr. SANDERS is a man of singularly original and inventive mind, and has held, under the old Government, several honourable and important positions—no less a one for a short time than that of Consul of the United States to London. Since the disruption he has figured before the European public as a contractor in various gigantic enterprises for supplying the military necessities of the Confederates, among other things for a great steamship blockade-running line, which was never built, but which in some unaccountable manner became confused, in the over-acute perceptions of 'Historicus,' with the Mersey rams. Over two years ago, when on the very scene of his recent exploit, the Canadian press pompously announced him as the bearer of proposals not unlike those with which he appears to have 'inspired' the New York press, judging from the New York Herald of July 15, which says: 'GEORGE SANDERS telegraphs to us from Canada that he is in favour of peace. . . . His next communication to us, to secure any attention, must embrace the announcement that he has forsworn JEFF. DAVIS, and taken the oath of allegiance to the United States.' There is little prospect of 'GEORGE SANDERS' doing this, for neither friends nor foes—and the former are more numerous than the latter—would suspect him of disloyalty to the South, or doubt his zeal to serve her, in his own peculiar way. We must not conclude this imperfect sketch of the central figure in the late 'negotiations' without mentioning the cleverest joke in a long catalogue, and one which shows that Mr. SANDERS may sometimes mingle with his facetia the sagacity of a prophet, and be more discern ing than men of more serious turn. Amids the turmoil of that forerunner of secession, th Charleston Democratic Nominating Convention, i which Mr. SANDERS was a prominent actor, he tele graphed to President BUCHANAN that unless h forgot his private feud against Mr. DOUGLAS, an withdrew his opposition to his nomination as th Democratic candidate, the party and the countr would split in twain, and he, Mr. BUCHANAN, woul be the last President of the whole United States. I has never been ascertained which disgusted more th 'bachelor of Wheatland,' then in the Presidentia chair—the astounding assurance of the suggestion, o the fact that the telegram, costing some twenty-on dollars and odd cents, was not prepaid.

Mr. W. C. JEWITT was unknown to fame until h appeared in the columns of several London news papers in the character of a CURTIUS ready t plunge into the abyss that separated the belligeren American Federations, and in that volunteer capa city had an interview with the King of the BEL GIANS, who must have been even more profound i statecraft than the modern NESTOR is believed to be if he could understand what Mr. JEWITT wante what he proposed, or by whose authority, expresse or implied, he acted. Mr. JEWITT is supposed to b a native of New England; but in his communica tions to the London press he assumed a local habita tion more neutral, and more befitting a cosmopolita philanthropist and amateur peacemaker-general, b hailing from 'Colorado Territory,' a region very fa in the 'Far West.' His functions on the occasio in question seem to have been confined to the carry ing of notes between the parties.

Such, then, was the scene, and such the personne of this comedy of errors which for a moment reall electrified the public of two hemispheres with a hop in which all good men of all nations and all partie sincerely unite. The action of the piece begins ap propriately with a note from Mr. SANDERS, i which he says rather vaguely that he is 'authorised &c. &c. Had Mr. GREELEY, to whom this note wa addressed, not been blinded by a pardonable and, t him, honourable eagerness, he would have detected the 'quiz' in the transparent fact that Mr. SANDER included himself in the proposed commission Washington, and styled himself 'from Dixie.' Bu even the use of the familiar nickname lovingly give by the negroes to the only home of their race, an immortalised in the well-known quick step which supposed to be the national tune of the Southe Confederacy, and which, under various names, an with widely varying words, is dear to the very Arab of the London streets—even this suggestive word 'Dixie' did not warn Mr. HORACE GREELEY. H forthwith addresses to the unconscious Southe representatives a proposal which must have no litt astonished and delighted them, as coming from such quarter. An invitation to Washington, with a sa conduct, given by a trusted friend of the PRESIDE of the United States, for the express purpose treating of the anxiously longed-for peace, was t happy an omen to be disregarded; and while the courteously explain to Mr. GREELEY the error in which he had been led by the vivacious Mr. SA DERS, they felt in duty bound to accept the offer the conditions under which it was possible for the to accept it, and pledged their best endeavours, men enjoying the complete confidence of the Co federate Government, to obtain its subsequent san tion of what they might do in absence of speci authorisation. But so soon as it penetrated the di understanding of the ex-grogshop keeper and e village attorney of Illinois that the three guests the Clifton House at Niagara Falls had not come suppliants from Richmond to sue for mercy—ha in fact, not come at all with any mission to him but that the first overture had been made through false impression on the excitable imagination of h honest friend GREELEY, the natural ferocit sharpened by imbecile disappointment, returned the man who has publicly boasted that, when nav gating a raft or 'flat-boat' on the Mississippi Riv in his younger days, he used to amuse himself wi sewing together the eyes of the hogs that form part of his cargo. The hero of the Florida Pre dent-making expedition, Mr. 'Major' HAY, is se with a message to 'all whom it may concern,' pro fering terms of unconditional surrender as haugh as if the incumbent of the White House were a co queror instead of a vulgar buffoon permitted by just Providence to be the unwitting instrument punishing a nation's sins, and maintained in pow by party-machinery, effrontery of lying, and t inertia of a demoralised public opinion.

Impartial observers will admit that the reply the Southerners, who were for a moment betray into believing that a gleam of reason might illumine the mind of the PRESIDENT of the United States, that of patriots and of gentlemen, and that even t disgust which they could not but feel does not cau them to forget what is due to their country and themselves. They have vindicated the earnest, but not craven, desire for peace unanimously entertained among their countrymen, and they have administered a rebuke which, though lost upon Mr. Lincoln, may not be wholly unfelt by the better classes among the Northern people. We give the correspondence in full, correcting some of the obvious typographical errors which have crept into the text as published by the Northern newspapers. From this our readers may draw the moral for themselves. If this correspondence effects no other good, it will at least have shed a flood of light upon the feelings of the honest men of the North, typified in Horace Greeley; it will have demonstrated that the main obstacle to peace is a corrupt shoddy Administration, having Mr. Lincoln for its mouthpiece; and it will have added another to the many proofs that the war is not of the South's seeking, and that every sincere overture of peace is always sure of being received by it in a spirit of courtesy and moderation.

The only fault we can find with the gentlemen who represented the South at Niagara Falls, is that, in their premature gratitude to Mr. Sanders, they incautiously included his name in the acceptance of Mr. Greeley's offer, since in so doing they appear to sanction the 'authorised' deception under which the offer had been made, and to which it is impossible that they could knowingly have been parties; and furthermore that they allowed Mr. Jewitt to carry their notes, thus gratifying the harmless vanity of that gentleman by affording him the opportunity to connect his name with theirs in print. The easy, we might say reckless, good-nature which commits faults of this character, is habitual to Southern statesmanship, even of the highest order, and in America excites little attention, but in Europe, where these things are differently understood, and where a excess of formality is a more venial fault than its utter disregard, such trifles sometimes produce disagreeable impressions and receive unfair interpretations.

The Fate of Atlanta.

The North is quick in jumping at conclusions. When General Early's column crossed the Potomac, it was at once announced that Baltimore and Washington were the objects of the invasion. When the raid was over, New York and Philadelphia agreed to consider the incursion a 'scare,' and nothing more; President Lincoln mustered the militia out of service; and the Northern Administration went on dreaming about the conquest of the Southern States as confidently as if Grant's whole army were within Richmond and the Potomac. In the same way they have settled the fate of Atlanta. Because Sherman's army had crossed the Chattahoochie, it was inferred, without further news, that Atlanta had fallen, and for days, from every possible quarter, rumours poured into Washington that Atlanta was invested; that a great battle had taken place outside its fortifications, and a great victory had been won by Sherman; that the Confederate force had fallen back upon Macon, and that Atlanta was held by Federal troops. There is not an item of authentic intelligence to justify one of these reports. Mr. Stanton is not ordinarily slow in giving out good news to the Northern people. He is occasionally apt to anticipate. He is never behind the press. We may be quite sure that, if he had any good news to communicate, it would long ago have reached M. Adams. We have very little hesitation, therefore, in describing the information respecting the capture of Atlanta as premature and untrustworthy; and we quite expect to receive news by the next mail which will put a very different complexion on the state of affairs. That the 'situation' is critical there is no doubt, but we can discover no proof of its being hopeless in the correspondence or in the telegrams of the New York papers. All the reliable information we possess from Southern sources is to the effect that Atlanta was likely to be held. At the latest date the Governor of Georgia had ordered all the militia of the State to report at Atlanta. The Southern army, though not nearly equal in numbers to the invaders, was strong, in good spirits, and well officered. The town itself, with strong natural defences, had been furnished with works which, defended by good troops, would at any rate render a protracted siege necessary. From its position as the central terminus of three very important lines of railroad, and its importance as a great manufacturing depôt for the army of the more southern portion of the Confederacy, it could hardly be abandoned without serious loss. We entirely disbelieve, therefore, the reported capture of Atlanta, and we still cling to the hope that it may be, if not successfully defended, at any rate held for so long a time as greatly to embarass the Federal War Administration.

It is doubtless a misfortune to the South that at so critical a moment a change of generals should prove necessary, and the retirement of Johnston is to some extent a confession of failure. But it is impossible to say what effect the appointment of a young and vigorous commander may have upon the fortunes of the campaign. The army of the South-west has been proverbially unlucky, though its ranks are recruited from as good fighting material as is to be found in the Confederacy; and General Johnston's reputation for skill and daring has, we regret to say, failed to impart any new spirit to its soldiers, or to achieve any new successes to its arms. In the hundred miles of his retreat he has been compelled to abandon some half a dozen magnificent defensive positions by the manœuvring of the Northern army, though he has never failed to repulse any direct attack; and the result is, that Sherman was, at the latest date, close up to the outer defences of Atlanta. We shall not at this distance, and in comparative ignorance of the relative strength of the two armies, undertake to criticise General Johnston's movements. But the surest test of military talent is success. General Johnston has been tried in independent command twice—in the attempted relief of Vicksburg, and in the defence of Georgia; he has succeeded in neither. It is not unnatural that he should in his turn have to give place, if not to a better, to a new man. In General Hood the Confederate army in Georgia has at any rate one of the most dashing leaders the South can boast of. A great favourite with his troops, a leader in every sense of the word, brought up in Lee's school of warfare, and possessing, it is said, an instinctive military judgment, he is just the man for the crisis; and we may be quite sure that if Atlanta is to be held, he will hold it to the last extremity. General Hood, it may be recollected, was dangerously wounded and lost a leg at the battle of Chicamauga Creek; but his wound did not prevent his joining his command in Georgia when danger threatened; and where he is, if there be fewer skilful retreats, it is quite certain there will be desperate fighting. The rumours of a pitched battle and a defeat of the Confederates before Atlanta we do not credit. Supposing the Federal army, notwithstanding its heavy losses, to outnumber the Confederates as largely as is said, it is not at all likely that Hood would force on a general action by attacking the Federals in their entrenchments. The engagement, if any has taken place, has probably been unimportant, or has, at any rate, been the result of a Federal attack. We have yet to hear the Confederate account, and are quite prepared for a very different version from that which has at present reached us from 'unofficial' sources only. The announcement that General Bragg has returned to the army in Georgia, we regard with great satisfaction. Bragg also has been an unlucky general; but several of his movements displayed a masterly ability, and his strategy, combined with General Hood's dash, may yet produce the most brilliant results. Under any circumstances we warn our readers against concluding that the campaign in Georgia is over. Atlanta at the latest date was neither occupied nor invested. The railroad to Macon was still open; trains of supplies and reinforcements could reach Atlanta by this line without molestation. It is far more probable that the town should be held, even at a risk of loss to the army, than that so important a base for further operations in Georgia should be surrendered to the enemy, and everything inclines us to believe that Sherman will be reduced to the tedious process of regular siege operations. This delay may be fatal to him. Forrest, with a force of 10,000 or 12,000 cavalry and mounted infantry, was, according to the latest accounts, already at Huntsville, making for the Federal communications. It is not possible that Sherman's army can subsist wholly in front of Atlanta in a country which has been drained for the last six months by the troops of the Confederacy. If Forrest can permanently interrupt the communication between Chattanooga and General Sherman's army, it is difficult to see how Sherman will feed his men, or what is left to him but to dash at all hazards upon the fortifications of the town. The weakness of his long line of communication is so obvious and so dangerous, that at any moment he may lose all the advantages he has gained, and be compelled to seek the safety of his army in Chattanooga or Nashville.

From Virginia there is no news of importance. Notwithstanding a few skirmishes and one or two sharp engagements, the raiders have got clean off with the bulk of their prodigious spoils. There are already rumours of a return of a portion of the invading force to Maryland, and it yet remains to be seen whether the raid was a mere raid or a reconnaissance in force. Time will show. In the meantime in other quarters the Confederates are rapidly regaining lost ground. Kentucky is again threatened, Missouri is overrun with guerillas and traversed by a Confederate army; Arkansas is, with the exception of one or two strong military positions, given up to the Confederates. The Federals are evacuating Brownsville, their last stronghold in Texas, and are suffering defeat after defeat in Mississippi. Lee holds Petersburg, while Grant is contracting his lines, and slowly sapping his way towards the Confederate earthworks, not without many an uneasy suggestion from the President as to the possibility of a real invasion of Maryland, and ominous news from the James River in the shape of heavy batteries mounted to impede the regular passage of the Federal transports. On the whole, we may safely come to two conclusions: first, that if Atlanta is doomed to fall, and Hood contrives to draw his army off intact, Sherman will have accomplished very little beyond the destruction of valuable property and the securing of a new point du départ; secondly, that we may soon expect to hear of another movement on the part of General Lee, either southward towards Tennessee, or once more across the northern frontier. In neither case will General Grant be able to interfere.

'Strict Neutrality.'

Any Englishman who was not unfeignedly glad at the prorogation of Parliament on Friday last must be singularly devoid of patriotic feeling. It is a relief to know that the session of 1864 is at an end — a session which showed how powerless sometimes Parliament is to prevent or even to censure a policy which has unquestionably lowered the just influence of England. It was admitted by Liberals, by Conservatives, and by Radicals, that the conduct of foreign affairs by Earl Russell has been a signal failure, and yet it escaped condemnation by adroit party manœuvres. We write this in no party spirit, for whilst we cannot but condemn the vacillation of the Government by which Denmark was sacrificed and the country nearly plunged into a war, the danger of which might have been averted by proper firmness, it is impossible to defend the course of the Opposition, which was marked throughout by a want of decision and frankness. The Queen's Speech, though per se exceptionally weak, was a very suitable conclusion to the session. Regret is expressed that the Conference failed to bring about peace between Germany and Denmark, and a hope that the belligerents will be able to come to terms; but there is not one word of regret that the kingdom of Denmark is dismembered. However, let us be consoled, for Her Majesty was enabled to assure us that her 'relations with the Emperor of China continue to be friendly.' Nor, indeed, has the session been quite barren. Mr. Bass's Bill has put down, or it is hoped will put down, the nuisance of organ-grinding in London. Public-houses, by another Act passed during the late session, are closed from one to four o'clock in the morning. Moreover, an Act has been passed for inflicting the punishment of whipping on garotters, and already the press has given an account of how two men were beaten, and how they screamed with agony as the 'cat' made little pieces of their flesh fly about, and covered their bodies with blood. Well, let us be thankful for small mercies, and rejoice that the Parliament of England has done something during a six months' session.

In February the speech from the throne did not mention America, but a brief paragraph was devoted to the subject on Friday last. Her Majesty regrets the war is not brought to a close, 'and would rejoice at a friendly reconciliation between the contending parties.' It is much to be regretted that good wishes are so powerless, but, nevertheless, we suppose that Americans ought to be obliged that Her Majesty's Government have, at the end of the session, thought it worth their while to make some reference to the terrible conflict that is desolating a continent, that arrests the attention of the world, that is being waged by men of our own lineage, and that so nearly touches the welfare of a large portion of the labouring population of this country. But Her Majesty is made, besides uttering these benevolent sentiments, to promise that she 'will continue to observe a strict neutrality between the belligerents.' We will not discuss whether or not a strict neutrality comprises the sole duty of England, or whether policy and humanity do not demand that the influence of a powerful and kindred nation should be exerted to do all that is possible to put a stop to the awful and vain carnage. Let us say that non-intervention is the sole duty of England, and that the mother-country is not called upon to play any other part than that of a mere spectator. But we may fairly enquire if the British Government has been strictly neutral, and what that policy is which is to guide it in the future. And we will confine this enquiry to the narrowest possible limits. We think it would not be difficult to prove to any unprejudiced reader that the refusal to recognise the Confederate States is quite at variance with neutrality. When we consider that Mr. Lincoln has brought a million and a half of men into the field—that he has been so lavish of blood as to cripple the resources of the United States, and so lavish of his expenditure of money as to bring the country into a state of bankruptcy, and to pile up a debt in three years as large as that which England accumulated in a century—and that, so far from being subjugated, the South is as strong to-day as she was at the end of the first year of war—that the Confederate capital still defies the armies of the North—that Charleston has successfully resisted the mighty armaments sent against her—and that the Southern cruisers, though few in number, have ruined the Federal marine—it seems ridiculous to say that the Confederates have not vindicated their title to recognition. But we will let that pass, and see whether in other respects the British Government has been strictly neutral.

Most assuredly the Federal Government has no cause of complaint. At the bidding of Mr. Seward Earl Russell has done what he could to protect the North, and to give evidence of what an Anglo-Federal described as warm neutrality. When the flag of England has been deliberately insulted—when English seamen have been grossly ill-treated, and in one case foully murdered—Earl Russell has contented himself with mild and courteous remonstrance. To oblige Mr. Seward, the Tuscaloosa was seized, in palpable violation of the law of nations. But the most conspicuous instances of warm neutrality are the seizures of the Alexandra and the Mersey steam-rams. It was asserted that these vessels were being fitted out as ships of war for the Confederate Government, and in order to stop them Earl Russell did not hesitate to go a little beyond the law of England; and in his memorable Blairgowrie speech he promised, if necessary, to change the law, so that the Confederates should not buy ships in England. In the case of the Alexandra, it was proved that Earl Russell had acted on unfounded suspicion; and in the case of the steam-rams, the Government deemed that they were in the wrong, or they would not have purchased the vessels. And it must be borne in mind that even if the Alexandra and the steam-rams were intended for the Confederate Government, they could only be stopped on a technical point. Everybody, perhaps we may except those who are thoroughly devoted to Mr. Lincoln, was convinced of the utter injustice of permitting the Federals to buy enormous quantities of warlike stores and ammunition in this country, and to permit Messrs. Baring & Co. to ship whole field batteries of guns to New York on English mail steamers, and yet to refuse permission to the Confederates to buy ships, to take them out of English jurisdiction, and in foreign waters to arm them and convert them into ships of war. We do not wish to enter into the legal question, but no one knows better than Earl Russell that it is exceedingly doubtful whether the sale of such vessels is unlawful, else he would not at Blairgowrie have proposed a change in the law. However, let us say there was a doubt, and that he was justified in giving the Federals the benefit of that doubt, but having admitted this it cannot be denied that Earl Russell was ready not only to strain the law, but to change the law, in order to prevent the Confederacy from getting any assistance in carrying on the war. So much for the one side. Not that we have exhausted the subject. We might extend this article to an unprecedented length, and yet there would not be sufficient space to give a dry catalogue of all the favours shown to the Federal Government, or, if the term is preferred, all the evidences of a warm neutrality, by Earl Russell. Let us glance at the other side of the picture, and in doing so we must confine our attention to one case only. We must pass by the prompt action that was taken on the faith of the forged report attributed to the Confederate Secretary of the Navy, and many other instances of what, for want of a better expression, we will call cold neutrality.

In another part of our impression we give a report of a debate in the House of Commons upon the way in which the Federal armies are recruited with British subjects. We commend the speeches of Lord E. Howard and Mr. Layard, the Under-Secretary for Foreign Affairs, to the attention of our readers. It is impossible to summarise those speeches. It is impossible in a single paragraph to give any idea of the brutality with which British emigrants have been treated in the United States. It is past dispute that agents have been busy in Ireland and in England recruiting for the Federal army. The unfortunate emigrants have been drugged and forcibly enlisted—no, not enlisted, but enrolled in the Federal army. To prevent all clue to them, they have been entered under false names, and then driven into Mr. Lincoln's slaughter-pens. Lord E. Howard's speech bristled with incontrovertible facts, and Mr. Layard endorsed his Lordship's statements. Well, what of that? It is very heartrending, to be sure, that Her Majesty's subjects should be so shamefully beguiled and so infamously maltreated. It is, to be sure, very heartrending indeed that husbands, fathers, and sons should be kidnapped into the Federal army and be no more heard of; but what can be done? Lord Lyons remonstrates. Mr. Layard admits 'that the evasions of officers in command of regiments who were unwilling to surrender any of their men, defeated the ends of justice. It sometimes happened that when they had traced a man he was killed or removed out of reach before measures could be taken for his release.' But no effectual measures can be taken by Her Majesty's Government to protect the unfortunate emigrants. To prevent the Confederates getting ships of war Earl Russell acted on suspicion and was ready to strain the law or to change the law, but he is powerless to do anything to prevent British subjects from swelling the ranks of the Federal army. And this is strict neutrality.

We elsewhere reprint from the New York World an article on the military strength of the United States, and that article proves conclusively that, without the enlistment of foreigners, the Northern Government could not continue the war. It proves, we say, that if Her Majesty's Government had been strictly neutral—and, still more, if they had treated the North as they have the South—the war which is deplored would not have been so bloody, and would not have lasted so long. We lament, then, that Her Majesty's Government intend to adhere to their past policy, for it has not been a policy of strict neutrality, but of disfavour to the South and of favouritism to the North. Whilst it may or may not have prevented the Confederates from getting ships of war, it has undoubtedly enabled the Federals to recruit their ranks, and to supply the gaps made by the reckless indifference of Federal commanders in sacrificing the lives of their soldiers.

THE STATUE OF WASHINGTON.

(From the New York Daily News, July 7.)

During the late raid of General Hunter in the Virginia Valley, the bronze statue of Washington, erected in 1788, the first ever cast of the Father of his Country, was stolen from Lexington, and in a broken form was transported to Wheeling. The tablet was broken in three pieces. It bore the inscription:

'The General Assembly of the Commonwealth of Virginia have caused this statue to be erected as a monument of affection and gratitude to George Washington, who, uniting to the endowments of the hero the virtues of the patriot, and exerting both in establishing the liberties of his country, has endeared his name to his fellow-citizens, and given to the world an immortal example of true glory. Done in the year of Christ 1788, and in the year of the Commonwealth the 12th.'

The Emperor Napoleon, in his wars against a foreign enemy, received the censure of all historians for enriching France with works of art taken from the palaces and the cities he had conquered; but Napoleon never removed a statue erected by a grateful people to any of their illustrious dead. That act of utter infamy is reserved for an American general in this the noon time of the nineteenth century. The State of Virginia had erected this statue to her own son, whom she gave to the Revolution which gave birth to the Republic. She had selected the spot for its erection where her State Military Academy was placed, to the end that her sons might draw inspiration from his wisdom and patriotism from his virtues. The Military Academy was given to the incendiary torch and was burned to the ground—the statue of Washington was taken from its pedestal and feloniously carried away, as no doubt would have been his bones had they been buried there. This was done by the command of an officer bearing a commission in the service of the Republic Washington had formed. Although the statue was erected by the commonwealth that gave Washington birth, and which he so loved, to perpetuate her pride in her noblest son, in whose bosom his ashes slept, yet she gladly hailed him as the Father of his Country, and the people of every State in the Confederacy called him by that proud title. The stealing of the statue was an act of vandalism without earthly excuse—it is a theft that nothing can palliate—disgraceful to the age, and doubly so to the country that will suffer such a sacrilege to go unwhipped of justice. It will give the author of the theft a name, and it will, in history, associate it with that of Washington, but like that of the youth who, for the sake of an infamous immortality, fired the Ephesian temple, it is such a fame that good men would shrink from enjoying. In the world's history it is without a parallel, and our hope is that it may remain so.

The Federal Soldiers and their Pay.—The Times New York Correspondent writes on July 19: 'General Sherman's troops, whether their numbers be 60,000 or 100,000, have not received a cent of pay since December 31, 1863. The Government is in arrear to them for upwards of six months and a half. Mr. Fessenden has been unable to borrow 50,000,000 of greenbacks from the banks of New York mainly because the banks do not possess 20,000,000 among them of that particular variety of the currency, and he is not authorised by law to accept or put into circulation 50,000,000 of the notes of the State banks. Without further loans and further issues of legal tender notes, already so depreciated that the paper dollar is worth but 35c. in coin, the Federal Government cannot provide the means for the payment of its existing armies. It is under such circumstances that Mr. Lincoln demands more men. If he raises them, he must also raise money to pay them, and, in default of taxes and of loans, nothing is left for him but a paper currency very likely in view of events, as well as of its own independence, to fall in value until it becomes about as worthless as the Continental money of the American revolution, or the French assignats, about 500 of which were necessary to purchase a cup of coffee.'

LETTER FROM NEW YORK.

New York: July 19, 1864.

THE INCURSION INTO MARYLAND—THE PANIC IN THE NORTH—THE APATHY OF THE PEOPLE—THE WEAKENING OF GRANT'S ARMY—MR. LINCOLN'S CALL FOR 500,000 MEN—CAN THE NEW LEVY BE SUPPLIED?—THE FINANCIAL CRISIS.

There is no denying it: the Northerners were badly scared last week, and are this week heartily ashamed of it. They have a great deal to be ashamed of, including the incompetency of the Administration, the panic among the officials, military and civil, and the pusillanimity of the people. A few thousands of Confederates—we do not know how many—threw themselves across the Potomac at various fords, and did, for nearly a week, what they pleased in Maryland. They divided themselves fearlessly into small parties, traversed the country to and fro without obstruction, seized railroads, cut down telegraphic lines, and for a while severed the communications between Washington and the North, and alarmed the Northern people into the apprehension that the capital was about to be taken. The Administration, which had made no preparations to obstruct the routes by which they came, was in a pitiable state of terror. It is in testimony, on the Federal authority, that five hundred 'greybacks' kept Washington itself in a state of siege for two days, with twenty thousand men behind impregnable defences. Only one severe battle was fought in which considerable numbers were engaged, and the Federals were beaten. The Confederates stayed as long as suited their purposes. It is yet doubtful what these were—whether a foray for regaining some of the losses inflicted by the Federal raids in Virginia, or as a preparatory reconnaissance for a more extended expedition hereafter. They retired at their leisure, carrying off large stocks of cattle and other provisions, and particularly of horses, of which they had much need. The Administration in its panic called for aid from the militia of Pennsylvania and New York in addition to those of Maryland; but before the Governors of these States could get any men together for the purpose, the Confederate troops, which terror had magnified into a vast army deploying in columns for a great invasion, had gathered what they could and gone quietly away.

Journals of all parties assail the military mismanagement by which this national disgrace was permitted to occur. The Administration journals can't help joining from very shame, but they deal very gingerly with the question of responsibility. They dare not assail Grant, nor Lincoln, no Stanton—although the fault certainly lies somewhere amon the three—nor Governor Bradford of Maryland, nor Goveror Curtin of Pennsylvania, both of whom were sadly lacking in foresight and energy; so they content themselves with douncing the general apathy of the people, and hunting for something upon which to base an assault upon Governor Seymouof New York. He is of the other side in politics, and it is safeto abuse him. The Conservatives and Democrats denounce the whole Administration as disgracefully imbecile and cowardly, bt try to spare Grant, for whom they expect to have some olitical uses, alleging that he had foresight of this 'invasio,' and warned the President, and was unheeded.

The charge of popular apathy is a true one. The people of Maryland and Pennsylvania showed no alacriy to rally in defence of their soil or its flag from the invade; on the contrary, they abandoned their homes, running way in crowds before the Confederates came near them. The Maryland Governor implored his people in vain to come out and fight. The Pennsylvania Governor taunted his people with their want of patriotism; and when Governor Seymour attmpted to get volunteers from the militia of New York to comply with the President's call for thirty-days' men, they hug back, and interposed enquiries for delay, and constitutiona scruples, and some of them flat refusals to go; so that it wasdemonstrated that no help could have been had from this quarter if the emergency had been what was announced in sch imploring terms from Washington—an instant necessity fothe salvation of the capital.

The Confederates came without opposition andwent without obstruction. Their coming and going as they id developed the utter and now confessed failure of Grant's xpedition for the capture of Richmond this summer. His amy is so fixed in the trenches that Lee can afford to send o' considerable bodies of troops on distant expeditions, which py well in the supplies they gather, and perform the more imprtant function of compelling Grant to weaken his army furher in sending away large bodies of them to protect Washingto and cover the assailable points. If these were omitted to be ared for in his original plans, or he was overruled by his superiors at Washington, he has been taught caution by severe lessons. The Southern railroads by Weldon and Danville, which were cut by his raiders, are again in the possession of the Confederates, repaired, and in running order again. The expditions which accomplished his transitory successes there cost him thousands of men. His lines are now contracted, and is evidently aiming to find rest within fortified entrenchmers amidst the malaria of the James River, which will be mor fatal to his soldiers than a lost battle would be, and to waitfor reinforcements under the new draft, with which to reorganie for another campaign in the fall.

The news from Atlanta is not so favourable to the Confederates as formerly. For the first time there is an pprehension developed that General Sherman may take that city. The tone of the Confederates is less confident, but by no means despairing. It would be a serious loss to lose Atlanta.

But the national cry of despair at the failure ofGrant comes out in the President's proclamation making a call for 500,000 more troops, and directing a draft for such part of them as shall not voluntarily enlist before September 5.

In May last a spurious proclamation got abroad, a which, in the name of the President, it was stated that the campaign of General Grant had not answered the hopes of the Government, and that 400,000 men were required to fill up the armies. The publishers and the author were arrested and dungeond for disloyalty in circulating a false account of the state of military affairs and of the views of the Government so discouraging to the people. But the writer of that proclamation was surely prophetic. To-day the Administration tell the people hat the 'treasonable' proclamation was all true, and that 500,00 men instead of 400,000 men are needed in order to enable General Grant to recover himself and make a new trial. Eigh weeks ago it was sedition to say that the grand campaign inaugurated after eight months of preparation was anything short of perfect success. The 'magnificent' army has been dashed to pieces against the Confederate defences, and half a million f men are demanded again to begin the gigantic effort once moe.

This drain of men upon the North is getting to be appalling. I have heretofore given you tables showing the sucessive numbers called into the field by the President since te beng of the war. The aggregate up to and excluding this and including temporary calls for service in short terms, is two million four hundred thousand men. The militia three months men' have amounted in numbers to upwards 07,000 men. The round number up to July 18 amounts fore to 1,910,000 men, to which the addition of the numbers called for will restore the number of enlisted men to ,000. They had the temporary aid of the 500,000 militia short-time men, of the enlisted men in the Southern States, e black soldiers, and of the hundred-day men recently d out and set to garrison the forts and harbours.

in this immense new levy be supplied? Is there no to the submission of the people to this horrible waste of physical power of the country, for objects which most of begin to see to be unattainable, and very many of them ve to be in the highest degree criminal? The impatience he people under these continued and tightening strains is ng to be irrepressible in many places, and there may be attempt too many for the public endurance. There is a t fright among the politicians of both sides for the conseuences of a draft under these circumstances, and the most uous efforts will be made to find volunteer recruits by rmous bounties; and the luckless working men, whose verty will constrain them to serve, while the more wealthy ape by buying substitutes, are soothed by vague promises the coming Presidential election will, with their help, put of power the authors of these cruel proceedings, and give some prospect of permanent relief. The effect of these measures and these palliating efforts can only be seen when the final test comes, in the enforcing of the draft. But one thing is very certain: the call for such a large army on a people already nearly exhausted and altogether discouraged, places a very powerful weapon in the hands of the peace party, which will not fail to use it with effect during the canvass for the nomination at Chicago. It brightens the hopes of those who count on obtaining the nomination of an unconditional peace man and effecting a concentration on him of the votes of all the opposition to Mr. Lincoln.

The effects of such a call on the national finances will be another potent argument against war. The Treasury is now literally bankrupt. The new Secretary of the Treasury finds everything in arrear, except the payments on public debt and interest, which with extraordinary efforts have still been met. For overdue claims and requisitions laid over, and contractors stved off, and the pay of the army in arrears, he needs a hundred millions beyond his available means, present or prospective, and has no resource but in the issue of more legal-tender paper, and a further debasement of the public credit. He has failed to obtain any aid from the banks, simply because they cannot, without ruining themselves, furnish him anything which he can accept. He is drifting along helplessly in the rapids of which his predecessor warned him on quitting the helm in despair. And now, in the very crisis of his financial failure and distresses, when he is casting about helplessly for the means of going on from day to day, the President's call for new troops lops up hundreds of millions of dollars more on the current expenditure of the year, upon which he had already estimated for him a deficit of five hundred millions, to be provided for in some way for which nobody has been able to supply him a hint of a really practicable plan.

All this is working together for that chaos of military and financial failure out of which only thoughtful minds see any hope of the rising of a returning sanity which will stop this dreadful carnage, and seek to reinstate peace and recover liberty.

To-day a very long and extremely able address, signed by about forty Democratic members of the late Congress, is issued by the New York World. It restates with great force the constitutional principles upon which the Union might have been maintained for ever over an expanding country and an harmonious people. It would have been an admirable document for those times, but is now simply an anachronism. It is worth your particular notice that the World, the organ of the war Democracy of New York, while publishing and commending this address, is careful to disclaim it as constituting the platform of the Democratic party until authoritatively confirmed at Chicago, and that no name of any New York Democrat is appended to the paper. This may be accidental, but it looks like design.

The Exhaustion of the North.—The New York correspondent of the Daily News, who cannot be accused of any want of zeal or of ingenuity in making the Northern appear the better as well as the stronger cause, gives, in his letter of July 19, the following graphic description of the state to which the repeated calls for men have reduced the agricultural districts of the Federal States:—'It may give you an idea of the tremendous efforts made by the North to say that it appears, from the returns of the Provost-Marshal-General's office, that the State of New York, with a population of 2,500,000, has sent 30,000 men to the field in the last three years; but Illinois has sent nearly the same number from a population of little over one-half, and Iowa has actually at this moment one-seventh of her entire population in the army. This great drain is already felt very severely in the agricultural districts. In the west women are now seen, for the first time in America, working in the fields. Cultivation has in many States been this year very largely curtailed, owing to the scarcity of labour, and the land devoted to hay, the crop of which has never, I believe, been so large as this year. But even the hay has had generally to be made by machinery and horse labour. It is cut down by the mowing machine, and gathered up with long horse rakes drawn by horses. A farm labourer, even in the New England States, occupies this summer a position such as, I suppose, farm labourers never occupied before in any country. He is flattered, caressed, and petted, and surrounded with all the arts of petits soins by the farmer and his family, and the slightest indication of dissatisfaction or ill-humour fills the household with dismay, for it may be the sign of his approaching departure, leaving the good man to cut his corn or make hay as best he can.'

The 'Alabama' Sword.—The manufacture of the sword which is to be presented to Captain Semmes for defending the honour of his flag so gloriously in the action off Cherbourg, has been intrusted to the well-known firm of Elkington & Co., of Regent Street. The design is a very superb one—the scabbard being gold, ornamented with the national emblems of England and the Confederacy in oxidised silver, enamelled and jewelled. Surmounting a shield are the flags of the two countries, with the words 'Peace and Friendship:' on the reverse side, 'Aide-toi, le ciel t'aidera.' We understand that the list of subscribers is a very long one, and includes peers, members of Parliament, officers of the army, navy, and volunteers, and civilians of every class.

THE MILITARY STRENGTH OF THE UNITED STATES.

(From the New York World, July 19.)

By the census of 1860, it appears that the total population of the United States at that time was 31,148,000, of which the white population numbered 26,957,000. Of this aggregate, the free States had within their boundaries 17,924,400—the slave States 9,036,000. But Delaware, Maryland, Kentucky, Missouri, and that portion of Virginia now known as West Virginia, have been and are ranked with the non-slaveholding States in loyalty to the Federal Government. Their population was 2,539,380. Out of this number, however, a certain proportion are active sympathisers with the rebellion, and have furnished a large quota towards the support of the rebel armies. Probably the number may be stated at half a million—leaving, in round numbers, two millions who may be represented in the armies of the Union. This number, deducted from the population of the slave States, will give seven millions and thirty-six thousand as (practically) the total number from which the rebellion could recruit its armies; while a corresponding addition to the population of the free States swelled it to nearly twenty millions. But to this number must be added the free blacks of the North, the slaves who have come under the control of the United States Government, and the number of loyal Southerners who have established their adhesion to that Government since the war began—in all about 1,000,000—making the aggregate loyal population 21,000,000. According to the proportion shown in the census tables of 1860, of this population the number of males between the ages of eighteen and forty-five would be about 5,000,000. As the census returns of 1860 show that the total number of males in the United States at that time, between the above-mentioned ages, was 5,624,065, this estimate would give to the States in revolt between 600,000 and 700,000 males capable of bearing arms.

In a number of the Federalist Mr. Madison made the following statement:—

'The highest number to which, according to the best computation, a standing army can be carried in any country, does not exceed a hundredth part of the whole number of souls, or one twenty-fifth part of the number able to bear arms.'

Assuming that this estimate is correct, it follows that a country having a population of 21,000,000 souls could not safely furnish an army of more than 200,000 men. But the military machinery of the present day is such, and the relations of commerce to agriculture and manufactures so changed since the day at which Mr. Madison wrote, that there is no doubt that a much greater number of men than that given above could be safely withdrawn from the domestic pursuits of the country—a fact sufficiently proven in the course of the present war. We believe that at least half a million men can be drawn from such a population, under similar circumstances, without materially affecting the prosperity of those remaining at home, or altering the course of government. But let us see how many men have actually been called into service since the beginning of the war.

In his report made on December 1, 1861, Secretary Cameron stated that 77,875 men were raised during that year, under the first call of the President. These were 'three-months men.' The number of men, at the date of his report, enlisted for three years, was 660,971. So overwhelming was the response to the call for men at that time, that the Secretary stated that he had no doubt that the national forces could have been swollen to a million of men had not the department felt constrained to restrict volunteering.

July 1, 1862, immediately after the retreat from the peninsula, the President issued a call for three hundred thousand more volunteers. This force was chiefly of infantry, in pursuance of a recommendation of the President.

On August 4 of the same year, the President called to the field three hundred thousand militia, to serve for a term of nine months. This number was promptly furnished.

June 15, 1863, the President summoned, from certain States, militia to the number of 100,000. This number was afterwards increased to 120,000.

During the month of July 1863 a draft for 300,000 men was enforced. There is no public means of learning the number of men yielded by this conscription.

Since October 17 last (at which time a call for three hundred thousand men was made), under all the calls, about seven hundred thousand men, exclusive of negro soldiers and 'one hundred days' men,' have been put in the field. For the accuracy of this statement we have good Republican authority—the statement of Senator Wilson, of Massachusetts, chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs, made in the course of a discussion in the Senate on June 9. Mr. Wilson said:

'The senator from California speaks of the spasmodic action of the administrators of the Government in raising men during the last few months. Does the senator know that we have raised or recruited since October 17 last 600,000 men, not to count black men, and that within the past year we have put in the field 700,000 men; that we have made an exertion such as few nations ever made and few nations can make; that we have spent $125,000,000 in bounties; that we have drafted; that we have used the whole power and influence of the Government to increase our military forces? Sir, we have put forth an effort that excites the astonishment and commands the admiration of the world; yet the senator from California, whose constituents are not drafted nor called upon, rises to-day and rebukes the Administration, rebukes us, and talks glibly of the timid counsels of men who are quite as hopeful, determined, and brave as himself.'

Thus it is easy to arrive at the total number of men called out since the outbreak of the rebellion. It is given concisely in the following table:—

NUMBER OF MEN SUMMONED TO THE FIELD.

Under President's first call, April 19, 1861	77,875
Volunteers for the war, 1861	660,971
Under President's call of July 1, 1862	300,000
Militia called out in August, 1862	300,000
Militia called out in June, 1863	120,000
By conscription, July, 1863, say	250,000
Since October 17, 1863	700,000
Total	2,408,846
Deduct militia and 'three months' men	497,875
Balance	1,910,961

Thus it is seen that the enormous number of one million nine hundred and ten thousand nine hundred and sixty-one men have been placed in the field, exclusive of the temporarily-serving militia, of the black soldiers, and of the hundred-days men who recently offered their services.

So, instead of Mr. Madison's 'hundredth part of the whole number of souls,' we have sent to the field an army composed in the ratio of about one in every eleven of the total population—estimating the latter at twenty-one millions—or about two-fifths of the male population between the ages of eighteen and forty-five.

But it must be remembered that the above statement includes men who have served one term and reenlisted; men who have been counted twice in the estimates of the War Department—as a large portion of the militia who served three months at the beginning of the war, and afterwards enlisted for three years—and a large number of 'three-months' and 'nine-months' men, exclusive of the above, who have also enlisted for the longer period. So, with the deduction of our losses and that of those who have been twice enumerated, it is not safe to state the strength of our army at more than from seven hundred and fifty to eight hundred thousand men, a force, one would think, even thus shorn, sufficiently astounding in numbers to satisfy the ideas of the most ambitious American, proud as he may be of the vastness of his country's territory and resources, and however much he may be determined to be governed by the peculiarly American characteristic of 'doing things on a big scale.'

[One or two observations on the above Northern statement of Northern resources may not be out of place. It is at once manifest that the division of population for military purposes is incorrect, and that the United States' 'twenty-one millions' is a myth. California, for example, neither takes Federal greenbacks nor responds to Mr. Lincoln's calls. The men of Maryland are in the Confederate armies, the women of Maryland welcome the 'invading' Confederates, and Mr. Lincoln is obliged to keep a force to keep Maryland in the Union. So far from Kentucky being 'loyal,' it has just been deprived of the habeas corpus and put under martial law on account of disloyalty. Missouri is so 'disloyal' that Colonel Ford, commanding at Liberty, declares that in Platte County nine out of ten of the inhabitants are in favour of the South; and General Rosecrans reproaches the Missourians that they use the weapons supplied to them by the United States Government to aid and abet the Confederate guerillas. Such States do not add to, but take from, the military strength of the North. Then, again, it must be remembered that though the negroes are not in the Southern armies, they are an element of strength to the South, for they do the work that in the North must be performed by white men; and consequently a larger proportion of the arms-bearing native population of the South can go into the field than can be taken in the North. The disproportion in regard to the home supplies of soldiers is not nearly so great as the above article represents, and this would have been too apparent for denial if the North had not recruited extensively in Europe.

Assuming that the above statement is correct as to the present strength of the Federal armies, we must recollect that it does not show the entire drain of the war. To the 750,000 in the field we must add the mighty host that has been 'used up' by commanders who in all time will be noted for their reckless prodigality in the expenditure of life. We shall certainly not be accused of exaggeration if we say that 250,000 men have been killed and disabled on the Federal side. This will give a million of men withdrawn from the male population available for conscription, and to these we must add those who have served their full time and will not re-enlist, the temporarily serving militiamen, the naval forces, and the numbers not actually enrolled, but who are engaged in arsenals and otherwise supplying the armies with war munitions. We shall, if we duly consider these things, not be surprised at the exhaustion of the North, despite the enormous emigration of recruits from Europe.]

A Dramatic View of the Confederate Incursion in Maryland.—The Washington Correspondent of the New York World, under date of July 14, writes as follows:—'Behold a spectacle humiliating beyond any of the sad military dramas which have been enacted to our disfavour since the war began: Scene 1: Maryland—the Potomac—invasion—an army of rebels crossing the river—three Union armies 'disappeared' and disappearing in the western and south-western distance. Scene 2: Advance of invaders—lively plunder by flankers and detachments—plunder disappearing to the rear. Scene 3: Battle of Monocacy—brave struggle of veterans against odds—skedaddle of hundred-days men—'disorderly' retreat—music and jubilee by the rebels—those other Union 'armies' still aloof. Scene 4: General devastation by the invaders—plunder everywhere—pandemonium in Baltimore—railroads and telegraph lines destroyed—Washington menaced—the troops of the Union behind mountains and fortifications on the edge of the arena, watching the show. Scene 5: Grand return march of the rebel army over the Potomac, through open doors, bearing the spoil of its conquest. Thus the drama closes.

A Federal Order.—We take the following from the Boston Courier:—'For want of a more expressive word we are forced to characterise the following order, issued by General Washburne at Memphis, as infamous:

SPECIAL ORDER NO. 48.

Before any one can engage in the trade or commerce of Western Kentucky, or sell the produce of their farms, or buy their necessary family supplies, they shall be required to take the following oath, with competent evidence, before the Provost-Marshal of Paducah, Kentucky, that they are unconditional Union men:

'I do solemnly swear that I have always been an early, constant, unswerving, and an unconditional loyal Union man.'

This simply dooms a great portion of the population which this military tyrant holds in his ruffianly grip to destitution, nakedness, and starvation. We say starvation, as well as destitution and nakedness, because a great many of the so-called farms along the Ohio, Cumberland, and Tennessee rivers are merely wood-yards for steamboats, the people living by the sale of wood and cultivating little or nothing.'

Lord Palmerston and his Colleagues.—On Wednesday Lord and Lady Palmerston were at Towcester, on the occasion of cutting the first sod of the East and West Junction Railway. Mr. Knightley, M.P., in returning thanks for 'the County Members,' said: 'The country seemed always to draw a distinction between the noble viscount at the head of the Government and the Government itself. When any measure of the Government was successful it was always put to the credit of the noble lord; when the Ministerial dish failed, and was not considered very palatable, the failure was always put down to the cookery of the subordinates. The noble lord and his Ministry seemed to be always engaged in the game of "chuck farthing," and it was invariably with him "heads I win, tails you lose." Whenever it came up "head," the noble viscount very properly had all the credit; when it came up "tails," the rest of the Ministers came in for the blame. He did not mean to say that the noble viscount was guilty of unfair play, but that the people, it was evident, were determined to give him all the halfpence, and the rest of the Ministry all the kicks.'

THE CONFEDERATE CAUSE IN FRANCE.

Paris: August 2.

The controversy commenced between the Pays and the Opinion Nationale relative to the American question, and of which I have already spoken in my first letter, has not yet terminated. The Opinion Nationale, resuming the question under another form, with the view, probably, of overthrowing its opponent, undertakes to show, by the quotation of several luminous proverbs, such as, 'Every man's house is his castle,' &c., that a mediation in favour of the Confederates would be contrary to all the principles of public right, as also to the historical and liberal traditions of France. The Southerners, says this journal, are rebels, enslavers, and pirates; they are in rebellion against Lincoln, who has never exercised an hour's authority over the Southern States; against the Congress, where they are not represented; and against universal suffrage, which opposed the election of Mr. Lincoln. It is therefore necessary that the South should be conquered, crushed, annihilated; and since 'every man's house is his castle,' it is just that the Confederates should surrender their country to the Federals.

All this very sensible reasoning seems to be based on the gratuitous supposition previously put forth by the Europe, of Frankfort, that the journey of the King of the Belgians to Vichy had for its object the proposition of a project of Anglo-French mediation between the Federal and Confederate States. King Leopold, according to the Frankfort journal, was to be chosen as arbiter, and in case of the mediation being rejected by the Cabinet of Washington, the Southern States were to be immediately recognised. The Opinion added to these exact statements another statement not less exact, namely, that Mr. Slidell had set out for Vichy, and that his journey to that place was connected with the mediatorial projects just mentioned.

The Pays, after remarking that the statement on which the Opinion had based its declamations was false, that Mr. Slidell had not left Paris, and that he had no intention of doing so, makes the following reply to the Yankee organ:—

> The Opinion Nationale is fearful that England and France will concert together to offer a mediation to the Americans. What a scandal! cries the humanitarian journal. A war in which two millions of lives have not yet been sacrificed, and which, during four years, has consigned six millions of European artisans to misery! Truly, the solution of this conflict is not to be desired. It is to be wished that it may continue for the honour of philanthropy.
> But then it may happen that Mr. Lincoln will reject the counsels of France and England. He is of a somewhat obstinate disposition, this Mr. Lincoln. Would the European Powers then decide to recognise the Southern Confederation? Oh, abomination!
> After this follow the habitual epithets, deep-sounding words following hollow-sounding arguments—'enslavers!' 'rebels!'
> Mr Lincoln can have but one claim for entering Richmond, that which the Russians, of whom he is the faithful ally and friend, had in 1814 and 1815 for entering Paris. This is probably the sole claim to which the Opinion Nationale is disposed to yield.

As it happens in all discussions, however, when good reasons can be no longer given, insults are given instead, and this is what the Opinion has done; but this time it has found its match. The Yankee journal had stated that it would no longer reply to the contradictions of the Pays, and had, for some unknown reason, introduced Mr. Slidell's name in the debate. The Pays makes the following sharp rejoinder:—

> The Opinion, which, as it seems, has exhausted its sophisms and insults, informs us that for the future it will cease to reply to us. This silence, to which it is reduced, will not prevent us from interrogating it, will not prevent us from still asking it, from asking it daily, what it thinks of Mr. Lincoln having given up the Poles to Russia, from reminding it that it has falsified the text of the Confederate manifesto, and from again telling it that it has dressed up a vast and grave affair solely upon the fable of a journey made by Mr. Slidell to Vichy—a fable as indelicate as it is false.
> Its silence will not liberate it from our questions; it must endure the punishment attending the part which it has assigned to itself and which it plays. We will pursue it with truth in our hands; and, whether it replies or keeps silence, which is indifferent to us, we shall interpose in those false assertions which it is now spreading amongst the public, and in those anti-liberal illusions by which it abuses its over-credulous readers.
> One word more before concluding. Let the Opinion perfectly understand that we are scrupulous in matters of information, that our information is derived from trustworthy and pure sources, and that we judge of circumstances by our own free convictions; let it, therefore, cease to implicate, in its controversy with ourselves, proper names which have no right whatever to be thus exhibited.
> We have nothing to ask, and we ask nothing, of the honourable Mr. Slidell; we do not even know him, and never has an editor of the Pays placed his foot in the residence of the Confederate Legation.
> Is the Opinion Nationale quite certain that it has not its large and its small entrances to the residence of the Federal Legation?

This last point has so astounded the Opinion that it has become speechless. The article in the Pays has remained unanswered; this, however, has not prevented that journal from resuming the subject to-day, and again proposing to the Opinion the questions to which it has not replied.

In another article, the Pays makes some observations worthy of notice, respecting the blockade of the Southern ports. Taking as its starting-point the fact that 3,814 bales of cotton have recently been brought to Liverpool from the South, the Pays states that it is not to the blockade that the diminution in the supply of cotton is to be attributed, but to the fact that the Confederates, ceding their interests to the necessities of the war, have neglected the cultivation of cotton for that of cereals and forage, which are indispensable to their armies.

'It is there,' concludes the Pays, 'and not in the efficacy of the blockade, that we must look in order to understand the reason for the diminution in American supplies. King Cotton is dethroned. The Southern States had a valuable monopoly; they have sacrificed themselves, without hesitation, to the defence of the soil. Before becoming rich, they have wished to become free.'

The adventurous exploits of the Alabama, which have been with you the subject of many important publications, have also elicited the attention of a French writer of great authority in these matters. M. le Baron de Bazincourt, the official historiographer of the wars of the second empire, the author of those special works on the Crimean, Italian, and Chinese campaigns which are so universally read, has given in La France a substantial and dramatic summary of this formidable vessel. M. de Bazincourt commences the history of the Alabama from the time when she left the dockyard of Messrs. Laird, and follows her through all the startling and curious adventures of her intrepid cruises to the very moment when, having lived gloriously, she dies gloriously in an unequal combat with a Federal vessel effectually equipped for the occasion in chain-armour. He gives an animated account of the exploits of those resolute and daring men who never bargained with danger, whose self-denial was complete, who braved both storm and combat with a smile, who, at the voice of their captain, rushed to the boarding without a thought of death—of those men, in a word, who had sacrificed their lives to the grand cause they were serving, who are called pirates by the Federals, but whom the Baron de Bazincourt calls heroes.

The historian says, in conclusion:—

> The Alabama is now no more. Riddled by hostile cannon-balls, she has found beneath the waves a tomb of which she was worthy. But her memory will not die; and this mysterious vessel, playing every character, hoisting every flag, passing as a fugitive shadow through the midst of her enemies, or darting with a terrible haste to the boarding, will become the legendary vessel of the American war. Like the Phantom Ship, she will have her historian, and for a long time hence in America, at eventide, will be related the bold feats and fantastic adventures of the celebrated cruiser, the Alabama.

The Siècle, commenting on the news received from the North, dated the 16th, transmitted by the Special Correspondent of the Times, accuses the city journal of showing itself still more and more partial to the South, and of not knowing what it states relative to American affairs. It appears to me unnecessary to reproduce in this letter the arguments of the Siècle; but the idea of a French journal, whose editors probably do not understand a word of English, wishing to give a lesson on American affairs to the Times—the most vast and most complete vehicle of information in existence, which is printed in the language spoken by the Americans, and whose correspondent, a man of great notoriety, living at New York, and himself a witness of those things of which he writes—this idea, I say, is truly laughable.

The same number of the Siècle called attention to the misfortunes of a young mulatto of New Orleans, forsaken by his parents at Paris, and arrested as a vagabond. The court before which this mulatto was brought, in order to certify itself that he had no means of existence, that his quality of a Southern mulatto prevented his obtaining papers from the United States Consul, had postponed the case for a week, in the hope that some one would come forward to the help of this victim of the American war. This help was not long wanting. Several South Americans came to the court and left contributions for the young mulatto. If I am rightly informed, the bankers charged with the American loan, Messrs. Emile Erlanger and Co., have done still more; they have taken this unfortunate from Mazas, and have supplied all his wants. The Siècle, and all who imagine that the Southerners are negro-eaters, are astonished that they should have thus rescued the poor mulatto from his unfortunate position.

The Constitutionnel has published, under the signature of M. Marie-Martin, an excellent article on the invasion of the North by the Confederates. M. Martin thus enumerates the moral consequences of this invasion:—'It has spread a complete panic in the Northern States. It has disabused the firmest partisans of the war, who imagined the South to be at bay and all its forces paralysed by Grant at Petersburg and Richmond, and it has suddenly placed the Federal capital in greater danger than the Confederate.'

M. Martin then acknowledges with surprise the want of alacrity on the part of the military in going to the assistance of Washington; he asks whence this could have arisen, and sees in it a sign of real lassitude on the part of the North.

M. Dréolle, in the Patrie, has resumed the question of American mediation. Approving of the words used by Lord Palmerston in his reply to Mr. Lindsay, he says, 'it is evident that dispositions of a less egoistic character now manifest themselves in British statesmen, and that the military resistance of the South, its organisation and its government, its resources and its credit, all, in fact, begin to impress the public mind in England, and to demand a change in the attitude hitherto taken by the Queen's ministers.'

Then, comparing the moderate tone of the language used by the noble lord and that of the English journals, which advocate, with the Patrie, an intervention in America, with the imprecations of the Yankee preachers, he stigmatises, in terms full of indignation, the late sermon of Brownlow, and asks if it is thus that people at New York imagine they are serving the cause of civilisation and humanity.

In the Patrie of yesterday, M. Aucaigne has called attention to the reports relative to the negotiations of peace to be opened in America between men of eminence of the North and of the South, and remarks that Mr. Greeley, one of the intended negotiators, was formerly a partisan of the doctrine of secession. The Moniteur has also noticed the same reports, to which the French press does not seem to attach great importance.

The Globe, a new journal, conducted by M. Hyppolite Castille, has devoted to the American question, in its Sunday number, a long and serious article, in which it demonstrates the daily increasing indifference of the Northern population, and strongly appreciates the policy adopted by Mr. Lincoln.

CONFEDERATE CAUSE IN LANCASHIRE.

FROM OUR OWN CORRESPONDENT.

Manchester: August 3, 1864.

So far as Lancashire and the adjoining counties are concerned, Lord Edward Howard spoke wondrously 'winged words' in the House of Commons on Thursday last, when he called the attention of Parliament to the great scandal known as 'emigration' to the United States. His Lordship's speech has found a prominent place in every respectable newspaper in these districts, while Unionist prints of the Rochdale Observer type have not dared to refer to it in terms other than those of reluctant praise. And it is gratifying to add, that probably the newspaper press will not have been without a powerful assistant in the good work of giving the utmost possible publicity to the noble Lord's timely and philanthropic warning. The Committee of the Southern Independence Association is considering the propriety of reproducing the speech in a more permanent form, with a view to issue copies of it, at intervals, by many thousands at a time, and with the certainty that they shall reach the households of the poor in every town and hamlet within the influence of that Institution. If, as no doubt will be the case, the Committee decides this question in the affirmative, Lord Edward Howard's speech will unquestionably have the richly-deserved benefit of a far wider, more sustained, and every way thorough publicity, than even the House of Commons, with all its manifest kindliness of feeling to the noble Lord, could have desired or anticipated for it.

It is to be hoped the Committee, with that discriminating zeal which has generally marked its operations, will be the more liberal of its attentions wherever there would appear to be grounds for suspecting the more serious need of them. Although there are scarcely half a dozen Unionist newspapers in the whole of the manufacturing districts, it is a deplorable fact that in their several localities they have achieved an amount of mischief out of all proportion to their number or their character. Those few journals have done their best (and happily, we may now say, their worst) to recruit the Northern armies by creating or increasing in our midst the very evil we all of us now seek to cure. Their columns were constantly open to any unscrupulous writer in Lancashire or New York, who, with or without a guilty complicity on the part of the journalists themselves, urged our able-bodied poor to seek a market for their labour in the United States. These letters, it is true, were noticeable for capricious orthography and grammar rather than for more certain symptoms of genuineness and truth. But they served their turn, nevertheless. Facts and figures were grossly misstated, wages were quoted at fictitious rates, and every low literary artifice of suggestion and suppression was resorted to, whereby our duped labourers might be lured to leave their homes and families and fight for Mr. Bright's idol. That the writers of these letters succeeded only too well in their infamous designs is testified by the sad array of facts set forth in Lord Edward Howard's speech, and by the obligation which all respectable newspapers and literary and political societies feel they ought to discharge by publishing and enforcing the warning of the noble Lord to the utmost of their ability.

The Manchester Guardian, in accepting its proportion of duty in this matter, has the following:—

> 'The obligation is especially incumbent on those who have facilities for addressing those sections of the population which are chiefly exposed by their necessities and temptations to the nefarious acts which entail such disappointment and misery on their victims. Our columns show frequently what bitter complaints come back from unfortunate men who have been decoyed from this neighbourhood. It was on the steps of the Manchester Exchange that the contract in one of the worst cases adduced by Lord Edward Howard was struck. We cannot hesitate to answer the appeal which these facts make upon ourselves. Let it be known, then, that able-bodied men who venture to cross the Atlantic just now in search of employment go to a land where all regard for law, right, and human freedom is temporarily suspended. It matters little whether they are tempted to quit their native country by a vague belief that work is abundant and wages high in America, or whether they form a contract before their departure for the performance of specified services at a certain rate of remuneration. They may not even intend to proceed to the United States at all, as in the case of the Manchester men above alluded to, who bargained to go to Canada, and were only told after the steamer sailed that New York was to be taken on the way. The probable fate of the immigrant as soon as he reaches American territory is the same. . . . It is, of course, impossible to establish any direct connection between these disgraceful outrages and the Government of Washington. It would argue a very improbable degree of indiscretion and clumsiness on the part of Mr. Stanton if he could be proved to have afforded any encouragement to the mercenary scoundrels who labour so assiduously in his service at New York. It is to be remarked, however, that while the Government are as profuse as can be desired in expressions of disapproval of these practices, they refuse to take the only course by which the nefarious system is likely to be impeded.'

The Manchester Examiner, the great Unionist organ in these districts, also does its duty by Lord Edward Howard's speech, but 'with a difference.' The officials at New York and Washington, according to that journal, are as sincere as we ourselves in sympathising with our unfortunate emigrants, and no less indignant than ourselves at the cajolery that has landed them in the United States. Referring to one of the most notorious cases of wholesale kidnapping, the Examiner not only acquits the United States Government even of connivance at the transaction, but adds, 'The speculators were publicly denounced, and a subscription was raised for the benefit of the victims. This is enough to show that the people of America have no sympathy with such doings. In many cases the police have not been free from blame, for it is pretty clear that they have connived at the tricks of the recruiting agents, but there can be no doubt that the Government has done, and is still doing, its best to check a scandal which it is impossible wholly to prevent.'

All who have been interesting themselves down here in advocating the Confederate cause have read with much amusement the curiously infelicitous statement of the hon. member for Leicester (Mr. P. Taylor), that, in his opinion, so far as public meetings were a guide, the majority of the people still sided with the North. Mr. Taylor is perhaps none the worse representative of Leicester for not being a Leicestershire man, but he was scarcely aware that a Leicestershire man was sitting opposite who could so happily and authoritatively refute him. But Lord John Manners, in setting the hon. gentleman right, might have gone much farther than by reminding him that one of the most enthusiastic Confederate demonstrations that ever took place occurred in the very city so funnily misrepresented by Mr. P. Taylor. He might have added that the bankers, merchants, magistrates, and others of the gentry, including some of the most influential of Mr. Taylor's constituents, took a leading part in the proceedings; and that resolutions were passed, and signed by the chairman, and forwarded to Parliament, affirming that the Confederacy had achieved its independence; and, in the opinion of the citizens of Leicester, Her Majesty's Government ought to recognise the fact.

A NORTHERN ACCOUNT OF THE LATE CONFEDERATE EXPEDITION.

(From the Philadelphia Age.)

The Confederate expedition into Maryland is over, and its history can now be written. The number of men engaged was about 15,000—no more. They were divided into two bodies. They came up the Shenandoah Valley, and one body attacked Martinsburg, whilst the other besieged Harper's Ferry. Martinsburg was captured, and stores amounting to three millions of dollars carried off. The column then crossed the Potomac at Williamsport, and by skilful manœuvring forced Sigel upon Maryland Heights. The Confederate column at Harper's Ferry besieged Sigel for four days, whilst the other column overran Western Maryland as far as the Monocacy. Hagerstown was captured and a contribution levied. Thousands from the Cumberland Valley in Pennsylvania, and many people in York and Adams counties, left their homes. The harvest was ungathered and spoiling. The authorities at Washington became frightened and sent to Grant for help. He detached Ricketts with a division of troops, who arrived in Baltimore, and were sent to the Monocacy to aid General Wallace. The arrival of Ricketts and Wallace changed the Confederate plans somewhat. Their troops abandoned Hagerstown and marched against Frederick. The siege of Maryland Heights was raised, and its assailants, marching down the south bank of the Potomac, sent a flanking party across the river at Point of Rocks. It marched up the Monocacy. Wallace was surprised and defeated. He lost six cannon and many prisoners. He ordered a hasty retreat towards Baltimore. The Administration became more frightened, and the North was in consternation. Sigel was relieved from command, and his troops, without a leader, could do nothing. The Confederates captured Frederick, and followed Wallace's retreat. From Martinsburg eastward they tore up the Baltimore and Ohio railroad. Wallace withdrew to Ellicott's Mills, but the Confederates, after tearing up the railroad, sent their main body south of it, and detached a cavalry force towards the Northern Central Railroad. Washington appeared to be in imminent peril, and the Administration hurried forward reinforcements. The 19th Army Corps, under General Reynolds, which had been sent for is a reinforcement for Grant, was entering the mouth of the Chesapeake. It was at once ordered to Washington. One corps of Grant's army—the 6th, under Wright—was detached from the lines before Petersburg and sent to Washington. General Wallace, in Baltimore, was superseded by General Ord. The Confederate cavalry expedition overran all Eastern Maryland. Twenty-five miles of the Northern Central Railroad were destroyed, and the Philadelphia Railroad was severely injured. The cavalry, loaded with plunder, came within six miles of Baltimore, and returned to the Confederate main body. The main body was then busily engaged in coming to the south bank of the Potomac at and near Edwards Ferry. A strong force had been sent towards Washington to guard against surprise. Part of it halted in front of Fort Stevens, on Seventh Street. Part marched towards Bladensburg and cut the telegraph to Baltimore, but did not injure the railroad. The Confederate outposts made a great show, and frightened the people in Washington, but they made no attacks. There was heavy skirmishing, in which the Federal loss was about three hundred. Meantime, the Confederate main body was taking an immense amount of plunder to the south side of the Potomac. On Tuesday morning it got safely over. The outposts were called in. Bladensburg and Washington suddenly found themselves without an enemy. The Confederate rear crossed to the south bank of the Potomac and the expedition was over. It cost the North an immense sum, and caused one of the greatest panics ever witnessed. By the diversion of forty thousand men from General Grant, it may have saved Petersburg.

We shall doubtless incur the pity and contempt of superfine readers by frankly avowing that we like a sensational novel. To be dull, or at least to seem dull, is necessary for any one who desires to be received into society that claims to be genteel. If a clergyman preaches extemporary sermons or reads sermons with sufficient elocutionary power to check the coughing of his congregation, he may have a full church, but in genteel circles he will be looked upon as a very inferior and vulgar sort of person. A genteel clergyman sends his congregation to sleep. In the House of Commons, if a young member ventures to express any sentiment of patriotism that assumes national honour to be a thing worth fighting for and sacrificing for—if he expresses a conviction that national might ought to be ready to defend right—he is laughed at as visionary, the members retire to dine or smoke, and the reporters take a rest whilst he is speaking. If a contributor, fresh from the University, prepares an article that contains some generous sentiments, he is admonished by the editor that that kind of thing will not go down with the public. In short, nothing is so vulgar as to be in any way sensational. Dramatic critics bemoan the decay of taste because people flock to see such a drama as the 'Colleen Bawn,' though we think it must be admitted, prejudice apart, that that drama is quite as good as the play of 'The Miller and his Men' which delighted our forefathers. And so it is with novels. If an author does not wish to be cut by the élite of Rotten Row, he must sedulously observe the dignity of dulness. He must eschew anything like an exciting plot. He must be careful that his work is not more impressive than the conversation with which a genteel couple while away the dreary time they are walking through, not dancing, a quadrille. It is true that these dull novels do not sell so well as sensational novels. Superfine gentility is not popular. Novels are read for amusement, and there is no amusement in wading through a three-volume sermon. We venture to say that 'Velvet Lawn' will, in spite of its being essentially a sensation novel, be read with interest even by those who are the professed worshippers of dulness.

The plot of 'Velvet Lawn' is exceedingly well conceived, and the interest never flags. Moreover, the events are so well linked together, that if any one impatient to know the fate of the heroine should skip from the first to the last chapters, it would be necessary to a proper understanding of the dénouement to turn back and read the tale through from the beginning. We do not intend to give a résumé of the plot, for that would neither be fair to author nor reader. We may, however, remark that whilst Lilian, the heroine, passes through a terrible ordeal, virtue is at last triumphant. Though the story turns upon a horrible murder, the deed of blood is not paraded needlessly, and the circumstantial evidence against the heroine seems formidable even to the reader who feels assured of her innocence. We ought also to observe that 'Velvet Lawn' does not entirely depend upon its startling incidents, and that the characters are very well defined, and are true to life. It would, of course, be easy to pick out some faults, for such a work can hardly escape blemishes; but we content ourselves with recommending 'Velvet Lawn' as a very good story very well told, and we are confident that those who read it on our recommendation will not be disappointed.

Federal Outrages.—The Richmond Correspondent of the Times, writing on July 5, says: 'In burning words of eloquent censure Mr. Motley has held up to our loathing the horrible cruelty of Alva and the bigoted tyranny of his master. Yet Mr. Motley is the complacent and contented servant of a Republic which, in the name of liberty, encourages enormities as repugnant to the civilised warfare of the 19th century as were Philip II.'s outrages, in the name of religion, to the moral sense of the 16th. I do not mean that throats are cut indiscriminately as they were by Alva, although many a dark tale of cupidity and assassination has issued from the forests and by-ways of Virginia. I could, were it not as distasteful to me to write as it is to your readers to learn such gloomy horrors, accumulate evidence substantiating the occurrence of many such murders of civilians in cold blood beyond refutation. Nor, again, do I assert that women are stripped and forced to run races in the presence of a licentious soldiery, as in the days of the brutal Duke of Cumberland. But I do mean to assert—and I challenge contradiction of this statement—that outrages such as my pen must seek a periphrasis to describe, and of which white women are the object, have repeatedly occurred; that in a special degree the country called the northern neck of Virginia (lying between the Potomac and Rappahannock Rivers) has witnessed them again and again; that the African savage, stimulated by those white agents who give effect to Mr. Sumner's and Mrs. Beecher Stowe's theories, is the perpetrator of them, that I am in a position to mention not less than ten horrors which, during the last three months, have occurred in the county of Westmoreland alone and which are unsurpassed in atrocity by the most loathsome records of modern or ancient warfare.

AFFAIRS FINANCIAL AND COMMERCIAL.

Wednesday Evening.

MONEY AND DISCOUNT MARKET.

There has been rather [illegible] in the money market during the past week. The demand both at the Bank and in the open market is just now [illegible] the usual terms [illegible] by the brokers are from 7 to 7½ per cent. It is not expected, however, that the Bank rate will at present be further advanced. Nevertheless, it appears to be generally admitted that the harvest will be bad and the payments for cotton for Egypt heavy, and these, together with the [illegible] of the Indian exchanges, may at no distant period [illegible] influence the value of money. There have been rumours of the patching up of a peace in America, but they are [illegible]. If any sudden termination of the war [illegible] place, there would be a strong demand for accommodation in [illegible] of the reopening of trade. The Joint-Stock Banks are charging 7 per cent. for their advances, [illegible] the terms for short loans rule from 5½ to 6 per cent. after having been 7 to 8 per cent.

BULLION AND SPECIE MOVEMENTS.

The market for bullion and specie has for the last week been very inanimate. The late rise in the value of money has for a time entirely stopped the withdrawals of gold from the Bank, but at the same time all the arrivals are immediately purchased for transhipment, so that nothing is sent into the establishment. There is not much gold expected to arrive at present; consequently the movements must continue restricted. The only arrivals this week 341,000*l.*, by the Atrato, from the West Indies, and 5,000*l.* from America. The specie to be taken out by the Poonah for the East is only 37,189*l.*, of which 4,500*l.* is in gold, and 32,650*l.*, in silver, which will be appropriated as follows—viz., 60*l.*, gold, and 100*l.*, silver, to Alexandria; 3,000*l.* to Galle, 1,479*l.*, gold and 20,000*l.*, silver, to Madras, 2,650*l.*, silver, to Penang, 9,250*l.*, silver, to Yokohama, and 650*l.*, silver, to Foo-chow-foo. The silver market has been rather more active, the fine bar brought by the West India packet, which was only a small quantity, has been sold at 61⅝*d.* per oz. Some other large sales have also been effected, at as nearly as possible the same quotation. There have been no transactions of consequence in Mexican dollars, and the price is nominally as before.

HOME AND FOREIGN SECURITIES.

The English Stock Market has not been at all active during the week, the dealers showing but little disposition to do business. Nothing, however, of importance has occurred to cause depression in prices, but still the tendency is towards a further depression. Consols closed this evening at 89¾ to 89⅞ for money, and 89⅞ to 90 for the account, which is a decline, as compared with this day week, of about ½ per cent. Exchequer Bills have become very heavy, the present price for both the March and June issues being 20*s.* to 10*s.* dis. There has been more animation exhibited in the Foreign Stock Market, and prices generally have improved. To-day the great feature in this department has been some extensive operations, accompanied by a considerable rise, in Spanish stocks, in consequence of the rumour of a new loan for 12,000,000*l.* being about to be brought out forthwith. The rise in the Passives has been 2½ per cent., and in the Certificates of 1⅞ per cent. Mexican have also improved ½ per cent., and Turkish to about the same extent. The closing quotations this evening were, Greek at 23⅞ to 24⅛; Mexican, 29¼ to 29⅝; Spanish Passives, 30⅝ to 30⅞; ditto Certificates, 11¼ to 11½; Turkish Six per Cents. of 1854, 90 to 91; and those of 1862, 69¾ to 70¼.

CONFEDERATE COTTON LOAN.

The market is not active, and prices are slightly lower. On rumour of the capture of Atlanta, coupled with realisation of profits by 'bulls,' we close 75 to 76.

AMERICAN SECURITIES.

Business in American Government and Railway Securities appears for the time to be almost entirely neglected. The unsettled state of affairs across the Atlantic, and the unfavourable nature of the news with regard to the progress of the war on the part of the Federals, offering no inducement either to speculate or purchase for investments. Notwithstanding the absence of business, however, prices are very fairly supported. The only transactions recorded during the week have been in Virginia State 6 per Cent. Stock, at 30; Atlantic and Great Western Railway, Pennsylvania Section, at 74¼ and 74; Illinois Central, $100 shares, $90 paid, 45, 44½, 43½, 42¾, 42¼, and 43 dis.; and ditto ditto, all paid, 54, 51¾, 51, 53, and 53½.

RAILWAY SECURITIES.

There has been a moderate business transacted in British Railway Shares, and in the great majority of cases prices have advanced, but this has been mainly caused by the rather favourable dividends announced by some of the leading lines to be declared at the approaching half-yearly meetings. The advance in North-Eastern has been 3 per cent., on the Berwick, Leeds, and York lines respectively. There has also been an improvement of 2 per cent. in Lancashire and Yorkshire and Vale of Neath; of 1¼ per cent. in London and North-Western; of 1 per cent. in Blackwall, London and Brighton, Midland; ditto Birmingham and Derby, North British and West Cornwall; and of ½ per cent. in Caledonian, Great Western, London and South-Western, and Edinburgh, Perth, and Dundee. On the other hand, there has been a decline of 1½ per cent. in Great Northern. There has not been so much animation in the market for Foreign Railway Shares, but prices remain steady. Shares in British Possessions have been slightly more inquired after; prices, however, show but little variation.

TENDERS FOR BILLS ON INDIA.

The biddings for 30,00,000 rupees in bills on India, took place to-day at the Bank of England. The proportions allotted were, to Calcutta, 17,74,000 rupees; to Bombay, 12,00,000 rupees; and to Madras, 26,000 rupees. The minimum price was as before, 1*s.* 11½*d.* per rupee on Calcutta and Madras, and 1*s.* 11¾*d.* on Bombay. The applications within the limits amounted to 238 lacs. Tenders on Calcutta and Madras at 1*s.* 11⅞*d.*, will receive about 23 per cent.; on Bombay at 2*s.* 0½*d.*, about 85 per cent. These were the highest prices tendered.

MERCANTILE SUSPENSION.

The suspension has been announced of Messrs. Corpi, Braggiotti & Co., of Austin Friars, engaged in the Greek trade. The liabilities, it is believed, will not exceed 20,000*l.* The accounts are being prepared by Messrs. Hart Brothers, & Co., preparatory to a general meeting of the creditors.

MEETINGS OF PUBLIC COMPANIES, ETC.

At the half-yearly meeting of the Bank of Wales the balance sheet presented showed that the gross profit for the three months, including [illegible] brought forward from the last account, was [illegible], and that after deducting salaries, &c., there remained a balance of [illegible], out of which it was recommended that a dividend should be declared at the rate of [illegible] per cent. per annum free of income tax, and that a balance of [illegible] should be carried forward to the current account. The report was adopted.—At the annual meeting of the London, Birmingham, and South Staffordshire Bank a dividend was declared at the rate of [illegible] per cent. per annum. [illegible] Hotel Company at their half-yearly meeting declared a dividend at the rate of [illegible] per cent. per annum.—The [illegible] Trust Company at their usual meeting have declared a dividend at the rate of [illegible] per cent. per annum.—The Commercial Bank Corporation held their annual ordinary meeting to-day, when it appeared that the net profit in June [illegible] was [illegible], and out of this sum the directors proposed a dividend of [illegible] on each original share, being at the rate of twelve per cent. per annum on the capital so [illegible]. They also recommended that [illegible] should be placed towards the reduction of preliminary expenses and [illegible] towards the formation of a reserve fund, leaving a balance to be carried forward of [illegible]. The report was unanimously adopted.—At the half-yearly meeting to-day of the City of London Brewery Company the report was adopted and an interim dividend of [illegible] per cent. for the half-year was declared.—The [illegible] Warehouse Company (late [illegible] and Co.) have held their first meeting to-day, when a dividend of [illegible] per share was declared.—The half-yearly meeting of the [illegible] and International Telegraph Company has also been held to-day, when it was shown that the gross revenue of the company for the half-year amounted to [illegible], and was in excess of that for the corresponding period of [illegible] by the sum of [illegible], and the net revenue after meeting all necessary provisions, was [illegible], out of which the directors recommended a dividend of [illegible] per cent. for the half-year. That appropriation would absorb [illegible], and leave a balance of [illegible] to be carried to the reserve fund, which would then stand at [illegible]. The report was unanimously agreed to.

PROGRESS OF ENTERPRISE.

The prospectus has been issued of the Manchester Shipping Offices and Packing Company, with a capital of [illegible], in 10,000 shares of 10*l.* each. The object of the undertaking is the erection of shipping offices and warehouses of superior character for the rapid and prompt despatch of goods to foreign markets. A very eligible and extensive site for the erection of the buildings has been secured in the immediate neighbourhood of the Manchester Royal Exchange and Post Office, and within an easy distance of the goods stations of the London and North-Western and Lancashire and Yorkshire Railways. Arrangements have also been made for the purchase of the business of Mr. J. Y. Wilkinson, packer, who will also give his services to the Company.—The Cornish Tin Mining Company are seeking to raise a capital of 36,000*l.* in 12,000 shares of 3*l.* each, for the purpose of working a property in the St. Austell district, for which the official reports of engineers and others are regarded as very favourable.—The London Engineering and Iron Ship Building Company is another undertaking introduced by the Financial Corporation. The amount to be raised is [illegible] in shares of 50*l.* each. The object of the undertaking is the purchase of and carrying on the works of Messrs. Westwood, Baillie, & Co., shipbuilders and engineers, of London Yard, Millwall. The provisional agreement is to purchase the premises, plant, &c., partly in cash and partly in shares, but no dividend is to be paid on the latter till the shareholders shall have received a minimum dividend of 8 per cent. per annum. Both Mr. Westwood and Mr. Baillie join the board, and, if desired, will act as managers for some years at a moderate salary and commission, but for the first year their services will be gratuitous.—The prospectus of the London and General Water Purifying Company has been issued. The capital is to be 100,000*l.*, in 10,000 shares of 10*l.* each. The undertaking is started for the purpose of purchasing of Mr. F. H. [illegible] the patent of his filter and softening apparatus for purifying water direct from the cistern, to furnish houses in and about London and other populous places with the same on hire for a fixed rental, and to manufacture them or to grant licenses for their manufacture and sale.—The well-known and old-established Freemasons' Tavern, in Great Queen Street, is about to come into the hands of a Joint-Stock Company, for which it is proposed to raise a capital of 65,000*l.* in shares of 10*l.* each. The property and its connection with the great Masonic body is well known, but improvements are to be carried out which will make the establishment more available for general business purposes than it has hitherto been. The present lessee will take an active part in the management, and will retain a considerable interest in the company.—The New Laxey Mining Company is another new undertaking. The capital required, however, is small, only 18,000*l.*, in shares of 3*l.* each, and the object is to purchase and work the North Laxey Mine in the Isle of Man. The price to be paid for the property is 6,550*l.*, of which 5,900*l.* will be in shares with 2*l.* paid.—The Imperial Mercantile Credit Association and the Crédit Mobilier, invite subscriptions for the Merchant Shipping Company. The capital asked for is 1,000,000*l.*, in 20,000 shares of 50*l.* each; but the first issue is to be restricted to 10,000 shares. The object is to purchase the business founded by the late Mr. S. F. Somes and his brother, and continued by Messrs. Somes Brothers, the present vendors. These gentlemen take an interest of 100,000*l.* in the undertaking, and will also join the board of directors. The fleet consists of eighteen vessels, the whole of which are in active employment in the East India, China, and Australian trades. There are, in addition, large and commodious graving docks on the Thames at Poplar, with excellent working plant on the spot. The arrangements for the purchase are said to be exceedingly encouraging, and a moderate price has been fixed for the good-will, which will include all the accruing freights on the ships, work in the yard, &c. All the old officials will remain in the employ of the Company, so that that the business is not likely to suffer any delay whatever. The prospectus has likewise been issued of the Natal Investment Company with a capital of 500,000*l.*, in shares of 50*l.* each, of which one-half will be issued in the first instance. The objects of the undertaking are precisely the same as most of the existing trust and land companies.—The prospectus has been issued this evening of the Peninsular, West Indian, and Southern Bank (Limited), with a proposed capital of 2,000,000*l.*, in 20,000 shares of 100*l.* each, with power to increase. The trade between this country and the Northern States, and parts of South America, has, the directors state, been amply provided for, but there remains the trade of the West Indies still requiring accommodation, and the enormous trade of the Southern States is totally without provision. It is to supply this long-felt want that the present institution has been established, and it is proposed, therefore, to commence banking business immediately at St. Thomas, Bermuda, Nassau, and Liverpool, in which places a very large and profitable business may be effected, and in the articles of association power is given to open branches or agencies at Panama, Granada, Venezuela, Guayana, &c., should such appear to the directors to be desirable.—Another prospectus issued this evening is that of the Connecting Ship Owners (Limited), with a capital of 1,000,000*l*. in 50,000 shares of 20*l*. each. The Company is formed for the purpose of working steamships constructed on the connecting system patented by Mr. Thomas M'Sweney, and an exclusive license to use which for carriage of freight on the rivers Thames and Seine has been granted to the Company by special agreement.

THE COURSE OF THE PRODUCE MARKETS.

A want of animation still prevails in the markets for nearly every description of produce, the uncertainty that is felt in reference to the future course of monetary affairs inducing traders generally to conduct their operations upon the most cautious policy. Buyers enter upon engagements only as induced by actual and pressing orders, and although importers as a rule avoid overburdening the markets with supplies, still instances occur at which lower prices are accepted, especially where the transactions are for immediate cash. Arrivals have again been of some extent, and have checked the diminution that was going on in stocks, which are in most instances ample for general requirements, although not in all cases equal to those of last year at this time. Meanwhile the deliveries from warehouse progress satisfactorily, and evidence a healthy state of trade generally. The grain markets have been affected by the early announcement of the harvest; and although estimates of the ultimate crop are not increased, prices of both English and foreign wheats have receded 1*s*. to 2*s*. per quarter. The provision trades are quiet, but with steady prices for most articles. American cheese is relatively in good demand at 54*s*. to 56*s*., but inferior grades are neglected. Bacon of prime mild cure is firmly held; barrel middles are, however, a slow sale. American hams are difficult to quit. For petroleum the enquiry is less active and prices easier, 2*s*. 2*d*. per gallon having been accepted for American refined on the spot, and 2*s*. 3*d*. for the last three months' delivery. For crude the price remains at 19*l*. per tun. Linseed oil has receded to 37*s*. 6*d*., sellers' production having been much increased by the advance in the value of cake, which is now quoted 10*l*. to 10*l*. 10*s*. for American barrels, and 9*l*. 5*s*. to 9*l*. 15*s*. for bags. Rape oil maintains its value; sperm continues extremely dull of sale, and 68*l*. is the highest quotation. Cocoa-nut oil is more in demand for export, but not at higher prices. Tallow is firm at the advance established last week, the scarcity of cattle feed being against the ultimate supply of home make. Dye stuffs generally are very firm, but for cochineal prices have gone irregularly, without altering previous quotations. Russian hemp is easier to buy, and Manilla unsaleable except at lower rates. In spices but little is passing. Sugar has further declined 6*d*. to 1*s*. per cwt., and the market is still without any indication of improvement. Coffee is also the turn cheaper. In other artices transactions are of very limited extent, and without any variation in price worth naming.

Liverpool, Wednesday, August 3.—Although there has been a fair average demand for cotton during the greater part of the week, the market has shown less animation than of late, and the general tendency of prices is downwards. The arrivals on the whole have been tolerably fair, and a general expectation is entertained that for some little time the supplies will be rather better. The sales this week have been 33,000 bales, of which 9,000 have been taken on speculation and for export. The total sales this year so far, have been 1,659,830 bales; and to the same period in 1863, 1,232,660 bales. There have been imported this year 1,299,460 bales, against 817,510 bales last year. The trade have taken this year 1,023,596 bales, whilst in 1863 the number was 687,290 bales. The exports this year have been 326,341 bales, and in 1863 they were 264,872 bales. There have been taken on speculation this year 290,102 bales, last year the number was 274,930 bales. The estimated stocks at the present time are 238, 201 bales, whilst in 1863 they were 256,420 bales. The latest quotations this afternoon were for American descriptions, 29¾*d*. to 31*d*.; Pernambuco, 30¾*d*. to 32½*d*.; Maceio, 30*d*. to 30½*d*.; Bahia, 29¾*d*. to 30¼*d*.; Egyptian, 29½*d*. to 36½*d*.; Smyrna, 22¾*d*. to 25¾*d*.; Surats, 15½*d*. to 27¾*d*.; Bengal, 16¾*d*. to 17½*d*.; Scinde, 17*d*. to 17¼*d*.; China, 18¼*d*. to 21*d*.; Japan, 22*d*. to 23*d*.; and Peruvian, 31½*d*. to 32*d*. The advices just to hand from Hong Kong announce that the exports of cotton from China for the month of May were 57,819, and for the season, from June 1, 1863, 668,629 bales.

The markets at Manchester have been remarkably quiet within the last few days, and scarcely anything was doing, in consequence of the rumours that negotiations were in progress in America for the re-establishment of peace; but the accounts by the last mail, however, have completely dissipated any such idea, and seem again inclined to proceed with business as usual, and the market for shipping yarns has in consequence again become rather buoyant, some considerable orders having been given out in yarns for Russia and for the better class of yarns at very full prices. There is now also a fair business doing for Germany, and extreme rates are being paid for all the better classes of yarns. A few sales, however, have been made of some of the commoner qualities at a slight decline. In home trade yarns there is very little doing, but prices nevertheless remain firm. The cloth market has been and still continues very quiet, but there has been, if anything, a little more doing within the last day or two; manufacturers, however, declined to reduce their pretensions, in consequence of the lowness of stocks, and the belief that a greater demand must speedily spring up. The general quotations of last week are unaltered.

Passports Required for the Federal States.—The Federal vice-consul at Liverpool has given publicity to the following circular, received by him from the Department of State of the United States:—'United States' Consulate, Tower Buildings South, Water Street, Liverpool, August 2, 1864.—Consuls are required to apprise all persons hereafter embarking at their respective ports, excepting emigrants who propose to take up their abode in the country, that they must provide themselves with passports, if foreigners, from the proper foreign authority; or, if citizens of the United States, from a minister; or, if there is no minister of the United States in the country, from a consul of the United States abroad, or, from this department, to be endorsed by the United States minister, or by the consul at the port of embarkation. Persons arriving at a port of the United States without such passport and endorsement will be liable to be subjected to examination concerning their characters and their purposes in coming to the United States. This regulation will go into effect in regard to persons arriving from a foreign port after a reasonable time shall have elapsed for it to become known at such port.'

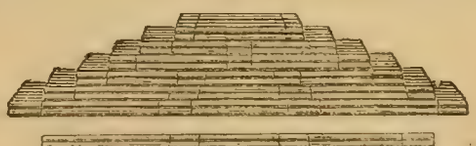
DUNCAN'S PATENT RATAN CANE SPLINTS.


THESE Splints are introduced and recommended to the Faculty for the great advantages which they possess above others,—viz., their comfort, coolness, and durability, as well as the facility with which they may be applied to the fractured limb.
As cleanliness is an important consideration, these Splints possess that quality pre-eminently, as they may be readily washed without the slightest fear of injury.
They are especially adapted to the constant usage of the General Hospital, and the movements of an Army on Service, as they cannot easily be injured. For Colonial practice they are recommended for the same reason.
They have been submitted to, and have received the approbation of, the Principal Medical Officers of the Army Medical Department.
The Splints cannot be injured by moisture; and are manufactured either with or without pads.

OFFICIAL REPORT OF GENERAL HOOD.

The glorious news from northern Georgia absorbed public attention on Saturday and yesterday; the city was lively with delightful excitement; and even the grim savans, who affect to see an almost interminable war, grew buoyant with hope. The fate of Sherman, and its bearing upon the result of the general campaign and the war, was liberally discussed; and it was generally accepted that, should the effect of Hood's initiatory engagements be sustained and culminate in a decisive victory, no fears, not even doubts, need be entertained as to the result of the campaign in Virginia. Grant, having expended the force of numbers at his command in vain, strategic force may then be employed by him to about the same purpose. The following is the official dispatch of General Hood:—

Atlanta, July 22—10·30 P.M.

Hon. Secretary of War:

The army shifted its position fronting on Peachtree Creek last night, and Stewart's and Cheatham's Corps formed line of battle around the city. Hardee's Corps made a night march and attacked the enemy's extreme left to-day at one o'clock, and drove him from his works, capturing sixteen pieces of artillery and five stands of colours. Cheatham attacked the enemy at four o'clock, P.M. with a portion of his command, and drove the enemy, capturing six pieces of artillery. During the engagement we captured about 2,000 prisoners.

Wheeler's Cavalry routed the enemy in the neighbourhood of Decatur, capturing his camps. Our loss is not fully ascertained. Major-General Walker, killed; Brigadier-Generals Smith, Gist and Mercer, wounded. Prisoners report M'Pherson killed. Our troops fought with great gallantry.

J. B. HOOD, General.

THE PRESS DESPATCHES.

Atlanta, Ga., July 22, 1864.

About two o'clock this afternoon the enemy attacked our left, under General Stewart, with great vigour. They were received with a galling fire from both artillery and infantry, which caused them to falter, when the order was given to charge.

Among their killed was General Macpherson, who was shot through the heart; Brigadier-General Giles A. Smith, and (the Yankee) General Hood. General Gresham lost a leg.

Our troops left their breastworks and charged with great rapidity, driving the enemy from two lines of entrenchments and inflicting great slaughter, capturing a large number of prisoners and 22 pieces of artillery.

General Hardee, having passed round the enemy's flank, is now in their rear, doing great execution.

The fighting still continues.

SECOND DESPATCH.

Atlanta, July 23, 1864.

General Wheeler, last evening, attacked the enemy's left, in the neighbourhood of Decatur, and drove them back, capturing 500 wagons, with supplies, and a large number of prisoners. He is still pursuing.

There was very little firing after dark yesterday.

Two thousand prisoners, including 75 commissioned officers, 25 pieces of artillery, and 7 stands of colours, have been brought in.

The losses on either side are not yet known. Ours was severe in officers.

Comparative quiet reigns this morning. There is some little skirmishing on our left.

EXCITEMENT IN RICHMOND.

(From the Richmond Enquirer, July 25.)

The news of the victory at Atlanta, which the telegraph brought to Richmond on last Saturday, delighted the public as much as any that has been received during the war; it caused a general joy throughout the city, and will carry the same to all quarters of the country. General Hood has signalised his acceptance of the command of the army of Tennessee with a brilliant victory, and justified his selection by success, the highest evidence of its propriety. The tide has turned, the army has faced about, and the strategy of advance takes the place over that of retreat. The initiative of attack has at last been taken by our army, and its prestige and morale wrested from the enemy. General Hood has turned upon the enemy, and been successful. It is impossible to convey any idea of the gratification which the news of this victory caused. The press despatch was at first doubted. So often had the community been elated by first news from that army, only to be disappointed by subsequent intelligence, that men hesitated to believe what they read; but soon the official dispatch of General Hood dispelled all doubt, and the public felt that a change had not only taken place in commanders, but that a new policy had been successfully inaugurated, that may lead to recovery of all that has been lost, and eventually carry our victorious banners into the territories of our enemy.

General Hood was known to be a man ever ready to fight, and his appointment was regarded as practical orders to take no steps backward. It was felt that he might be defeated; but it was believed that he would not retreat without first trying the ordeal of battle. He has justified the confidence of the President. He has fought a battle within the first week of his command, and won an important victory. Of the completeness of this victory, at the time of writing, nothing is known; but the army is now, notwithstanding its losses, much stronger than before it measured strength with its adversary. The attack was made, not received; the enemy were driven, not repulsed. These terms are now to be applied to the battles of the army of Tennessee. General Hood, we believe, is not the man to rest satisfied with even attacking and driving the enemy. He will follow up his advantages, and now, that he has broken up the old policy of that army, he will, he must press on, and cease not to drive the enemy back and eventually out of Georgia.

Light breaks from the only dark point in our lines. Atlanta is now felt to be safe, and Georgia will soon be free from the foe. The central army of the Confederacy has recovered its prestige and defeated the exultant enemy.

LETTER FROM RICHMOND.

FROM OUR OWN CORRESPONDENT.

RICHMOND: July 5, 1864.

THE 'HOPES' OF THE NORTH—GRANT'S INVESTMENT OF RICHMOND—THE YANKEE RAID ON THE SOUTHERN RAILROADS—HOW THE NEGROES ARE TREATED—THE PROSPECTS OF GRANT—HOW THE FEDERALS HAVE WAGED WAR—THE ALLEGED CONFEDERATE CRUELTY AT CHARLESTON—SOCIAL LIFE IN RICHMOND—THE COST OF A MINT JULEP.

I DARE say there are readers of THE INDEX in England who are apprehensive, from the accounts which have reached them in the Northern papers, that the capital of the Confederate States is at this moment in the possession of the enemy, and who have distressing doubts that the national anniversary yesterday—the good old Fourth of July, celebrated for more than eighty years with abundant fireworks and spread-eagle orations—was observed by Grant in Richmond with salvoes of artillery (blank cartridges) and every demonstration of noisy and hilarious patriotism. I read the other day with no little concern, in the New York Herald, that the Yankees were in Petersburg, and that they would come over by rail to Richmond in a very few days, whereupon gold had gone up most perversely ten per cent. in Wall Street, malgré the pleasant announcement that 'the beginning of the end' was at hand.

The investment of Richmond by Grant is one of the most remarkable military performances in the annals of warfare. If you will look upon one of the cheap maps of the seat of war in Virginia—which I think it likely are hanging up by dozens in the shop-windows of Piccadilly—and trace the circle of twenty-five miles' distance from the capital, you will find that Grant has established his lines along about a sextant of the same, and yet he claims to have completely invested us, which reminds one of the old story of the Irishman who took six prisoners at one time by surrounding them, with this notable difference, that Teddy actually accomplished his capture, whereas Grant is as far as ever from the realisation of the hopes of the Yankees. The baffled Ulysses may indeed say, in the language of his great namesake as rendered by Tennyson (with a slight variation)—

> I am a part of all that I have met,
> And all experience is an arch where thro'
> Gleams that untaken town whose margin fades
> For ever and for ever as I move.

Coming gravely to consider the chances of Grant's ultimate success, we cannot fail to believe that everything depends upon the ability of the Confederates to keep open the line of communication with the South. Not the most deluded of the Yankees entertains the idea that he will attempt to carry the inner line of entrenchments at Petersburg by storm. His plan is to starve out the supposed already famishing defenders of the two Virginian towns. With this view he sent a large cavalry force to cut the two railways which connect Richmond and Petersburg with North Carolina, and the South Side Road, which forms the connection of both places with Lynchburg. This force, amounting to five thousand men, under command of General Wilson, crossed the Weldon Road near Belfield, thirty miles south of Petersburg, tearing up the track and burning a bridge, whence they moved rapidly to Burkeville, the point of intersection of the Danville and Lynchburg Railways, arriving there at midnight of the 22nd ultimo. The damage they did to the Lynchburg line was inconsiderable, and can be repaired at slight expense; but the Danville line suffered much greater mischief. The purpose of General Wilson was to destroy the road utterly from Burkeville to its south-western terminus, an extent of more than ninety miles; but, after proceeding some distance in his work of demolition, he encountered a very serious and unexpected resistance at the Staunton (or Roanoke) River, the bridge across which stream was defended by a body of five or six hundred Confederates, who completely repulsed the raiders. Thenceforward their only object was to get back safely to the main body of the Federal army, with the opima spolia of their raid, the latter consisting of everything portable that they could find in the mansions that lay in their route, a miscellaneous heap of silk dresses and silver plate, pictures, porcelains, pigs, poultry, &c., &c., and a melancholy dark procession of negroes, who were driven off from their homes at the point of the bayonet and the end of the cowhide. Wilson successfully emulated his compatriot raiders of Mississippi in the wanton outrages he committed on non-combatant citizens, and the atrocious cruelty with which he treated the captured slaves. Sherman caused all the weak negroes who were unable to keep up with his retreating columns from Meridian to Vicksburg to be knocked in the head, and all the babies that proved troublesome to be thrown into the creeks and ponds in the track of his flight. In like manner Wilson dispatched his dusky captives, young and old, whenever they were discovered to be impedimenta on the march. It is stated upon competent authority that many dead bodies of negro infants were seen on the road by which the raiders retraced their steps to Grant's camp, the mothers having been compelled to throw the brats away as soon as the burden of carrying them caused lagging behind or straggling from the ranks. But Wilson's return to headquarters was embarrassed more seriously than by the difficulty of taking off his plunder. He was harassed for more than two days by Hampton's cavalry, fresh from successful combats with Sheridan on the north side of James River, and when he attempted to recross the Weldon railway by the only road left open to him, he was vigorously opposed by the infantry division of General Mahone, which has so often heretofore given a good account of itself, and which cut the raiding party to pieces, taking twelve hundred prisoners, a large wagon train, stores, ammunition, carbines, horses, thirteen pieces of artillery, and many negroes utterly broken down and rejoicing to escape from their newly-acquired liberty.

So much has Grant effected in the way of interrupting the communication between Richmond and the South. The injury done to the Danville railway is not slight, and will require a fortnight for repair. Ordinarily, in time of peace, two months would have been necessary. But General Lee has organised a large and effective force for relaying the track of railroads that have been destroyed. He might easily cause the Weldon Road to be put in working order in forty-eight hours, but this is not deemed desirable at the present juncture, because Grant's troops are so near to it in their entrenched position that it might be cut and torn up again at any moment.

It follows from what has been said of the two Southern lines, and what has been narrated of the mischief done to them by the enemy, that Grant has certainly not closed the avenues to Richmond from the south and west, and that he is likely to be not only 'all the summer,' but all the autumn and all the winter, in effecting the reduction of the capital—if, indeed, he is not compelled to abandon the attempt before the Presidential election. For the time of the Presidential election (the first week of November) coincides very nearly with the annual visitation of the frost at Bermuda Hundreds and the regions round about, and between this fifth day of July and that date there are to elapse just four months of malaria and disease for all who remain therein. Ague and fever, deadly allies, General Grant, to fight against you, and a most unequal contest in which the dead will be all on one side; call up your commissary to the assistance of your medical purveyor, load your caissons with calomel and your quartermaster's wagons with quinine, give out rations of febrifuge at reveillée, and administer pills upon the dress parade.

Ah me! I hear some excellent reader declare that this is very ghastly pleasantry, and marvel at the demoralisation of war which makes a naturally amiable man, as is your correspondent, contemplate with satisfaction the pestilence that walketh in darkness, as it comes to sweep off hundreds of his fellow-beings. Are they fellow-beings? Have they not placed themselves out of the pale of humanity? In the very inception of the struggle, they proposed to cut the levees of the Mississippi river, and drown out the inhabitants of the lower valley like rats; they made medicines contraband of war, and entertained with delight the prospect of thousands of 'rebels,' without regard to age or sex, dying yearly of typhus because of the impossibility of procuring the drugs for its successful treatment. At a later period they strove to incite a servile insurrection to work out that destruction of the South which they could not accomplish by their arms; and they have ever since acted consistently with the purpose of extermination in the fell spirit of the savage. Why need I refer to the bombardment of Charleston, carried on for no military object, but in the gratification of malice pur et simple, during fourteen months, or to the more recent bombardment of Petersburg, commenced without warning, in violation of every rule of honourable warfare, the first victim of which was a young and lovely girl to whom, in common with many thousands of her sex, no opportunity of escape had been afforded? You have seen Sherman's letter; it has doubtless found its way into the journals of London, and caused honest Englishmen to blush that it was written in their language. Cela suffit.

And yet these ruffians raised a great clamour over Fort Pillow. A commission of Congress made official enquiry into the 'massacre,' and reported horrible things. If their report were true in its length and breadth, all that they charge upon General Forrest would be as nothing in comparison with the atrocities that have been committed by the white and black soldiery of the Federal army during the last fortnight in the northern neck of Virginia. Description is impossible. The only wonder is that the Confederates, in the knowledge of the commission of such hellish deeds, should spare one Federal prisoner that falls into their hands—that they do not carry the black flag in front of the fight, and wreak their vengeance upon all Yankees, whether white or black, officer or private, German Yankee or Irish Yankee, that the issue of the fight leaves at their mercy.

Altogether the most serene example of virtuous remonstrance on the part of the Yankees against Confederate cruelty that I have noted for many months is to be found in the recent correspondence between General Foster (Federal) and General Samuel E. Jones (Confederate) on the subject of the Federal officers ordered by our Government to be confined in Charleston within the range of the Federal batteries bombarding the city. The siege of Charleston having been virtually abandoned, there is no longer a pretence of an excuse for the incessant cannonade which is maintained from Morris's Island; and, theoretically, the step taken by the Confederate authorities to put a stop to the wanton destruction of life and property, by placing the Yankee officers in the line of fire of their own guns, was excellent policy, while the propriety of it will not be questioned by any intelligent foreigner. General Foster does not see it in that light at all. It is all right to shell Charleston, but it is monstrous to subject a Yankee officer to the chance of being struck by an exploding projectile. I have said that the policy was sound theoretically, because practically it amounts to nothing whatever. The Yankee officers are not distributed over the part of the city open to the enemy's fire. They are all confined in one house, and that house one of the largest and most luxurious private mansions in Charleston, where they dine on dainties sent them from the fleet, and have their little games of whist and billiards without the least apprehension of a misdeal from Greek fire, or of an unlucky carrom from the 'Swamp Angel.'

We are in expectation of stirring news from Maryland, whither General Early has gone with a considerable force with intentions which are little understood outside the War Department. The full intelligence of his operations will doubtless reach you from New York, and the expedition will have become an old story, before this letter can get to your sanctum. The latest intelligence we have from him is that three days ago he was in Winchester.

Richmond is quiet, in its usual midsummer slumberousness. The sound of the guns, to which we have been hearkening for four or five weeks, has become fainter and less frequent, and is confined chiefly to the river. But few citizens have left their homes. The evening stroller, as he passes up Franklin Street, will see the front porticoes occupied by social groups of ladies, with only here and there a gallant among them, and hear laughter and music from open windows—sights and sounds which are not associated with war. Mendelssohn's 'Songs without Words' do not remind one of the strife that is going on around us.

General Longstreet has gone to Georgia on a visit to his family, and hopes to be in the field again by August 1.

All the bars and drinking-houses in Richmond have been closed under the recent act of the Legislature, and a julep is supposed to be an impracticability; but I am informed that there exist 'caves' and 'cellars' where one can be obtained for the moderate sum of five dollars.

Printing in the Confederacy.—The Columbia (South Carolina) Guardian, noticing the extensive establishment of Messrs. Evans & Cogswell, says: 'The war found these gentlemen located in Charleston, where they had gradually built up the largest printing-office — except the Methodist Publishing House at Nashville—in the Southern States. Since then they have imported from Europe thirty-two printing-presses, with large quantities of printing and binding materials and eighty-four artists and printers, and now employ in the various branches of their extensive business seventy-six printing-presses, besides about twenty-five ruling and binding machines. They employ three hundred and forty-four hands, only eighteen of whom are from the army. They have recently removed from Charleston to a new brick building, a part of which is finished, and, when entirely complete, will form a hollow square, covering exactly two acres of ground, and making one room 40 × 900 feet. To give some idea of the extent of the work carried on by this firm, we would mention that in addition to the large quantity of printing being done for the army, and notes and bonds for the Treasury Department, they now have in course of printing some twenty books on various subjects, among which we noticed "A New Dictionary of Military Terms," prepared by General Thomas Jordan, and illustrated with a large number of fine engravings.'

The 'Florida.'—On Tuesday intelligence was received at Lloyd's by the Ocean Gem, just arrived at Liverpool from New York, that on July 17 she was spoken with by the Confederate cruiser Florida, Halifax, N.S., bearing NE. about 22 miles. The Florida had just captured a Federal barque, a brig, and a schooner. The Chamois steamer Electric Spark, captured from the Federals, was in company with the Florida. The Prospero, which arrived in the Mersey on Sunday morning from Nassau, exchanged signals with a vessel named the W. H. Clarke, whose master reported (by signal) that he had on board the crews of the American barque Golconda, of New Bedford, and a schooner, the number of whose name the captain of the Prospero could not make out distinctly, both vessels having been captured and destroyed by the Confederate steamer Florida. The Golconda was a whaling barque, and had been at sea a considerable time, so long that she must have been almost, if not altogether, 'full' of oil.

Notes on Events of the Week.

AMERICA.

We were justified last week in discrediting the Federal report of the fall of Atlanta. The vaunted victory of July 22 was not even a drawn battle—it was a defeat. We elsewhere publish Southern and Northern accounts of the battle, and of the situation of the armies in Georgia. The losses of the Federals have been very heavy, both in men and matériel. The death of General Macpherson deprives them of one of their most promising officers.

In Virginia the Confederates have gained a decisive victory over a portion of General Hunter's troops. This force, under the command of Generals Crook and Averill, near Winchester, was attacked on the 23rd and 24th, was defeated with heavy loss, and forced to retreat to Harper's Ferry. Besides artillery, the Federals lost 1,200 men.

It is said that an attack on a portion of Grant's army, which had been withdrawn to the northern side of the James River, was repulsed, with the loss of 50 prisoners and 4 cannon. The only information that the Northern public gets as to the situation of Grant's army is that there is a new movement in progress which will have very grand results, but what the movement is is not suffered to transpire. It is supposed to be the abandonment of the siege of Petersburg. A generally well-informed correspondent of the New York World, who dates from Baltimore, says that Grant has not more than 90,000 troops at his disposal, and that 40,000 of these are new recruits.

The Confederates are again in Pennsylvania; they have advanced in three columns, and have occupied Chambersbury. The Governor of Pennsylvania has called upon the people to take up arms to repel the invasion. When the mail left, nothing authentic was known as to the number of the Confederate forces engaged in this movement. It was ascertained, however, that the Confederates had destroyed a portion of the Baltimore and Ohio railroad.

Amongst other items of war intelligence from New York, it is stated that General Smith, after defeating General Forrest no less than five times, has returned to Memphis for supplies. It seems that General Forrest can stand any number of defeats, and that Federal generals, after gaining a succession of victories, beat a retreat. Perhaps the five defeats of Forrest are only an addition to the innumerable victories which the Federals have gained on paper.

The Confederate cavalry are at work in Kentucky. We are told as usual that guerilla warfare continues in Missouri, which means that the people of that State will not submit to the Northern yoke.

The Richmond newspapers publish an official account of a victory gained by the Confederates in Virginia on July 18. It appears that on that day a large force of Federals crossed the Shenandoah at Snicker's Gap, and that they were driven back with heavy loss. The Richmond Examiner of July 21 says that the fight was brought on by an attempt of Hunter to prevent the Confederates returning with their booty from Maryland, and adds: 'Really Hunter's bewilderment must, by this time, be painful. A month ago he, with the utmost confidence, threw himself against Lynchburg, but, being hurled back by a strong hand, he fled in horror and amazement, not tarrying to learn who was his powerful antagonist. On Monday, having recruited and increased his forces, he attempts to crush a few thousand cavalry who are returning weary and heavy-laden from their rioting and raiding through the fertile fields of Maryland, even to the gates of the capital of his nation. Again he is dashed back by the still unknown iron hand, and his men put to the rout.'

On July 10 General Rosecrans issued an address to the citizens of North-west Missouri, in which he says: 'I have supplied you with ammunition, and left arms in your hands. You have given me fair promises, while you allowed rebels and guerillas to live and recruit among you. You have concealed from our authorities these men and their projects. You have seen robbers and murderers joined by the very men who swore to defend us against them. The arms and ammunition delivered to you for the defence of law and government have been used to destroy them. You are guilty of all the blood that will be shed by the use of these arms and the hands which have basely betrayed both you and the country. You have nothing left before you now but wholly to renounce and help to pursue and exterminate these common enemies of mankind, or your country will become a desolation.' We could not desire better testimony of the loyalty of Missouri to the cause of the Confederacy.

It was related that the Richmond and Danville Railroad was completely destroyed. How thoroughly unfounded was the report we may learn from the following advertisement which appeared in the Richmond Enquirer on July 21:—

'On and after Tuesday, July 21, the trains on this road will be run as follows:—Day mail train will leave Richmond daily at 6 o'clock A.M., and arrive at Burkeville at 10 o'clock A.M., connecting with the trains on the Southside Railroad for Lynchburg, and arrive in Danville at 6.30 P.M. Night mail train will leave Richmond daily at 4 o'clock P.M., arrive at Burkeville at 8.10 P.M., and arrive in Danville at 10 o'clock A.M. These trains both connect with the trains on the Piedmont Railroad for Greensboro and the South.

General Hunter has published a letter respecting the suppression of two newspapers by his command. He says he was offended at his troops being described as being in an exhausted condition, and he adds: 'There are in every army grumblers, malcontents, and alarmists, not only in the ranks, but I regret to say amongst the officers, and some of rank that should make them more prudent.' Such is the condition of a Federal army according to the testimony of its commander.

The Richmond Despatch of July 19 says that in the victory gained on June 23 near Petersburg by General Mahone, the Confederate captures consisted of 1,660 prisoners, including 57 commissioned officers, 10 stand of colours, 4 pieces of artillery, and 1,571 stand of small arms.

The accounts of the crops in the South are encouraging. The Richmond Enquirer of July 20 says:—'Although some sections have suffered considerably from drought, the crop prospects are generally very fine. Our Southern exchanges give encouraging accounts of timely rains and luxuriant prospects. Southside Virginia, which it was thought would suffer much from want of rain, has, to some extent, been relieved by heavy and welcome rains, especially along the line of the Weldon Railroad.'

We find in the columns of New York journals estimates of the damage done to railroads in the recent incursion by the Confederates. The aggregate is set down at about $1,500,000. Amongst other supplies the Confederates obtained 5,000 horses.

A Kentucky paper, the Evansville Journal, says that the guerillas on Green River are so active that the traffic is entirely suspended.

We elsewhere publish a letter from Ex-Governor Letcher, of Virginia, giving an account of the way in which General Hunter's soldiers acted in Virginia. It will repay perusal.

The Petersburg Express of July 23 announces the death of Captain John Mitchell, a gallant and promising officer, who was killed on July 19 on the parapet of Fort Sumter.

General Sherman lately captured about 400 factory girls; and as they were engaged in manufacturing army canvas for the Confederates, he sentenced them to be sent out of their State, and despatched them to the north of the Ohio in army wagons. The Cincinnati Commercial says: 'Only think of it. Four hundred weeping and terrified Ellens, Susans, and Maggies transported in the springless and seatless army wagons, away from their lovers and brothers of the sunny South, and all for the offence of weaving tent cloth and spinning stocking yarn!' This may be harsh treatment, but it is merciful compared to the way in which captured women are generally treated by Federal commanders.

General Washburne has instituted a tribunal at Memphis to supersede the civil courts, which he thus describes: 'A military court for the trial of civil cases is hereby organised, to be known as the "Civil Commission of the District of Memphis," with power to hear and determine all suits which may be brought before such court, coming within the jurisdiction hereinafter defined. The officers of the said Civil Commission shall be a Judge, Recorder, and Marshal, to be appointed by the Commanding General of the district of West Tennessee. The said Civil Commission shall have jurisdiction to hear, decide, and grant relief upon the complaints and suits of loyal citizens of the United States and friendly aliens.'

The New York World complains that the quotas under the last call of Mr. Lincoln are very unfair to New York. It says: 'Fourteen thousand two hundred and eighty-four more soldiers are required from ten Democratic Congressional districts in New York than from a similar number of Republican districts in Massachusetts. This gross inequality must have been patent to the Provost-Marshal-General, who assigned the quotas, as his attention was directly drawn to it last year. Nay, in making out the figures he must have noted the discrepancy, and it really looks as though there was a deliberate intention to make the draft as easy as possible for Massachusetts, or grievously heavy on New York.'

The New York World, under the heading of 'Another National Humiliation,' gives a long account of the system of espionage at the post-offices carried on by the Federal Government; the letters of prominent Democrats are regularly opened, and even the official correspondence of Governor Seymour is subjected to this treatment.

It is said, on the authority of the New York Herald, that a board of naval officers has decided that the persons rescued from the Alabama by the Deerhound were prisoners of war, and that the Federal Government has approved this decision. It is hardly possible that Mr. Seward will take any action, even if this report is true.

Mr. Fessenden has advertised for a popular loan of $200,000,000 in seven three-tenths Treasury notes, redeemable in three years, the interest to be paid in greenbacks. At maturity the notes are to be converted into bonds, the interest to be payable in gold. This attempt to borrow without a specie basis marks an important era in the history of Federal finance. It is very easy to pay interest with paper, but Mr. Fessenden will find it extremely difficult to borrow on such terms, and this no doubt he is conscious of, from the appeal he has made to the patriotism of the people. In this appeal he admits that affairs are very much changed from what ley were three years ago, and that the people are now ardened with an enormous debt, but he contends that the rospect is equally encouraging, because the struggle has hibited the greatness of the national resources. He rites:—'This is not the time for any lover of his country enquire into the state of the money market, or ask hether he can so invest his surplus capital as to yield m a larger return. No return and no profit can be deirable if followed by national dissolution or national disrace. Present profit thus acquired is but the precursor future and speedy destruction. . . . He who selfhly withholds his aid in the hope of turning his availble means to greater immediate profit is speculating upon is country's misfortunes, and may find what seems to be esent gain leads to future loss.' This is a curious gument on the part of a Minister of Finance, and one not ery likely to do him much good. It is a confession that ne financial condition of the country is so desperate that ans can only be obtained by patriots lending their money ithout enquiring into the security.

On July 30, in New York, gold was quoted at 256.

ENGLAND.

HE steam-rams El Tousson and El Monassir, purchased M. Bravay by the English Government, have at last en handed over to Messrs. Laird, of Birkenhead, for mpletion. The vessels will be named respectively the corpion and the Wyvern. Each vessel will be armed ith four 300-pounders, throwing a broadside of 1,200 lbs.

HE Georgia, late Confederate ship of war, now belongs Mr. Edward Bates, who has chartered her to the ortuguese Government to carry the mails between Porgal and the Azores.

HE Liverpool magistrates have committed Joseph Buanan, of Skirving Street, Kirkdale, Liverpool, for trial the charge of enlisting men to serve on board the Conderate steamer Rappahannock.

HE council of the National Rifle Association has awarded he Marquis of Tweeddale's prize of 50*l.* for breech-loading fles to Mr. Henry, of Edinburgh. The council, however, corded their opinion that none of the breech-loading fles submitted for trial could be recommended as suitable r military arms. They have offered a prize of 100*l.* for o best military breech-loading rifle that can be produced.

URING the past three or four weeks the seaport towns f England have disported themselves with yacht regattas. onspicuous above all has been the regatta of the Royal acht Squadron, held off the coast of the Isle of Wight, nd perhaps the most interesting race was the handicap ace for Her Majesty's cup by schooners and yawls of the oyal Yacht Squadron. The prize was won by the Albertine, 156 tons, belonging to Lord Londesborough, he Viking, 142 tons, being defeated by one minute and a alf. The Aline, 216 tons, belonging to Mr. Thellusson, as third. Count de Lonceaux, the Earl of Rosse, and ir B. Chichester were represented respectively by the essels Intrepid, 75 tons; Titania, 184 tons; and Vestal, 4 tons. The prize vase was magnificent. On the one anel was a representation of the poem by Longfellow:—

And Alfred, King of the Saxons,
Had a book upon his knees,
And he wrote down the wond'rous tale
Of him who was the first to sail
Into the Arctic seas.
And to the King of the Saxons,
In witness of the truth,
Raising his noble head
He stretch'd his brown hand and said,
'Behold this walrus tooth.'

The other was composed of a group of sea nymphs. On the following day the Cowes Town Regatta was held in the Roads, and the royal yacht Fairy arrived with the Prince and Princess of Wales, and the Prince and Princess Louis of Hesse, to witness the sport. In the evening there was a magnificent display of fireworks, at the conclusion of which the entire fleet of yachts, steamers, and other vessels, with the ship of war Irresistible and the royal yacht Victoria and Albert, were illuminated. The annual regatta dinner was held on an evening of the same week, Commodore the Earl of Wilton presiding. The Marquis of Conyngham, as Vice-Commodore, was in the vice-chair. Prince Leiningen, Lords Rosse, Grey de Wilton, Durham, Vane, Ponsonby, Londesborough, Henry Lennox, Otho Fitzgerald, Mr. H. Lowther, of racing, Mr. H. Villebois, of hunting fame, and many other noblemen and gentlemen of yachting celebrity were present. From the statement of the Commodore it appeared that the Club had in their possession at the present time 61 schooners, 11 screw steamers, 26 cutters, 12 yawls, and 2 luggers—112 vessels in all.

THE agriculturists are busily engaged with the harvest. The most striking feature in the state of the crops in England is the variation in excellence even in places contiguous to each other. The late frosts of April and May were succeeded by hot weather, but without much rain. The hot weather was again succeeded in July by cold north-east winds with frosty mornings, and then followed great heat, the wind blowing for alternate periods of fourteen days from the east and from the west, yet without rain. Indeed, a more severe drought has not often been experienced. In many parts of England the crop of hay was very light, but the quality was generally fair. The dry weather has, of course, entirely spoiled the aftergrass, and farmers have been compelled to give their hay to the stock, and even to cut green oats for their horses. The turnips have failed to a disastrous extent, and it is feared that, under the most favourable circumstances, sheep feed will be scarce in the ensuing winter. The wheat crop is generally fair, though, beyond all doubt, much inferior to the crop of 1863 in quantity. On thin and poor lands there is no prospect of a satisfactory yield. On the other hand, the accounts from the heavy lands of Essex and Lincolnshire are good. On those lands which cannot be classed under either of the above heads, but may be denominated as sound light lands, the crop is uncertain in quantity. It is feared that the long drought has destroyed all hope of good quality in the barley. Such, at any rate, is the case on all chalk soils. In some parts of Norfolk and Suffolk, the mischief has not been great. The prices of wheat and barley are, moreover, by no means such as to encourage the British agriculturist. The finest new wheat is not worth more than 46*s.* the quarter, and the trade shows a downward tendency. With regard to the other sources of agricultural profit, it may be observed that sheep and horned cattle are dear almost beyond example. Horses, however, are decidedly cheap.

IN the 22,757 coroner's inquests held during the year 1863 in England and Wales, there were recorded 207 verdicts of murder, and 203 verdicts of manslaughter. There were 1,385 of suicide, 1,048 of these being on men, and the residue on women. Also 323 verdicts of death from excessive drinking, and 140 of death from privation. Of the whole 22,757 inquests, 6,506 were held on children under seven years of age; of these children one-fifth were illegitimate. Moreover, there were 3,664 inquests on infants under the age of twelve months, and more than one-fourth of these children were illegitimate. In Middlesex alone 79 verdicts of murder were returned in inquests on infants under twelve months. The seats of manufacture in the counties of Lancaster, Chester, Warwick, and Gloucester supplied with Middlesex more than half the inquests on dead infants.

THE Archæological Institute of Great Britain closed their meetings at Warwick in the early part of last week. The members had visited Stoneleigh Abbey, Kenilworth Castle, Warwick Castle, Coventry, Lichfield, Stratford-on-Avon, Manstoke Castle, and many other places of interest. On Monday last the members arrived in great numbers at Ipswich, taking up their headquarters at the ancient hotel 'The White Horse,' immortalised in the Pickwick Papers. The Congress was received by the corporation, and in the evening a dinner was held, which was numerously attended by the members of the Institute and the principal inhabitants of the town.

LORD COURTENAY, the eldest son of the Earl of Devon, has been elected M.P. for Exeter, by a majority of 26 over Mr. Coleridge, the eminent Queen's Counsel. Lord Courtenay represented the Conservative, and Mr. Coleridge the Liberal interest.

PRINCE JEROME NAPOLEON, accompanied by the Princess Murat, Count Ferra Persani, and a numerous suite, landed at Greenock on Saturday last on his way to Bowling, Lochlomond, the Trossachs, Oban, and Inverness. The Prince is travelling under the name of Count de Mendon.

ONCE more the nerves of quiet men and timid women have been shaken by the history of a journey by railway, and the murder of Mr. Briggs with the outrage on a female so lately recorded in our columns are succeeded in a dramatic sequence by a fearful struggle between a mad sailor and some panic-stricken passengers. The express train between London and Edinburgh leaves King's Cross at 9·15 A.M. and runs to Peterborough, a distance of seventy miles, without stopping. One day last week four gentlemen had taken their seats in a second-class carriage, and just before the starting of the train, a fifth passenger, in the form of a sailor, apparently intoxicated, was thrust into the carriage by the guard, against the will of those already in possession. The train had but just left the station when the sailor became very excited, shouted that he had lost his money and was ruined, and, leaping from his seat, rushed wildly about the carriage uttering dire yells and imprecations. Pacific means were thrown away on a man who was hitting out right and left, and raving in the agonies of delirium tremens. The four passengers threw themselves upon him, and a tremendous struggle arose. At one moment the sailor nearly succeeded in precipitating himself from one window; at another a like fate seemed to impend over one of the passengers. At last the fellow was overpowered, his hands bound, and his knife taken from him. Endeavours were then made to arouse the guard to action and to stop the train. An official at one of the small stations signalled the driver to stop, and for a moment there seemed a probability of release. Once more, however, the steam was put on, and for one hour and a half the train sped on as if in derision of the fruitless efforts of the unhappy passengers. Peterborough was at last reached, and then only by the most strong remonstrances were the authorities prevented from permitting the sailor to resume his journey.

GRANT'S WASTE OF MEN.—The Boston Courier writes: 'There cannot be a fairer illustration of the havoc of war, when carried on under wilful guidance, than the condition of the First Massachusetts heavy artillery. It was for over two years stationed in the defences of Washington, doing most useful and valuable, but not exposed or "active" service, when, after the depleting battles of the Wilderness, it was ordered to the front as an infantry organisation. It marched out 1,670 strong and 30 officers, and was in the brunt of the battle of Spottsylvania Court House. It now returns with about 270 men, leaving at Petersburg about as many reenlisted men and recruits whose time is not out, and there are only 13 officers left. Thus, within sixty days, over 1,100 men of 1,700 have melted away in what is called "glory," certainly bravely, with no desertion, no straggling, no slow disease, no Chickahominy swamp, to detract from their laurels or from the record of as fine a regiment physically as Massachusetts could boast. Yet this is no isolated case, but only a fair sample of all, and an irrefragable proof that Grant's waste of men has not been exaggerated.'

THE CONTINENT.

THE DANO-GERMAN WAR.

The Conference of Vienna will resume its sittings as soon as the Danish plenipotentiaries have received an official ratification of the preliminaries and instructions for their future conduct. The difference between the policy of Austria and Prussia is becoming daily more marked, and is the subject of much acute observation both in the German and the French press. It is remarked that the Gazette of Vienna and the Moniteur of Prussia, the official journals of the two States, contradict one another on a very important point. The Austrian paper says that the Duchies have been ceded to the two great Powers conditionally, all the rights of the German Confederation being reserved; the Prussian organ, on the other hand, speaks of the cession as absolute and unconditional. It is impossible to conjecture whether this contradiction is a sign of a divergence of policy, or part of a calculated scheme to secure for Prussia the lion's share of the booty. The latter theory is in complete harmony with another remarkable fact—the cession, namely, of the Duchy of Lauenburg. It must not be forgotten that the Duke of Augustenburg has no sort of pretensions to this Duchy, which was given to Denmark by the Congress of Vienna; failing the rights of Denmark, there are several princely houses of Germany who have a claim to Lauenburg prior to that of the Duke of Augustenburg. Can it be possible, then, that Prussia means to acknowledge that she has received Slesvig-Holstein in trust for the Diet, but will revindicate her claim to Lauenburg as a conquered country? The situation of that Duchy is one that would be eminently favourable to Prussia, being a fertile and well-watered plain containing about 50,000 inhabitants, and contributing about 60,000*l.* to the yearly revenue; it is moreover wedged in between Mecklenburg, Hanover, Hamburg, Lubeck, and Holstein, in a manner which would be highly advantageous to an ambitious master. These considerations are calculated to increase the suspicions concerning the conduct of Prussia. But, after all, 'sufficient for the day is the evil thereof;' and until we have arrived at a clearer notion of the manner in which Prussia means to wring out of the Duchies the payment of the expenses of the war, we need scarcely trouble ourselves about their ultimate destiny. It is understood that Denmark is to be relieved of the cost of the war at the expense of the now independent Duchies, which will remain in the power of Prussia until she shall have declared herself repaid. How far off that time may be no man has yet ventured to guess. While on the subject of Lauenburg we may observe that the representative of Hesse has presented a memorial to the Federal Diet on behalf of the Prince Frederick William of Hesse, wherein that prince states his claims to the Duchies, and more especially to Lauenburg.

The suspension of hostilities between the belligerent Powers began on the 2nd inst., and is to continue in force until September 13, after which date it may be terminated by either party on six weeks' notice. The conditions of this truce are due principally to Herr von Rechberg. The Prussian Minister expressed a very strong objection to the lengthening of the armistice beyond six weeks absolutely. The presence of that worthy at Vienna has given rise to a bitter mot in the Austrian capital: 'We have long wished that Germany should be governed from Vienna, and now we have our desire; for Herr von Bismarck is here.' The terms of the preliminaries of peace between Denmark and the Germans contain an article securing a certain rectification of the frontier of Jutland so as to give to Denmark certain purely Danish territories. This rectification will be of great value to Denmark if carried out as proposed. That kingdom will then retain the district at the north-western corner of Slesvig, containing about 26 square miles. It is situated at the mouths of the chief waterways on the coast of the North Sea, Smaltief and Listertief; the latter being the only naval station in that part suitable for large ships of war.

DENMARK.

A more detailed account of the proceedings at the Landsthing of Copenhagen of the 3rd inst. has arrived. The draft of an address to the throne was brought forward for final consideration, when a resolution was brought forward by Professor Madvig, declining to put the address to the vote on the ground that the Ministry had made communications upon the political situation to the members of the House at a private sitting, and in a form not admitting of any debate. This motion was carried, and it was at the same time resolved that the address to the King formerly adopted should not be presented. Pastor Birkedal of the Volksthing has given notice of the following questions—Whether the Government intend to negotiate a peace upon the basis of an entire cession of Slesvig; whether they consider it constitutional to negotiate such a peace without first consulting the House of Representatives; and whether they are convinced that such an arrangement does not endanger the stability of the throne. The Volksthing is at present withholding all financial grants until it is furnished with a more complete statement of the political position of the country than that laid before it in the private sitting of the 1st instant.

The Rigsraad (assembly for Denmark proper) was opened by the King on the 6th inst. The royal speech contained these words:—'Having been abandoned by all Europe, we are obliged to seek for peace with our overwhelming enemy. It is hard to have to make such sacrifices, but still harder to prosecute the war. Union between King and people may bring about a happier future.'

The immediate effect of the armistice in Denmark has been that a furlough has been granted to all recruits recently enlisted, and that the troops are returning from the garrisons of Fünen to the metropolis.

It is reported that M. de Bille, Danish Minister at the Court of St. James's, has been recalled by his Government, and is to leave England about the end of the month. The conduct of M. de Bille in the course of the late negotiations in London has commanded the warmest approbation of his Government. It appears that his place will not be filled up in London, at least for some time. The Danish legation in this city will be done away with, and the Danish Minister in Paris will transact any affairs for which the consul may be incompetent.

FRANCE.

The Minister of Marine has given the gold medal of the 2nd class to the pilot Mauger, and silver medals to the assistant pilots Gosselin and Doucet, for the meritorious way in which they assisted in saving the crew of the Alabama from drowning.

The Emperor has given his decision, as arbitrator, upon the question of the Suez Canal. It will be remembered that the company had received certain large privileges from the late Viceroy, which the present ruler of Egypt considered decidedly exorbitant, and which had been objected to by the Porte, the suzerain power, as tending to diminish her sovereignty. The Company demurred naturally to the loss of the privileges, and the question, after much discussion, was referred to the arbitration of the Emperor. He has decided that the Egyptian Government shall pay to the company the sum of 54,000,000 francs (2,160,000*l.*) as a compensation for the loss of the privileges and territorial concessions once granted to it.

Marshal M'Mahon, Duc de Magenta, was appointed Governor-General of Algeria on the death of Marshal Pelissier, Duc de Malakhoff.

A Parisian journalist was lately tried and condemned for publishing political news without the proper authorisation. It appeared that this gentleman was the correspondent of various provincial papers, and was in the habit of composing one letter on the various political topics of the day, identical copies of which he sent to the different journals with which he was connected. This was held by the inferior court to amount to the publication of the letter, and he was accordingly condemned. On appeal, however, to the Cour de Cassation, the judgment has been reversed, the court above taking a more liberal, not to say more rational, view of the proceeding.

The great legal business of the week has been the trial of the thirteen gentlemen accused of forming a political association composed of more than twenty persons, contrary to the article in the Code Pénal. We have already, in a former number, mentioned the seizure of the papers of M. Garnier-Pagès, and the nature of the association in question. It was a committee composed chiefly of lawyers formed for the purpose of giving advice to electors who might ask for it as to their right to vote and the legal manner of exercising the right. The committee was one day broken up by the entrance of the commissaires de police, and a seizure effected of all the papers, private and otherwise, belonging to the owner of the house. The case came before the 6th Chamber of the Correctional Tribunal of the Seine on the 5th and 6th inst. In consideration of the number of advocates in the list of the accused, M. Dufaure, the batonnier or leader of the bar, applied to the authorities for places for himself and the Council of the Faculty of Advocates at the trial; but the application was refused, on the ground that the persons referred to were accused as private individuals, not in their capacity as advocates. Among the names of the accused are some well known in the French Opposition, MM. Garnier-Pagès, Carnot, and Ferry; they were defended by MM. Jules Favre, Marie, and Berryer, respectively. The proceedings were opened by a protest lodged by MM. Garnier-Pagès and Carnot, as members of the Legislative Chamber, against the unconstitutional manner in which their papers had been ransacked, and the votes of several individuals discovered, in violation of the law which ordained that all voting should be secret. The President declared that the court could not consider that point. The Avocat Impérial then opened the prosecution in a speech which lasted four hours; the whole drift of his speech made it unfortunately only more and more evident that all the forensic talent of France had taken refuge on the side of the Opposition. In the course of it he took occasion to refer to some previous conduct of certain of the accused in confirmation of his view; M. Jules Favre demanded his authority; he gave an article in the Siècle; the prisoners' counsel immediately objected to the introduction of such evidence, and a scene ensued which reflected little honour on the court. M. Jules Favre, in his speech for the defence, spoke with some bitterness of the mockery of progress which France had made, a progress which he considered little better than a cruel illusion, so long as such prosecutions could be instituted: the causa mali was, he appeared to think, the system of official candidature, which certainly tends to exasperate the minds of government authorities into most violent action against the Opposition; he quoted a passage from a work of the present Emperor, in which he observes that in England authority is so well managed that domiciliary visits are unknown. The speech of the hon. counsel for the defence was of so telling a character that MM. Berryer and Marie declined to add anything to it. The court retired for judgment, and, after a deliberation of five hours, gave its decision against the accused, condemning them to a fine of 500 francs apiece and the costs.

POLAND.

The mystery which hung over the constitution of that 'national Government,' which for so long baffled the searches of the Russian police, and exercised in Poland an authority superior to that of the Imperial troops, has been dispelled. The chiefs of the Government have been discovered, tried, and condemned. On the 5th inst. MM. Traugott (the chief), Krajewski, Tocyski, Zulinski, Jezioranski (heads of various departments), were hanged at Warsaw. Eleven others had also been condemned to death, but their punishment had been commuted to hard labour for life, or banishment to a Siberian fortress.

ITALY.

The readers of the Times will have observed a letter lately inserted in that journal with regard to an act of brigandage perpetrated in the immediate neighbourhood of Florence. It appears that an English lady of the name of Beste was driving in her carriage accompanied by her son, a youth of some seventeen years of age, when they were set upon by a pair of rascals, one of whom carried a gun; with this he shot one of the horses, and was then joined by four others; they stripped the carriage and its occupants of every valuable, and seized and carried off the boy, estimating his ransom at 3,000*l.*; the lady was told that unless the money was paid at a certain place on that night, her son would be killed. Two servants were sent with a cheque for the money, on which was also written an order not to pay the money, but to detain the bearer; however, by some mismanagement on the part of the thieves, the boy was allowed to go without any payment. It appeared from his description that they were thirteen in number, a very needy and starved set; as they were compromised both in the Papal States and in Tuscany, they were anxious to raise money enough to take them to Austria.

SPAIN.

The King of Spain will be accompanied in his visit to France by his brother, Don Enrique Maria Ferdinando, Duke of Seville. A little romance is said to be mixed up with this visit. It is said that when the Empress of the French paid her visit last year to the Queen of Spain, accompanied by Princess Anna Murat, that young lady was much admired by the Duke of Seville. He is now anxious to renew his acquaintance with her, and if possible to effect an alliance. The Emperor of the French is said not to be adverse to such a marriage, which would represent one of the most remarkable combinations in history, the union of the families of Bourbon and Murat.

GREECE.

On the 29th ult. the Ionian deputies arrived at Athens; an attempt was made to get up a demonstration to greet them, but the most noticeable part of the procession was that the banners of the provinces of Epirus, Thessaly, Macedonia, Thrace, Crete, Rhodes, Cyprus, Bulgaria, and Servia, were borne in it, as a token of the claim made by the Greek nationality upon those districts. This proceeding drew from the Turkish chargé d'affaires, Photiades Bey, an unofficial complaint, in an interview with M. Kalligas, the Foreign Minister, of the insult conveyed to the Sultan by the appearance of these banners in a public procession. The interview was perfectly private; neither of the two parties engaged in it were likely to have talked about it; yet next day appeared in the Regeneration a violently abusive article against Turkey and England. The article itself was of no great importance; but the treachery of the person who revealed the nature of the diplomatic communication has called forth remarks from representatives of the older Powers, who are not likely to allow the nascent kingdom of Greece to take such liberties with impunity.

As we mentioned last week, M. Balbes' Government has resigned upon the refusal of the House to vote the sum of 15,000 drachmas for six months' pay of Count Sponneck's gendarmes. The Danish counsellor of the young King was unfortunate or ill-advised enough to omit to bring this sum before the consideration of the House; the present repudiation of it has been viewed by the Ministry in the light of a vote of want of confidence, and they have accordingly resigned. A new Ministry has been formed under the presidency of Admiral Canaris.

The brigandage around Athens still continues under the chieftainship of Kitzos, Pylios, &c. To those who wish to read a lively description of the relations between the bandits and the army of Greece, such as it was when Otho was king, and (for all we know) as it is now, we would recommend the perusal of M. Edmond About's 'Roi des Montagnes.' They will discover how easily an apparently vigorous prosecution of brigandage can be combined with a fair participation in its profits.

TURKEY.

By the exertions of the British ambassador, Sir Henry Bulwer, the difficulties with regard to the missionary stations have been adjusted. The bookshops are to be reopened, and sales within their limits to be freely permitted; but books are not for the future to be hawked about the streets, nor is open-air preaching to be permitted. The converts already made are to be sent for a time to some Turkish city under the protection of the British consul.

An interesting discovery has been made in Constantinople in consequence of a fire which destroyed a vast number of Jewish hovels; the coronation-hall of the Greek Emperors from the time of Heraclius downwards has been brought to light. It was built against the walls of Theodosius, in a position very near the Imperial camp, in order that the new Emperor might, immediately after his coronation, receive the homage of his army; it is perhaps a relic of that ancient custom that the new Sultan repairs to this spot on the day after his accession, and is there girt with a sword. The Jewish hovels were built actually within and under the roof of the building; the fire by which they were destroyed has also annihilated the roof, but it has laid bare the long line of stately arches by which the entrance to this palace was graced.

EGYPT.

The stars and stripes have been getting into decided hot water in Egypt. A Yankee, of the name of Kindineco, was in the course of erecting an engine of some nature without the express authority of the Government, contrary to the law of Egypt: moreover he was greatly injuring a canal, and thus endangering the property of his neighbours; notice of the illegal nature of his action was given to the United States consul, who thereupon ordered his countryman to discontinue the works. Apparently, however, he had reasons for withdrawing his order, for shortly afterwards the workmen were again found engaged on the same task. The Government took the matter into their own hands, sent a few Kawasses to the spot, and ejected the workmen. This very natural proceeding drew from the United States consul a most violent letter, addressed to the Egyptian authorities, in which he demands redress, compensation, and apology, and threatens to haul down his flag if satisfaction is not given within twenty-four hours. His demand is, of course, not complied with, and at the end of twenty-four hours down goes the flag; nay more, a letter from Cherif Pacha arriving after the time appointed is returned unopened. There the matter stands at present—the flag down, and official communications interrupted.

It is somewhat remarkable that at the very time when Europe is very generally suffering from a long-continued drought, the inhabitants of the valley of the Nile are watching with anxiety the extraordinary rise of the river, consequent, of course, on the great rainfalls in the interior of Africa. No danger need at present be feared, as the river must rise 25 pics, or 50 feet, before it can do harm. The rise at present is only 12½ pics, or 25 feet; but this is 4 feet above the flood of 1863, and 2 feet above that of 1862. The effect of the irrigation upon the cotton plant is said to be very good, and the crop of Egyptian cotton of this year bids fair to continue the steady progress of former years.

The number of pilgrims at Mecca during this season has been unprecedentedly large, the influx being calculated at about 200,000. In consequence of this typhus fever has sprung up, and has already made many victims. The regular inhabitants of Mecca are deserting their houses fast.

His Highness the Maharajah Dhuleep Singh, whose long residence in England, the distinguished position occupied by him at the English Court, and his English manners, tastes, and habits have almost secured to him the title of an Englishman, was married on June 7, at the British Consulate, Alexandria. The lady who has now become the Maharanee is the daughter of a European merchant and an Abyssinian lady. She is a Christian, and was educated in the American Presbyterian Mission School at Cairo. She was engaged in her self-imposed duties as a teacher in that school when she was first seen by the prince. She is between fifteen and sixteen years of age, remarkable rather for an interesting manner than for distinguished beauty. The Maharajah wore at the ceremony the dress of an English gentleman, with the exception of a red tarboosh. After the conclusion of the civil ceremony at the consulate, a religious ceremony was performed at the house of the bride's father by an American Presbyterian minister. The Prince and his bride are expected shortly in England.

TUNIS.

There seems every reason to believe that quiet has at length been restored in this troubled country. The Khasnadar has been requested to reside abroad for a few months; the capitation tax has been reduced from 72 piastres to 18; an amnesty has been granted, and the submission of 14 tribes received by Government. Ben Ghadani, the leader of the revolt, has been allowed to go his way without molestation. The foreign consuls, who, with the exception of the representative of Great Britain, had all taken refuge on shipboard, have been officially informed of the restoration of peace, and the news has also been telegraphed to Cagliari; but the Europeans are still, it is said, uncertain how to act, as much of their property is even now at the mercy of the Arabs.

BRAZIL.

A marriage is projected between the Archduke Louis Victor, the younger brother of the Emperors of Austria and Mexico, and Isabella, the heiress of the throne of Brazil.

MEXICO.

We read in a French journal: 'The English have already begun to make the most of Mexico commercially. They are getting up large companies which compete with the French establishments and with the residents in the new empire in the most deplorable manner. They hope to be able to monopolise the riches of the country.'

Spanish advices from Mexico confirm in all respects the favourable reports made in the French journals. The Emperor has had an interview with the Archbishop Labastida and two of the leading bishops, and has given them to understand that he was come to Mexico not to countenance any reaction, but to represent the principles of liberty and progress. On a late occasion the Emperor and Empress went out on foot into the square in front of the palace. They were immediately surrounded by a dense crowd, which escorted them to the gate of the cathedral with shouts of enthusiasm. A zealous officer rushed out to ask the Emperor whether he would not have a guard, but his Majesty smiled, and, turning to the crowd, said, 'This is our best guard,' a sentiment which earned him redoubled applause. Their Majesties have left Mexico, and are living at Chapultepec in a villa built by the Viceroy Galvez; it is remarkable for the enormous cypresses with which it is surrounded, many of them measuring more than sixty feet in circumference. The Emperor visits Mexico every morning for the transaction of business, and returns at six in the evening.

General Grant's Campaign.—The New York World of July 20 says: 'No person can form a just estimate of the truly heroic campaign of General Grant from a perusal of the wilderness of confused and confusing despatches and letters which have been spread before the public from Washington and the seat of war. But there are three great cardinal facts, conspicuous and patent to all the world, which sum up, as it were, like the footings in a ledger, the multifarious circumstances scattered through the eventful two months since the army of the Potomac advanced from the Rapidan. These three cardinal considerations are—1. The change of base to the James River; 2. The rebel incursion into Maryland; and, 3. The new call of the President for half a million additional men.'

A NORTHERN SUMMARY OF WAR NEWS.

(From the Philadelphia Age, July 29.)

The Confederate movement northward, through the Shenandoah Valley, is over. A small body still remains at Winchester, but the object of the movement—to cripple Hunter and keep Wright from rejoining Grant seems to have been accomplished. We have little doubt that the larger part of the Confederates have returned to Richmond. They have begun a movement against Grant. An attack upon his northern flank is contemplated. For two or three days past the Confederates have been concentrating in front of the isolated earthwork built by Foster on the north bank of the James. On Friday they attacked it, and also made an artillery assault upon Birney's (late Brooks') and Martindale's (late Smith's) Corps, at Bermuda Hundred. The firing was very heavy, and the indications are that the Confederates intended to pass around Foster's flank, and capture Malvern Hill and Harrison's Landing, thus controlling the James below City Point. Grant, it is said, at once sent reinforcements to Foster. He could not do it unless he withdrew some of his troops from Petersburg. His army now is comparatively weak. Burnside's, Warren's, and Barlow's (late Hancock's) Corps are in front of Petersburg. One of them must have been withdrawn to help Foster. Wright is still at Washington, Our latest intelligence is to Wednesday morning at 10 o'clock. At that time a heavy battle was being fought. Nothing was known of its results. It began on Tuesday evening. This movement of the enemy has placed Grant on the defensive, and may compel him to take his troops away from Petersburg to fight an enemy at Malvern Hill and Bermuda Hundred. The expedition against Hunter has accomplished its object, and its history can now be written.

The Confederates after their recent expedition into Maryland, retreated from Rockville across the Potomac to Leesburg, and then through Snicker's Gap into the Shenandoah valley. They were followed by General Wright's troops. Wright led his own corps, a portion of the Nineteenth Corps, and Crook's cavalry. Snicker's Gap is a short distance west of Leesburg. Co-operating with Wright, Generals Hunter and Averell moved south-west from Harper's Ferry and Martinsburg along the valley. The Confederates withdrew rapidly and Wright followed as swiftly. At Snicker's Gap, Crook, who led the Federal advance, captured a Confederate wagon train. The Confederates turned upon their pursuers, drove them off, and recaptured all but two of the wagons. Wright followed them through the gap a short distance, to the Shenandoah River. The authorities at Washington, seeing the Federal pursuit so apparently successful, and being daily importuned to send Wright and his troops back to Grant's army, sent a courier to recall him. Before the courier arrived, Wright reached the Shenandoah, and found the enemy drawn up on the western bank. He tried to cross it, but was repulsed. He then endeavoured to outflank the Confederates, when they suddenly broke up their camp and marched southward along the valley to Manassas Gap.

As Wright was preparing to follow them, the courier reached him. The orders to return to Washington were peremptory. His corps and the 19th Corps were at once withdrawn through Snicker's Gap towards Leesburg. General Crook covered the rear. The march was not molested. Crook, as soon as Wright's troops had passed through Snicker's Gap, was ordered to go northward along the valley and join Hunter and Averell, who had halted at Winchester. At the same time the Confederates began a swift march northward. Wright was out of the way, and having been heavily reinforced, they anticipated an easy conquest of Hunter. They came up with Crook just south of Winchester, and on Saturday last drove him into the town. An attack was unexpected, and Hunter hastily abandoned Winchester, leaving the greater portion of his baggage in the enemy's hands. On Sunday morning he was again attacked, north of Winchester. He was almost surrounded. One regiment was cut off from another. There seemed to be no orders given except for retreat. The Confederates captured four cannon and eight hundred prisoners. They broke up Hunter's column, and his troops, completely disorganised, rushed into Martinsburg. Crook tried to protect the rear from the Confederate pursuit, but was unsuccessful. Averell did what he could, but the rout was complete. Hunter had lost the confidence of his men, and could no longer control them. No stand was made at Martinsburg. The road north-east to Williamsport was taken by the fugitive army, and a halt was not made until the Potomac was crossed.

The Confederates captured Martinsburg. The road taken by Hunter's men was covered with all sorts of abandoned materiel. The woods were filled with Federal stragglers. The enemy did not advance in force north of Martinsburg, though pickets were sent out. Hunter, when he reached Williamsville, found an order relieving him from command. Crook succeeded him. Wright, as soon as he reached Washington, was sent westward towards Harper's Ferry. The authorities saw their mistake in recalling him from the Shenandoah valley, and four days ago his troops began marching from Washington to garrison the various passes into Western Maryland. No Confederates have crossed the Potomac. The Federal force under Wright is about 30,000. Crook has scarcely a regiment able to fight. On Wednesday Wright's advance reoccupied Martinsburg. The Confederates have withdrawn their principal force, but have left a picket just south of the town.

General Sherman has been checked in his advance against Atlanta. His assaults have been unsuccessful. He has ceased them and begun a siege. The Chattahoochee runs a south-western course. Beach Tree Creek is a small stream falling into it near the Dalton and Atlanta Railroad Bridge. Atlanta is six miles south-west of this creek. Decatur is six miles east of Atlanta, and from Decatur the creek flows north-west. It passes about four miles north of Atlanta, and runs through a deep, wide ravine. General Sherman's army consists of seven corps. Sherman, after crossing the Chattahoochee, marched without opposition to Peach Tree Creek. He crossed it. His eastern flank advanced towards Decatur, and his western flank marched from the northward towards Atlanta. After crossing Peach Tree Creek Sherman attacked the enemy, posted along the ravine. He fought for three days, and every attack was repulsed. McPherson led the western half of his army, and Thomas led the eastern half. On Friday last Sherman ceased his direct attacks, and began a siege. Since then his troops have been hard at work digging intrenchments. The losses in the conflicts of last week were heavy, but there is no means of estimating them.

Our latest intelligence from Sherman's camp is to Wednesday. At that time the eastern Federal flank was at Decatur, six miles east of Atlanta. Blair's corps was on the extreme eastern flank. Logan's corps was north of Blair, and Dodge's Corps north-west of Logan. These three corps were commanded by Logan, who succeeds McPherson. West of Dodge was Schofield's corps, it being five miles north-east of Atlanta. Howard's corps was west of Schofield; Hooker's west of Howard, and Palmer's on the western flank, three miles north of Atlanta These four corps were commanded by Thomas. The Federal army is thus encamped in a semi-circle running from a point three miles north of Atlanta to another point six miles east of it. All the troops are in the ravine formed by Peach Tree Creek, and the Confederates are posted on the hills forming the southern slope. The capture of these hills, from which the Confederates could not be driven by assault, is the object of Sherman's siege. Hence the singular announcement that he has an object in view 'more important than the capture of Atlanta.'

The subject of the portion of the crew of the Alabama rescued by the English yacht Deerhound has been referred to a Naval Commission, presided over by Rear-Admiral Shubrick. The Commission has reported that they are prisoners of war, and the Government has endorsed the report. A demand for them will at once be made.

Kentucky is represented as being in a condition bordering on open revolt.

A NORTHERN DEMOCRATIC VIEW OF THE ABORTIVE PEACE NEGOTIATIONS.

To the Editor of The Index.

New York: July 27, 1864.

Sir,—The sensation for the past week has been the peace talk at Niagara. Rumours had been flying about for several weeks of gatherings of Southerners at the Clifton House on the Canada side of the Falls, and of conferences going on between agents of the two Governments, out of which something very important would grow, and latterly those rumours grew into the shape of an overture from the Confederate Government for peace and the initiation of positive negotiations. Mr. Greeley, of the New York Tribune, was named as the agent of Mr. Lincoln, and Mr. George N. Sanders—once, I believe, United States Consul to London—as the Confederate agent in bringing the principal parties together. Suddenly the story took consistency, and got such credit that one day Wall Street believed, without knowing why, in the good chance of immediate peace, and gold went down three or four per cent. in consequence. A journalist got possession of some of the facts, and made out such a circumstantial account for the newspapers, that Mr. Greeley furnished for publication the whole of the correspondence to which he was a party, with so much narrative as gives the exterior history of the affair. He was followed by Mr. Cornwall Jewitt, who has been well known in this country and in Europe as a somewhat officious and generally self-appointed intermediary in trying to effect compromises and produce mediations in order to bring the war to a close. Sanders, and Greeley, and Jewitt are secondary figures in the Niagara tableau; the chief personages are the President of the United States, and certain Southern gentlemen who have really made an earnest attempt to induce him to allow the two Governments to come into conference with each other, with the view of stopping this fratricidal strife if it be possible. They failed under circumstances which fix upon him a new stigma for personal bad faith and unrelenting obstinacy in wrong, and give such a definite and undisguised character to the war he is waging as to make it impossible for the country to hope for peace so long as his administration lasts.

Let me say a few words of the gentlemen who represent in these papers the Confederate side of the correspondence. They are men of such character and position as refute the supposition that they had any other than honourable purposes to be accomplished by honourable means. The probable consequence of these acts, which gives the colour to the charge, is that the Peace party in this country will gain prodigious strength from the development at Niagara of the irreconcilable character of this internecine war, and the malignant purposes and lawless means which have become the fixed and avowed policy of the Government. This is an incident with which the men of the South may be gratified, if it serves to build up a party within the United States which will wrest from the hands of the Administration the powers it has so frightfully misused. But they have no interest in the overthrow of any set of men, or the advancement of any other set in this country, beyond its bearing on the peace and independence of their own. It is nothing to them whether Lincoln, or Fremont, or M'Clellan, or Grant, or Turchin, or Butler be President of the United States. It seems to be impossible for Northern men to divest themselves of the habit of thinking the war to be only a huge and horrible episode in their own domestic politics; and they talk of Southern statesmen attempting to negotiate for peace between two nations as of Kansas or New York politicians squabbling for the control of a convention at Baltimore or Chicago. The Southern men at Niagara had different thoughts.

Clement C. Clay, jun., the first on the list, is a native of Alabama. He was born in Huntsville, where his venerable father, one of the oldest public men in the State, still resides, if not driven from his home by the Yankee army. The elder Clay was Governor of the State, and senator in the United States Congress, during the administration of General Jackson, of whom he was an ardent supporter. The son entered public life early as a thorough disciple of the States'-rights school of Democracy; and after having served in the State Legislature, and held the office of Judge of one of the State Circuits, was elected and reelected to the United States Senate, and was senator at the time the State seceded. He never held any Federal appointment, but has been distinguished by the ardour with which he has always supported the doctrine of State sovereignty and those theories of constitutional construction upon which the South relied for its safety within the Union. When Alabama joined the Southern Confederacy, Mr. Clay was elected the first senator in the Confederate Congress. He had been for some time in infirm health from weak lungs and impaired digestion, and for a year or two abstained from all public exertion. When his term expired he was succeeded in the Senate by Richard W. Walker, the present senator, also from Huntsville, brother of the first Secretary of War in the Confederate Government. Mr. Clay had reached Canada in pursuit of health, where he was trying the waters at St. Catharine's when he undertook this duty. An uncompromising Southern man under the old Union, he is, in training, capacity, and personal character, a representative of the South, of whose trustworthiness no question can be made.

The second on the list, although his name is appended to none of the letters, and he does not appear to have been an acting party in the negotiation, is Jacob Thompson, of Mississippi. Mr. Thompson was, for a long time, a favourite leader of the Democratic party of that State, and several times a representative in the Federal Congress. He was Secretary of the Interior in the Cabinet of Mr. Buchanan, and is ranked in the popular prejudice of the North with the pretended conspiracy among members of that Cabinet to bring on the rebellion. His administration of the department was undeniably odd, his support of Southern rights always decided, and his adherence to the Southern cause early and emphatic. There is a mystery about his connection with the Niagara negotiation, which evidently means something. The use of his name at the opening of the correspondence, and the careful exclusion of it afterwards, have a signification which may be interpreted so as to explain some omissions and apparent discrepancies elsewhere. It is very evident that he was originally assigned to take a part in the preliminary conference, and it was so understood at Washington. The first formal application to Mr. Greeley for the passes to Washington gave the names for which they were wanted as Clement C. Clay, of Alabama, James P. Holcombe, of Virginia, and George N. Sanders, of 'Dixie,' and 'one other.' The answer came back with passes for Clement C. Clay, Jacob Thompson, and James P. Holcombe. Mr. Thompson, though not named, must have been previously understood at Washington to be the 'one other.' The reply to this communication was signed only by Messrs. Clay and Holcombe, with this memorandum in a postscript: 'It is proper to add that Mr. Thompson is not here, and has not been staying with us since our sojourn in Canada.' In the body of that reply these gentlemen say for themselves that they have not been 'accredited' to the President of the United States as 'bearers of propositions looking to the establishment of peace;' and they add, that if the circumstances disclosed in the correspondence—meaning the willingness expressed in the offer of safe conduct to these parties to go to Washington were communicated to Richmond, they would probably be invested with that authority, or 'other gentlemen clothed with full powers' would be immediately sent to Washington. Does this reference to 'other gentlemen' with full powers point to Mr. Thompson as already in possession, to be produced and used when the contingency contemplated in them should arrive? and does it thus explain why Mr. Thompson, who is known to be at St. Catharine's within ten miles of the Clifton House, carefully abstained from taking any part in these preliminary overtures? This, of course, is merely a vague conjecture, of the probability of which you are better able to judge than I, who am not in the secret of Southern plans.

Mr. Holcombe, the third of the Southerners on the list, is a Virginian, whose previous life, pursuits, and personal and social character give assurance of earnestness in the faith which drew him from the seclusion of an unambitious private life, refined associations, and favourite studies, into the turbulent area of revolution. He was Professor of International Law at the University of Virginia, and, giving a powerful and acute intellect to the side of Southern argument, was elected to the first Confederate Congress.

These men constitute a commission, in fact, which in weight of personal character, public position, and trustworthiness, ought to command the respectful attention of any Government with which they might desire to confer, bringing credentials from a Government so undeniably a Government de facto as that at Richmond. When we search for the motives and expectations with which these abortive attempts at negotiation were entered upon by them, we may assume that they understood the wishes of their own Government, and would be supported by it. Their own character and history, and the fixed position taken by their Government since the commencement of the war, forbid us to believe that their efforts at Niagara contemplated the surrender of any substantial point for which the South is contending.

This mail will carry to you all the printed correspondence, with the glosses which have been put upon it by the intermediary agents of both sides—each having a purpose of self-exaltation or self-defence—and by the public journals of the North, which are handling it, with very few exceptions, as aliment for the Presidential excitement. The documents will find a place in The Index as an important part of the history of this war; the events they disclose mark an epoch from which it may be predicted that new political combinations in the North may be dated.

The facts not susceptible of dispute are these. By some intercommunications, which are intrinsically of no consequence to be traced out, Mr. Greeley, editor of the New York Tribune, was induced to believe that, if the Government of the United States would receive at Washington persons accredited from Richmond, a conference with them might lead to the re-establishment of peace. Mr. Greeley wisely left points of form undetermined, and communicated with the President on the subject. The terms of his communication have not been made public, but they were such as to induce the President to place in the custody of Mr. Greeley passports for three named gentlemen of the South for Washington city. But these passports included a designation of the bearers of the safe-conduct as 'accredited from Richmond with propositions looking to the establishment of peace.' They declared themselves not entitled to be received in that character. They had no such extended authority. What they desired was a free conference, untrammeled by specific propositions at the outset, with the hope that a mutual understanding might be effected, on which a negotiation for peace might be based with 'accredited' agents whom the Confederate Government was ready to appoint for that purpose. In reply to this representation, conveyed to him through Mr. Greeley, the President withdrew at once all recognition of parties at Niagara, and put an end to all attempts to bring the two Governments, or agents speaking for the two Governments, into correspondence or conference, by sending his private secretary, Major Hay, with a manifesto so discourteous and absurdly arrogant as to be felt as an insult and an outrage. It was not addressed by name to the gentlemen to whom he had been tendering passports, but was a sort of proclamation addressed, as to persons unknown, 'to whom it may concern,' of which the declarations in substance are, that when the Southern States have returned to their obedience to the authority of the general Government, and have abandoned slavery, and proved the sincerity of their repentance by laying down their arms, whoever shall bring the proofs of this submission to Mr. Lincoln may come in perfect safety, and be assured that, on minor topics, the repentants shall be mercifully dealt with.

This paper was communicated, in the presence of Mr. Greeley, by Major Hay to Mr. Holcombe, and was received by him and his colleague, Mr. Clay, as an indignity. They had been surprised into expecting a response, at least civil in form, to a request they had been led to believe would be complied with without difficulty; they were dismissed with contemptuous slight, and their suggestions responded to indirectly by the public promulgation of conditions extremely offensive and utterly inadmissible, and which were known by Mr. Lincoln from the beginning to be so. They would not charge Major Hay even with an acknowledgment of the receipt of the extraordinary paper, but submitted their views of it to their original correspondent,

Mr. Greeley, wherein they spoke in befitting terms of the conclusions to be drawn from his President's act and the effect it is likely to have on the further prosecution of the war and the prospects of peace. They tell Mr. Greeley that they have no use for the paper sent to them through him. They could not transmit it to Richmond without offering an indignity to their President, dishonouring themselves, and incurring 'the well-merited scorn' of their countrymen. Their Government, they say, is without the inclination, as without the power, to comply with conditions unlike any which ever emanated from the constitutional executive of a free people, and which require of them 'to subvert the social institutions of sovereign States, to overthrow established Constitutions, and to barter away the priceless heritage of free government.' They say that, with an ardent desire of peace pervading the people of the Confederate States, there are few, if any, among them, who will purchase it at the expense of liberty, honour, and self-respect. 'If it can be secured only by their submission to terms of conquest, the generation is yet unborn which will witness its restitution.' They will be rather inspired with fresh energy 'to brave and endure whatever may be yet requisite to preserve to themselves and their children all that gives dignity and value to life, and hope and consolation in death.'

The letter is not long, but it is a powerful and solemn appeal to the judgment of mankind and the justice of Heaven against the bloodthirsty and remorseless despotism which sways the administration of this Republic.

The parties then separated at Niagara. Mr. Greeley withdrew, and gave notice that the President's authorisation would no longer cover United States citizens from the penalties for correspondence with the public enemy, and he and Jewitt returned to make public their several shares in the transaction, and to convert it to their several uses for the future. I have not learned yet what is the view taken of it in the South, nor indeed what is the version by the Southerners at Niagara of their own intentions and expectations. I attach little consequence to the versions in the newspapers and by the intermediary agents of the conversations said to have been held on these topics at Niagara. In the character of the men, the consistent position of their Government, and the guarded language of their correspondence, I think I can gather two conditions which would be included in the Southern ultimatum for any proposition for peace—(1) the sovereignty of the States, and (2) the independence of the Southern Confederacy.

What then are the grounds of expectation of any portion of the Southern people for peace by negotiation with the Government of the United States, of which the cement is a fanatic passion for the unity of territory and the concentration of continental dominions, which they exalt under the name of the Union? I do not imagine that there is any expectation of making a settlement of any kind while this Administration lasts, and can continue to levy armies and get the means for carrying on the war. I think the President was guided by mere political cunning in encouraging the coming of Southern messengers to Washington, in order to obtain from them a proposition which he might gain some political profit in his canvass for election by rejecting. Some of the political managers about him are visibly dissatisfied with him, considering, when his concession had gone so far, that it did not go further, and let in the Southern envoys after opening the door. But the indefinite form in which the possible proposal was left is used by Mr. Lincoln for the same purpose, as proof that the South is in a condition to be speedily constrained to submit if his policy be persevered in, and as a plea for his continuance in office as the public necessity to accomplish that work.

There is no reasonable expectation of making any impression on Mr. Lincoln which was not preceded by a thorough military humiliation and absolute exhaustion of the finances. But there have been growing hopes, North and South, that, with the displacement of Mr. Lincoln and his advisers and the accession of the Democratic party to power, the force of an accomplished fact would be recognised, and the statesmanship of both sections be attracted to some effort for securing, in some way, all the public advantages for which the lost Union was created, consistently with the rights of sovereignty and self-government in the States. I do not know whether these thoughts have matured into a design either North or South, but they prevail in a very extensive degree among reflecting men; and it is thought at the North to be not merely possible, but to be likely, that, for the consideration of early peace, and to secure the independence in fact of the States of the South and the common Government they have erected for themselves, failing all other attempts to stop the war, the South might as an ultimatum consent to a union of confederacies which should possess the powers legitimately belonging to the late Union in regard to all foreign relations, and which should include free internal navigation and commerce and external free trade, but at the same time leave the States paramount within their own jurisdiction against each other, and against the conterminous or rival confederacies. To agitate such a proposition assumes the suspension of hostilities—the admission of the integral character of the States as separate communities deliberating on the reconstruction of union on a new basis—and implies no other obligation than that of a new consent by each of the parties to a new Government.

There are a thousand clamorous outcries to be raised against the entertaining of any such plan of adjustment, and there are a great many reasons for supposing that the Southern States would come with infinite reluctance, if at all, into even so much political connection with the North-east, which has been so faithless to its old compacts, so greedy in its graspings after power, and so sordid and rapacious in using it. I do not imagine they could possibly be brought to consent to any union or league in which New England is not shorn of her capacity to do mischief; and it is not to be disguised that there is a widespread disposition in portions of the North to get rid of New England domination—the more readily if by so doing it would help to recover the South in a new distribution of power within a new Union or circle of confederacies. This is a vague description of vague expectations. But it is of such materials that new combinations are wrought out, which become powerful parties where great minds and great opportunities shape them into a fixed policy. The pending canvass for the Presidency of the North is the great opportunity. Mr. Lincoln has made the issue a plain one. With him the war is to be waged remorselessly and vindictively to eternal separation. His conditions of peace are such as he has no lawful power to impose, and there is no rightful authority anywhere to accept—which enrage, and intensify, and embitter the South and which he seeks to enforce by means inhuman in themselves, and destructive of the freedom of the North. To oppose him, and at the same time to support the war, with the hollow profession of the purpose to restore an impossible Union, is the hypocritical policy of the war Democrats, against which there is great protestation arising among the suffering people, who see in their triumph only the elevation of a new set of hungry politicians who promise what is beyond human power to perform, for the hope of office and with the intent to deceive. Whether the opportunity brings out the men is to be decided, first in the Chicago Convention, and then in the political canvass which follows; for assuredly only in the nomination and success of an unequivocal peace candidate is there any hope for peace, and in early peace only is there possibility of saving anything in the North for liberty—peace on the basis of the admitted sovereignty of the States, and their rights now at least if not in the earlier stages of the war, when the Constitution which made the Union subsisted and was respected, to exercise their own separate will in the formation of a new Government, and a new Union if they can, 'deriving its just powers from the consent of the governed.'

The repulsed negotiators in Canada announce with unmistakable distinctness the resolute purpose of the South to maintain their right of self-government and State independence to the last extremity, protracted if it must be from generation to generation. The Northern party which desires peace and hopes for a united America on any possible conditions, by voluntary accession to new combinations and distributions, alliances, or leagues, must unite on this basis of preliminary concession of entire State liberty of action, and trust to reasoning and enlightened self-interest for an adjustment which may come, but which they are over-sanguine, I believe, who look for in this generation. Time, and a long reign of congenial influences, will be required before the chasms which have separated the North and South can be so bridged over as to make any connection between them, other than that of armed and watchful enemies, practicable or safe. But the North must choose between peace with that filmy hope, and war for eternal hatreds and everlasting separation. He is a fool who does not perceive it, and a knave who, perceiving it, clamours for war, and pretends to hope for union or peace through war.

Yours respectfully,
A NORTHERN PEACE DEMOCRAT.

LETTER FROM NEW ORLEANS.

NEW ORLEANS, LOUISIANA: July 20, 1864.

NORTHERN AND SOUTHERN SOLDIERS—A CONTRAST.

If you would properly judge between the peoples contending in this war, you must examine into the spirit with which they wage it. He is not a good man who brutally maltreats man's body; he is worse who brutalises and perverts his soul. Let the alleged ill-treatment of the negro by the Northerner and the Southerner be tried by this standard.

Europeans are prone to believe the Northern tale, that Southern slavery makes its governing population fierce, cruel, implacable, and to delight in human suffering. Such was the accusation against the Southerner before the war; but the war itself has dispelled this cloud upon his character. The invasion of Pennsylvania by Lee, and the very incursions of Stuart and Morgan in search of horses and supplies, during which the persons of non-combatants were scrupulously respected; their private effects, not taken for use, were left undisturbed; and for these pay was offered in the currency of the invader, or, if in hand, of the invaded—all prove it. This forbearance was shown by men whose own homes had been laid in ashes, their wives and children treated with brutality, and every effort made to bring them to death by starvation.

The Northern people claim that theirs is 'the best Government the sun ever shone upon'—that they brought to New England all the true religion which Old England possessed—and that from their metropolis must be sent out the only missionaries capable of instructing the world in morals, civilisation, good government, and religion. But truth dispels all illusions. By the light of these camp fires and of the battle, you may discern the true character of each. Has the war shown the slaveholding Southerner more cruel, more blood-thirsty, or less kindly disposed towards the weak and defenceless than other men? Has the Pharisaical Yankee, who tells the Southerner to 'stand aside, for I am holier than thou,' proved himself to be free from the traits of the savage, or peculiarly endowed with Christian virtues? By their fruits ye shall know them.

You have been told that at Fort Pillow the negro soldiers were killed after surrender without mercy, that some were burned, and others buried alive. Were this all true, these were men in arms, men of a servile race, bound for generations to the service of those against whom they were waging deadly war, in aid of an invasion by greatly superior forces ravaging and burning the homes of the invaded. But it was not true. The only notice which General Forrest has vouchsafed to this is contained in his address to his army, just published, in which he says, of the force which went out from Memphis under General Sturgis to attack him with 10,000 men, that 'they came forth with threats of vengeance towards you and your commander, for the bloody victory at Fort Pillow, made a massacre only by dastardly Yankee reporters.' The Sturgis expedition was intended as a revenge for Fort Pillow. Ten thousand men, 'complete in infantry, cavalry, and supply trains,' went out to seek Forrest, who had not, he says, over 3,000. Their cry was, 'No quarter to Forrest and his men' A very large proportion of Sturgis's force were negroes. In the presence of General Sturgis and the white officers and troops who accompanied them, and who must have aided and abetted their conduct, what did these negroes do? Let the following extract from a letter written at Okolona, Mississippi, June 14, and published in the Mississippian of the 21st, tell you:—

'You must know that most of Forrest's men are from Western Tennessee. Before the battle, fugitives from the counties through which Sturgis and his troops were advancing came into our camp, detailing incidents which made men who are accustomed to scenes of violence and bloodshed shudder. I cannot recite all the stories of these poor frightened people.

'Robbery, rapine, and the assassination of men and women, were the least of crimes committed; while the "Avengers of Fort Pillow" overran and desolated the country. Rude, unlettered men, who had fought at Shiloh and in many subsequent battles, wept like children when they heard of the enormities to which their mothers, sisters, and wives had been subjected by the negro mercenaries of Sturgis. The mildest, most placable of our soldiers became maddened when they heard how the persons of their kinswomen were violated. The negroes were regardless of the age, condition, sex, or entreaties of their victims. In one instance the grandmother, daughter, and granddaughter were each, in the same room, held by the drunken brutes and subjected to outrages by the bare recital of which humanity is appalled.

'A young wife, enceinte, taken to a negro encampment and tied to stakes driven in the ground, was made to minister to the hell-born passions of a dozen fiends. Death, in mercy, came to her relief. A little boy, who sought to protect his mother, was brutally bayonetted. When savage lusts were gratified, the victims, here and there, were burned in their dwellings. Insanity, in some instances, came to the relief of sufferings such as never before were inflicted upon human creatures by remorseless fiends in human shape. Terror and the agony of hopeless shame, and famine, fire, and bloodshed, and the assassination of the helpless and unoffending, marked the progress of the "avengers of Fort Pillow."'

To these outrages an end for the time was put by Forrest's victory at Tishemingo Creek, where he utterly defeated Sturgis with a loss to him of 17 guns, 250 wagons, 3,000 stand of arms, and 2,000 prisoners, besides 2,000 killed and wounded, an estimate under that given by the returning remnants of his force.

A Southern newspaper, the Sunny South, tells the same story. It says General Sturgis brought with him 2,500 negroes, who perpetrated the greatest outrages on their way out. Seven of them violated the person of one young lady, who, it is supposed, will die. They burnt houses and delighted in displaying acts of cruelty. It also tells how, elsewhere in Lower Mississippi, 'the Yankees captured in a late raid Mr. Nat Hest, one of General Wirt Adams' cavalry, turned him over to the negroes, who stripped him, gave him 500 lashes, and then shot him. The horrible scene was witnessed by three ladies, who were concealed. His body was horribly mangled.' I have no doubt of the truth of these relations, for I have heard the negroes here urged to similar conduct.

In contrast with this let me give you the following letter from some division commander, name to me unknown, in General Johnston's grand army, to a friend in Georgia. You will see, by the way, that he anticipated that Johnston would yet fall behind the Chattahoochie river, as he seems to have done. It was a private letter, but the recipient thought it too good to be kept from the public eye:

'Some four miles N.E. of Marietta,
'June 16, 1864.

'My dear Judge,—I could not now go much into detail as to the "situation." We are occupying a long and extended line of battle on a ridge which crosses the railroad, some four miles from Marietta. Our lines must be several, perhaps five, miles in length. The enemy are in front; both sides entrenched; Sherman afraid to make the attack, for which Johnston is quietly waiting. Yesterday, my division was under fire again, as it has often been since this campaign opened. We did not accomplish much, and lost some men.

'The army is in fine tone, and would make a splendid fight any day. General Johnston is pursuing a safe course, and doubtless a wise one. He is thought by some to be overcautious, and not sufficiently enterprising: and to have let slip, perhaps, one or two excellent opportunities to strike. Still, my own confidence, and that of the army, in his skill and ability, is great, and we are satisfied he will seize the first occasion that he regards as favourable to make a blow. We think that blow will be a stunning one. To get a chance to deliver it, it may be necessary to fall back across the Chattahoochie.

'But the greatest confidence is not so much in the skill of our generals. First and foremost it is in Providence. His hand is as plainly discernible in this struggle as in the history of His ancient people under Moses. When His time has arrived, He will give us the desired opportunity. Then my confidence is in the stout hearts, and strong arms, and heroic devotion of our men. The world has never produced a race equal to these Southern men, and more and more I admire the heroes of the ranks. Their uncomplaining, uncalculating fortitude and endurance, their unshaken and unselfish fidelity to the cause, their wonderful courage and irrepressible spirits, their religious enthusiasm, all excite admiration, and produce a conviction that a superhuman influence controls and directs them.

'Johnston is wary and watchful, and Sherman must be far more perfect than I take him to be if he does not soon commit the blunder that Johnston will turn to account.

'The saddest day we have had was the day General Polk fell, the 14th. Just a week before he spent two or three hours at my tent near Lost Mountain, and gave me, in his striking way, an account of his baptising Hood at Dalton and Johnston at Cassville since the campaign began. He was full of life and spirits, and buoyant with hope and confidence. A few days afterwards, when shifting towards the right, I passed his quarters, and, dismounting, had a few pleasant cheerful words with him. That was the last time I saw him. He was a good man, a true patriot, a brave soldier, and I felt that he was my friend. His fall cast a gloom over the entire army. Such victims enhance the sacredness of our cause, and give us an additional claim to independence.

'I am happy to say that I have a good command—that I am on the best possible terms with officers and men, who seem not only to give me their confidence, but also most affectionate regard. They have already done good service, and will do more. Your partiality alludes to my services to the country. I do not allow myself to think of promotion, but endeavour to keep steadily before me these sole aims—to do my whole duty, as well as possible, to God, my country, and my men; and to have a good report from the rank and file is far preferable to promotion.

'But I am spinning out this note to a tedious length. The great battle may come off any day, or may be deferred for some time yet. When it occurs we shall triumph.—Ever sincerely your friend, ——.'

Contrast the negro as led 'and educated] by a Butler and a Banks, a Sherman and a Burnside, with such warriors as Stonewall Jackson, Leonidas Polk, and such Christian Generals as Lee, Johnston, Hood, and the gallant writer of this letter.

SURGEONS IN THE CONFEDERATE ARMY.—Our contemporary, the Lancet, in its replies to correspondents, refers to 'the Editor of THE INDEX' various enquirers desirous of obtaining surgeon's commissions in the Confederate army. In consequence, we have received so many applications as to call for a uniform reply through our columns. We beg, therefore, to inform the gentlemen who have written to us, that there is no agent of the Confederate States in Europe, authorised to issue or even to promise commissions of any kind in the Confederate army, or, indeed, to hold out any encouragements whatever. Competent practitioners would, doubtless, be well received, and find abundant scope for usefulness, but they must take the risk of obtaining commissions, and bear the expense, which is a far more formidable obstacle than the danger of a journey through the blockade.

'EDERAL BARBARITIES IN VIRGINIA.

IE following letter has been addressed by Ex-Governor ɔtcher, of Virginia, to the Mayor of Richmond. The iitted passage relates to personal matters :—

Lexington, Va.: July 5, 1864.

Finding that the Yankees would take the town on Saturday .th), I left home near midnight, Friday night, and went to ; Island, in Bedford, where I remained till Wednesday ɔrning following, when, hearing the Vandals had left, I urned. I had previously heard that my house had been rned, with all its contents. The threats made by the inkees against me for the past two years satisfied me that ɔy would destroy my house when they came to Lexington; t I always supposed that they would allow the furniture and family's clothing to be removed. In this, however, I was appointed.

When the Yankees took possession of the town, Dr. Paton, dical Director for Hunter's army, and who hails from Marion unty, Virginia, went to my house, told my wife he was well, and said he must have a room in the house. He took room, supped and breakfasted, and, when breakfast was arly over, remarked in a manner half jocular, half earnest, to zzie, that it was the last meal she would take in the house. ortly after he left without taking leave of any of the family, r was he again seen by any of them.

The threats made by soldiers on Saturday evening induced y wife to fear the house would be burned, and she expressed r fears in the hearing of Dr. Paton and Captain Towns, of ew York. Captain Towns very promptly said that, I being private citizen, and the house being private property, burning would be an inexcusable outrage, and proposed at once to go Hunter's head-quarters and ascertain. He went, and was rected by Hunter to assure my wife that the house would not disturbed. The sequel shows that the sole object of this surance was to quiet her apprehensions, and thus prevent ything from being removed.

About half-past eight o'clock A.M. (Saturday) Captain Berry id his provost guard rode up, and the officer called for my life. She came to the door, when Berry informed her that he as ordered by Hunter to fire the house. She replied there ust be some mistake, and asked for the order. He said it was verbal order. She then said to him, 'Can it not be delayed ntil I can see General Hunter?' 'The order is peremptory,' replied, 'and you have five minutes to leave the house.' he then asked leave to remove her mother's, sister's, her own, id her children's clothing, which was insolently refused.

Immediately thereafter camphene was poured on the parlour oor, and ignited with a match. In the meantime my daughter had athered up an armful of clothing, and was going out when he iscovered her, ran forward, and fired the clothing in her arms. e then poured camphene in the wardrobes, bureau drawers, nd ignited the clothing—taking out my clothing, which he aid he intended to take North.

Every house on my lot was burned save a small granary ver my icehouse. Not a particle of flour, meat, or anything ible was left, all having been carried off on Saturday.

My mother, now in her seventy-eighth year, lives on the lot joining my own, having with her one of her grandchildren nd servant. After my property had been fired the fiends fired er stable, located about forty feet from the house, with no her view than to burn her out also. The house caught twice, nd would have been consumed but for the untiring efforts of aptain Towns, who made his men carry water and extinguish he flames. The captain behaved like a gentleman towards my wn and my mother's family.

Generals Averill, Crook, Sullivan, and Duffle denounced the hole proceedings as an outrage, in violation of all the princiles of civilised warfare, and stated that Hunter alone was esponsible for these atrocities.

I am truly, and in haste, your friend,

Jos. Mayo, Esq., Richmond, Va. JOHN LETCHER.

IRISH EMIGRATION.

IR. JUSTICE FITZGERALD, in opening the commission or the county of Cork, Ireland, addressed the grand ury, in reference to Irish emigration, in the following erms:—

Probably I shall not transgress the bounds of duty by calling our attention to a matter of more than ordinary interest, of which I have been reminded myself within the last two or three days by what I have seen—namely, the increasing tide of emigration. The subject to which I now propose to draw your attention is a proclamation issued in the course of the present month by direction of his Excellency Lord Carlisle. In that proclamation, which is issued under the Foreign Enlistment Act and in the enforcement of its provisions, I find a statement —'And whereas there is reason to believe that many of her Majesty's subjects have been induced to go and embark from various parts of the United Kingdom to the United States of America by false and delusive promises of employment on railways and other public works in the said United States, and of high and greatly remunerative wages for their labour in such employment, and have, after their arrival in the said United States, been further induced to enter the military service of the said States and serve therein as soldiers against the Confederate States of America, contrary to their own original intention and in contempt of Her Majesty's royal proclamation.' The proclamation then proceeds to call the attention of all to the consequences they may involve themselves in by being parties or privy to such transactions. Gentlemen, in adverting to the increasing tide of emigration, I am not about to enter with you on any debateable ground. I do not propose to consider whether the economic laws which perhaps guide the movement are capable of being controlled, or to consider whether emigration may or may not be carried beyond its legitimate limits, or whether an opinion broached by some may be well founded —that it is the mission, the destiny, of the people of this island to become the pioneers of civilisation in the Western world. But what I propose to call your attention to is a proof of the statement contained in the proclamation, and our duty as far as we can to enforce it. Any one who knows, and indeed we all know much of, the government of Lord Carlisle, feels quite assured that such a proclamation would never be issued by that sagacious and prudent nobleman without a foundation in fact and a necessity calling for its issue. But we have before us, and every day it comes under our own notice, the circumstances which have led to this. There is no doubt that crowds of our young men are leaving this country—that they are induced to leave it by the promise of employment in America—but that shortly after they arrive there, some voluntarily, some by fraud, and more by force, are induced to enrol themselves in the army of the Northern States; and, gentlemen, unfortunately the page of history tells us how, when they have adopted that course, they have been ruthlessly sacrificed. I might advert, for the truth of that allegation, to an answer given recently by the Under-Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs to a question propounded in reference to those very proceedings in the House of Commons. He stated that those misguided young persons who are tempted under various pretences to leave Ireland, on arriving in the United States were actually imprisoned for some time, and kept without sufficient food, and then plied with whisky, when, in a state of intoxication, they were prevailed upon to enter the army of the United States. If I had nothing more than that, it would justify my statement, that they were the victims of fraud and force, and find themselves against their will serving in the Northern army. It appears to me that in this great county, and addressing the grand jury of this county, representing one-sixth of the entire island both in territory and population, and through which or from which that great tide of emigration flows, it is legitimate for me now to call your attention to this act of the administration of Lord Carlisle, and to impress on you the necessity which rests on you all—I would say on us all—as far as we can, by warning, by precept, and by advice, to endeavour to deter or dissuade those who are leaving us from entering on this course. You may tell them, gentlemen, with truth, that in this gigantic and profligate quarrel, which has assumed a fiendish character in America, there is no glory to be gained—they have no interest in the question but the interest of peace—none beyond that, and the sooner for them peace is reestablished the better. But you may tell them that if they become enrolled in that army they will be exposed wherever danger is rife—they can earn neither honours nor rewards. If successful, the honours and rewards will be gathered by those who use and despise them, whilst on the other hand the chances are one hundredfold that few that enter that army will survive. If they escape plague and pestilence, they are almost certain to leave their bones on some of those battle-fields which have been well designated in a New York paper recently as having become slaughter-pens and nothing better. Our experience tells us, and we may inform them of the danger to which they will be exposed. The correspondent of the Times, in one of those letters which will afterwards form the history of this struggle, in a description of a Virginian battle and the gallantry of the Irish regiments there, states: 'The spectator can remember nothing but their desperate courage, and regret it was not exhibited in a holier cause.' I should rather have used the expression, 'in a cause less unholy,' for unholy indeed it is, especially for those who, first landing in that country, engage as mercenaries. In addition to pointing out the danger, you may well warn them of the consequences. Point out to them that if they should escape the carnage, if they should be among the survivors, they must carry this reflection with them, that they are engaged in a quarrel in which they have no business, and bear on them the brand of murderers in the eye of every Christian. You may also point out this, that no result can possibly be expected to arise for them but ruin, and possibly, or probably, death. All I can say is, that if by your exertions you can deter but a few from following the same course, or if your exertions should avail in the slightest degree in weighing down the scale for peace, great will be your reward. I hope you will not think that I have transgressed the bounds of duty in calling your attention to this proclamation; but you will agree with me it is incumbent on us all as far as we can, by advice and otherwise, to prevent those unfortunate young men who are in such crowds leaving our shores, from following a course which will be sure to end in their ruin.

THE MILITARY SITUATION OF THE NORTH.

(From the New York Daily News.)

THE circumstances surrounding Mr. Lincoln are critical. They present grave reasons why he may be supposed sincerely anxious for peace. The clap-trap and falsehood of military 'news' play no frauds upon him. He stands behind the scenes. The God of War, who struts so boastingly in the authorised bulletins, he knows to be but a braggart. General Grant, 'Unconditional Surrender,' the 'Hero of the Wilderness,' his cunning Excellency knows to have proved, in fact, a total failure. The 'siege of Richmond,' the 'investment of Petersburg,' the 'isolation of Lee's army,' and all the other glowing headings of the authorised versions of the campaign, Mr. Lincoln knows to be but grim jokes. He is more fully informed than perhaps any one else, that Grant's army, almost annihilated on its way, stands to-day, in spirit and in fact, a mere wreck of itself, cooped up within its intrenchments in a state of siege. He is doubtless convinced that, notwithstanding the accidental escape of that city during the late formidable raid into Maryland, Washington is perhaps this moment in much more imminent danger than Richmond of siege and sack. These considerations may well dispose the mind of our autocratic joker to measures of compromise.

The campaign in the West may be supposed, from the President's paid sources of knowledge, to point a homily in the interests of peace. The capture of Atlanta, if effected to-morrow, he is doubtless aware, would bear little or no weight in the final result of his bloody enterprise. A few more or less valuable workshops and factories represent all that is specially valuable at that point to the uses of the war, and constitute the sum total of the reasons why it is more important to the Confederates than any other position they have abandoned along the hundred and twenty miles of their stubborn retreat. A railroad crossing though it be, that city does not hold the key of all the railroad communications between the Confederate States of the Gulf and those of the Atlantic. Opeleika or Macon, towns about a hundred miles to the southward of that city, must be occupied before all those lines of carriage shall have been disturbed.

But railway communication between Alabama and South Carolina supposed to be cut off, what will be accomplished by that means towards the conquest of the South? Trains running to a point on one side of the interruption, and to another on the other side, the interval between those termini would, if necessary, be supplied with transportation by horse power. But there is really no military necessity for active intercourse between those Confederate States of the centre and that of the sea. Each of these groups is like the Southern States beyond the Mississippi, able to maintain its own defence unaided by the other. Central Alabama and South-western Georgia constitute Hood's sources of supply. The loss of Atlanta involves thus, as Mr. Lincoln is fully informed, neither more nor less than that of a few factories and workshops.

THE REMOVAL OF GENERAL JOHNSTON.

(From the Richmond Sentinel, July 22.)

THE very few instances in which the President has exercised the power of removal, and the known notorious incompetency of the officers heretofore removed by him, should go far to satisfy every one that nothing but the most urgent State necessity has compelled him to relieve General Johnston of his command. The fewness of removals, considered in connection with the success of our arms, shows that the President is a good judge of military merit and ability, makes good appointments, and has seldom reason to repent his selection.

We believe that where he has acted solely on the dictates of his own judgment he has made no mistakes; but much deference is due to the opinions and wishes of large bodies of the people, not because they are the best judges of military worth and efficiency, but because it is sometimes better to do wrong, and satisfy the people, than to do right and disoblige them. The President has had ample opportunity to test the military worth of Johnston; those who condemn the removal have had comparatively none, and no matter what had been their opportunities, they know nothing about military affairs or the qualifications of military men.

We all voted for the President as our ruler, because we thought him best fitted to command, and we to obey. We, who selected him to drive the car of state, should not now perplex and embarrass him by seizing hold of the reins ourselves. Nothing is more dangerous than for a nervous, scary rider to seize hold of the reins when the horse threatens to kick or run off.

Republican government is a monstrous and absurd failure if the people have no faith in the men they select for office, and find it necessary to dictate to and rule their rulers. All the attempts to dictate measures and make appointments for the President, proceed from an ignorant, reckless, and corrupt spirit of demagogism.

In the beginning of the war it was exhibited in a perfect tornado of anger with the President because he preferred making appointments of men as officers who had military knowledge and qualifications, rather than of those who knew nothing about military affairs, and who were too old to learn anything about them, for the favourites with the ignorant demagogues, who abused West Point and the President, were stump-orators over fifty. Time has since amply proved that West-Pointers—men who have learned the science of war at school and its practice in camp—are best fitted to command large armies. Old-stump orators may stumble into victories, but they will generally fail; and it is almost treasonable to place them in command when their failures may do serious harm.

The people have seen enough of Johnston's retreats to satisfy them that, if left alone by the Government, he had no idea of making a stand this side of the Gulf of Mexico. If he could not hold the strong position of Kenesaw Mountain, much less would he have held the weak one about Atlanta. The people do not generally know that all the while that Johnston has been retreating before Sherman he has had an army approaching nearer in numbers to that of his adversary than Lee ever had when he has won his great victories. Indeed, at Dalton, and ever since he left there, his army has been large enough to justify and render it his duty to deliver battle.

The Whig makes a new issue. The ground of its complaint is not the removal of Johnston, but the preference which it supposes was given to Hood over Hardee. Does the Whig know whether Hardee would have accepted the appointment? In fact, Hardee had been tendered, and had refused the command of the army of the Tennessee.

Be this as it may, the President, after anxious consultation with the best military authorities, concluded to appoint Hood. No man in the Confederacy was so much interested in retaining Johnston in command, if he were likely to win a victory, as the President. No man had so good an opportunity to form a correct opinion of his merits. He came, under these circumstances, to the deliberate conclusion that Johnston was unfit to command, and removed him.

If there be any error in the case, it is that the removal was not made long ago. Lincoln delights in taking off heads as much as the King of Dahomey or the Emperor of Hayti. President Davis has a nice sense of honour, sets a high value on reputation, and removes none but the notoriously incompetent.

It is because he is so reluctant to remove officers that he is so cautious and fastidious in selecting and appointing them. We believe the appointment of General Hood a good one, not only from what we know of his past history, but because he has been selected by the President, who seems to be an admirable judge of the relative merits of men, and finds no occasion to repent to-day for the appointments made yesterday.

THE LATE GENERAL POLK.—The following order has been issued respecting the death of General Polk:—

General Orders, No. 81.—It is with profound sorrow that the Major-General Commanding announces to the troops of this Department the death of their late commander, Lieutenant-General Leonidas Polk. On the 14th instant, in a skirmish near Marietta, Georgia, this gallant warrior and Christian gentleman yielded up his life a costly sacrifice to his country's liberties. It would be superfluous here to recount the services of this lamented patriot. They are already before the world, and will form one of the brightest pages in the history of this memorable struggle. His high administrative talents, his distinguished gallantry on many battle-fields, his eminent virtues, and kind and genial traits of character, have alike won the admiration and love of his countrymen. From the toils and cares of this fitful existence, from the blood-red fields of battle, the Christian soldier has passed to that eternal rest which it was ever the aim of his life to secure. Let his memory ever be fresh among us, and let each strive to imitate his example and emulate his virtues. As a mark of honour to the distinguished dead, the colours of the troops of this command will be draped in mourning for the period of thirty days from the receipt of this order. By command of Major-General S. D. LEE.

SIGNIFICANT EXTRACTS.—We have been kindly furnished with the subjoined extracts from private letters received by the last mail. The writers enjoy unsurpassed facilities for accurate observation, and have every interest to keep their correspondents on this side advised of the 'signs of the times':—'New York, July 30. The war is over. The draft must be either a failure or a revolution. In this city the working classes are organised for resistance.'—'Washington, July 29. Forney leaves for Europe next week. His friends have preceded him.'—'New York, July 30. The Government has tabooed the publication of any army news here by the papers, and has forbidden them to publish this order.'

TO OUR FRIENDS AND SUBSCRIBERS.

The Index was established in May 1862, in the darkest hour of Confederate fortunes, by earnest friends of Southern Independence, with the distinctly expressed object of being the representative, in English journalism, of a gallant and struggling people appealing to the world not only for political, but still more for moral recognition. Since accepting this great trust, The Index has unceasingly laboured, by the combined aid of English and of Southern writers, to enlarge and extend the common ground upon which two nations may cordially meet, which need only to understand each other in order to cherish the warmest mutual appreciation and lasting friendship. The chief and almost the sole difficulty has been, and is still, the callous indifference of the British Government on the one hand, and, on the other, the perplexity, to the European mind, of the unsolved and unprecedented problems involved in the management and education of four millions of the African race, intermingled with a population of the highest Caucasian type. This difficulty could be met only by a liberal fairness to every shade of honest opinion, by an inflexible adherence to truth under all circumstances, and by a bold avowal of convictions, even though ill received. The Index does not claim to be neutral, but it claims to be independent in the highest sense of that word. It is because it must reflect and appeal to, at one and the same time, the public opinion of two countries as yet only imperfectly acquainted, that this somewhat unusual self-description is called for.

Thanks to arrangements now in successful operation, by which the Letters of regular Correspondents and Newspapers from all parts of the Confederate States are received within from twenty-five to thirty days from their date, The Index is always enabled to present the very Latest Direct News from the South, as well as a faithful reflex of the tone and spirit of the Southern Press.

All communications intended for publication should invariably be addressed to 'the Editor of The Index, 13 Bouverie Street, E.C.,' and unless authenticated by a responsible name, can receive no attention.

THE INDEX.

THURSDAY, AUGUST 11, 1864.

Atlanta.

General Hood has inaugurated his command by a staggering, if not a decisive, blow at the Federal army in Georgia. The details of the engagement, or series of engagements, before Atlanta are still wanting; but sufficient is known to warrant the assertion that the claim of a Federal victory is without a shadow of foundation, and that Atlanta is likely to prove as troublesome to Sherman as Petersburg has been to Grant. We stated last week our utter disbelief in the alleged Confederate disaster and the reported occupation of Atlanta by the invaders, and events have justified the view we then expressed. There was something very ominous to the hopes of the Federals in the fact, that six days after the battle, in which General Macpherson fell, no official account of the engagement had made its appearance. The Cincinnati Gazette could publish a lengthened correspondence, full of extravagances, but still furnishing an apparently correct version of the movements which preceded the battle, of the attack and the defence, and even an estimate of the losses on either side. Yet, up to the 24th ult., the engagement having taken place on the 22nd, either General Sherman had failed to communicate with Mr. Stanton, or the latter dared not publish the intelligence; and the North, which had had its hopes raised to the highest pitch by reports of Hood's defeat and the capture of Atlanta, was ultimately compelled to console itself with the reflection that General Hood only claimed 17 colours, 13 guns, and 2,000 prisoners, and that Sherman's army was after all closing in upon the city. It might have been worse; for it is evident from the published accounts that no army ever had a narrower escape of complete disaster than the unwieldy masses shattered by the Confederate attack at Peachtree Creek.

For the moment the campaign in Georgia transcends in interest the other pending operations of the war. It may be as well, therefore, to follow somewhat closely the movements which led to the battle before the defences of Atlanta. Preceding accounts left the two armies face to face on the opposite sides of the Chattahoochie. The direct approach to Atlanta was covered by formidable works, such as not even Sherman, with his great superiority of force, dared encounter. But there are very few works which cannot be turned. Sherman marched the bulk of his army some fourteen miles along the north bank of the river, and effected his passage without opposition. He succeeded in turning the defences of the Chattahoochie, but he thereby lost the most available route for an army, and was compelled to advance by a line which exposed his various corps to constant danger of isolation and attack in detail by the Confederates. On the 18th the line of battle, some fourteen miles in length, was formed, and the whole army advanced by the left. Some three or four miles from Atlanta is a small stream, Peachtree Creek, covering the city north and east. The banks of this creek were held by Confederate skirmishers, and protected by earthworks; but again a direct attack was avoided by a movement threatening to take the defences in reverse, and the Federals effected the crossing with comparatively trifling loss. The army still pushed on with its dangerously-extended line, the left reaching Decatur on the Augusta and Atlanta Railroad, and tearing up the rails, the right resting on the Chattahoochie. So extended a front necessitated some gaps in the line, and of this the Confederate generals took advantage. An attack was made, on the morning of the 22nd, on the extreme left, by Hardee's corps, which was attended with complete success, and in which Macpherson fell. Later in the day, in consequence of Macpherson having taken ground so far to the left, there was an interval of some three miles between the centre and the right. Orders were given to close up from the right, and the whole right wing was put in motion. The country here is thickly wooded, intersected with deep ravines and small creeks, and quite unfitted for the combined movements of the corps of a large army. In the advance a few Confederate skirmishers were captured, whose object it was to deceive the enemy as to the strength and position of their army. Gradually the Federals closed up; an important ridge was occupied, muskets were laid aside, and whole divisions took to the inevitable spade, when from some woods immediately in front, with cheers that told what was coming, a dense column of Confederates poured out, charged along the open, and fell upon the startled Federals. The skirmishers were swept away at once, line after line of the Federals was broken, and for a time, notwithstanding their undoubted gallantry, the total defeat of the Federal army seemed imminent. The right wing was gradually forced back; the Confederates penetrated through the gaps almost to the bridges over Peachtree Creek; guards were stationed at each bridge to prevent a regular stampedo; and although the correspondents of the New York press talk about prodigies of valour, of one division taken by surprise beating back the whole Confederate army, and of another charging five times its number, there is plenty of internal evidence in these accounts to prove that at more than one spot there was a panic and a rout, and that it was only the numbers of the Federals that enabled them to stand up against the bold and skilful attack of General Hood, and the well-nigh fatal blunder of their own commander. Had the Confederates succeeded in driving back the Federal right on the Chattahoochie and holding the bridges of Peachtree Creek, Sherman's army could not have escaped a great disaster. Hood would have been on their line of communication, would have captured their trains, and compelled them to fight, not for the possession of Atlanta, but for a line of retreat. The numbers and the stubborn gallantry of the Federal troops saved the army. But the battle was not the less a Confederate victory, and General Hood has added the reputation of a skilful strategist to his fame as a dashing leader. The attack was made in heavy masses upon a weak point of the enemy's line, entirely unprepared for the onslaught. It would be ridiculous to suppose that the Federals, taken by surprise, could, for any length of time, have borne up against this onslaught by good troops daringly led without heavy reinforcements. An hour or two must have elapsed before the dispositions could be made to bring up effectual relief. There can be no doubt that within that time much mischief was done, and that General Hood's 13 cannon and 2,000 prisoners feebly represent the extent of the Federal disaster.

Another battle is reported as having taken place on the 23rd. On this we forbear to comment. Nothing whatever is known or stated as to its results. All that we know is, that at the latest date Sherman's army was still 'closing up;' that the fortifications of the town were intact; and that there was every evidence of a resolute intention to hold it to the last extremity. In fact, Sherman's position was, according to Southern accounts, extremely critical. His cavalry had been defeated at Decatur; Hardee was reported in his rear; his army resting on the direct road between Chattanooga and Atlanta, but considerably to the east of the latter town. He had failed to invest, or to cut the communications of the city. He had to look forward to regular siege operations during the months of August and September, to bring up his siege-train, to find forage, and to obtain supplies 130 miles from his base of operations. We believe it to be an impossibility for Sherman to maintain his position for any length of time before Atlanta, even if his communications could be kept open. But if Hood can afford to despatch Hardee to operate in his rear, and if Forest's cavalry press closely upon his only line of retreat, his stay before Atlanta must be brief, and his retrograde movement from Georgia as rapid as his escape from Mississippi in the spring of the year.

General Grant's protracted inactivity has at last come to an end, and another great movement is in progress from which the usual results are promised. The siege of Petersburg is said to be abandoned, and a 'demonstration' against Fort Darling substituted, together with a move upon Richmond along the north bank of the James River. Some fighting had taken place in this quarter, and the capture of four guns and fifty prisoners is announced as a set-off against disappointment in Georgia, disaster in the Shenandoah Valley, and panic in Pennsylvania. General Hunter's troops have suffered another defeat from the enemy they were to have annihilated; and pursuers and pursued appear to have recrossed the Northern frontier. A large force of Confederate cavalry has reached Chambersburg, Pennsylvania; another body is in Maryland; and there are rumours that this time something more than a raid is intended. If so, we may estimate with tolerable accuracy General Grant's chances of reaching Richmond this summer. Possibly the alarm at Washington may account for his renewed activity. If he has abandoned Petersburg, and transferred his whole army to the north bank of the James River, we shall be curious to hear what his encomiasts in this country will say about the new change of programme. It will be quite evident that he has abandoned all hope of starving out Lee's army, and that the 20,000 or 30,000 men he has lost south of the Appomattox have been recklessly driven to slaughter, only to illustrate in deeper tints the worst failure of the Federal war administration.

Mr. Fessenden's New Loan.

The new Secretary of the United States Treasury bids fair to emulate the sudden 'changes of base' of his military coadjutor in Virginia; and if he has not shown the same obstinate tenacity in his desperate task as General Grant, we may fairly allow him credit for at least equal vigour and inventiveness. Already, during his brief term of office, more than one policy has been initiated or abandoned. His first act, the repeal of the obnoxious penal legislation against the sale of gold, commended him to the New York financiers. It was further understood in his favour that he would not imitate the ruinous example of his predecessor in undertaking to rig the gold market with the coin belonging to the national creditors. But still the premium on gold would not decline, or rather the value of greenbacks would not improve, and the unplaced balance of Mr. Chase's loan remained unplaced. It was, therefore, promptly withdrawn, and another loan on more rational conditions was offered to the banks. This also proving a failure, even more completely than Mr. Chase's loan, Mr. Fessenden, nothing daunted, boldly appeals to the people to come to the rescue of the Government. The terms which he offers are certainly not inviting to investors with a view to profit, and are such as to absolutely exclude foreign capital. He asks for $200,000,000, giving no other security for the capital than the exchange of a promise to pay in three years for an unfulfilled promise to pay on demand, and meanwhile bearing interest in a currency which is making daily downward strides on the road to utter worthlessness. As a simple matter of speculation it is doubtless better for the holder of greenbacks to buy real estate or stocks with them, or even gold or foreign exchange at present prices, than to lend them to Mr. Fessenden at 7.30 per cent. interest payable in greenbacks. If the two hundred millions, when lent, could be withdrawn from circulation, the lenders might derive the indirect advantage of the consequent appreciation of the remainder; but the loan is confessedly made to meet, as far as it will go, the most urgent of the current liabilities of the Government, and therefore of necessity must be reabsorbed into circulation as rapidly as it is paid in by the patriotic public.

Still, Mr. Fessenden's scheme is not altogether a bad one. He tests, without incautiously trusting too far, the willingness of the mass of the population to continue the war with individual sacrifices of money, and if the response is at all encouraging his next demands will be more comprehensive. As a temporary expedient or 'makeshift,' also, this new loan should not be too hastily condemned. Mr. Fessenden must have money immediately, or the ordinary everyday machinery of the Government comes to a fatal stop. The audited and recognised portion of floating debt alone exceeds the $200,000,000 now asked for, and unless an instalment at least is paid on these heavy arrears, the soldiers and sailors will mutiny, and the contractors must discharge their operatives. In this dire extremity Mr. Fessenden's choice lay between two forms of the same evil. Not being able, except in small driblets from Californin, to procure gold or the equivalent of gold, he must necessarily increase the volume of irremediable currency by at least $200,000,000, and thus still further accelerate at a most critical period its fearfully rapid downward tendency. This increase must either take place by the immediate issue of more greenbacks for the required amount, the worst form; or it might be made by persuading the people to accept it in a qualified form by the issue of Treasury notes of large denominations, bearing interest, and for this double reason slow to enter into the general circulation. Mr. Fessenden is now trying this latter form, and that the experiment is not unfavourably viewed in financial circles may be inferred from the fact that, despite the adverse news from Georgia, gold remained substantially at the same quotation at the latest advices from New York.

While we thus leave the new Secretary of the Federal Treasury to experiment upon the pecuniary value of the 'patriotic' ardour which a republican people may feel in the attempt to subjugate another republican people, it will not be unprofitable to reduce to a compendious and easily intelligible statement the confused figures of Federal indebtedness and the ascertainable means of the United States for paying the same. We shall confine ourselves in this statement to the acknowledged official statistics, although competent authorities, not unfriendly to the Northern cause, make the balance-sheet appear immensely more unfavourable to the United States. In the 'National Almanack' for 1864, an authorised publication based upon official data, we find the following as the various loans contracted by the United States since the period of secession, and outstanding on Sept. 30, 1863:—

Title of Loan	Time to mature	Outstanding, Sept. 30, 1863.
Loan of February, 1861 .	20 years	18,415,000
Treasury Notes, Mar. 2, 1861	2 ,,	512,900
Oregon War Loan . . (March 2, 1861)	20 ,,	1,016,000
Twenty-year Sixes, 1861 .	20 ,,	50,000,000
7.30 Notes, 1861 . .	3 ,,	139,679,000
Demand Notes, 1861 .	Demand	2,022,173
Twenty-year Sixes, 1861 .	20 years	320,000
Five-twenties, 1862 . .	5 to 20 years	278,511,500
Temporary Loan, 1862 .	30 days	104,934,103
Certificates of Indebtedness	1 year	156,918,437 (March1862)

So that already, at that comparatively early period of the war, we find the United States burdened with a war debt, the annual interest on which, at the minimum of 6 per cent. only—and the average interest is much higher—would amount to upwards of $45,000,000.

The same publication gives the following as the amount of indirect loans raised to the same date, viz. September 30, 1863, in the shape of non-interest-bearing or paper currency then in circulation:—

United States Notes, 1862 . .	$147,767,114
,, ,, July 11, 1862 .	150,000,000
Postal Currency, July 17, 1862 .	17,766,057
United States Notes (new issue), March 3, 1863 . . .	104,969,937
	$420,503,108

Without, therefore, including the indebtedness prior to the outbreak of the war, and which, indeed, it is scarcely worth considering when dealing with such gigantic figures, we find that the United States exceeded their revenue from all sources, between February 8, 1861, and September 30, 1863, as follows:—

In Loans (interest payable in specie) .	$752,329,113
In Paper Currency, in circulation on September 30, 1863	420,503,108
	$1,172,832,221

This excess of expenditure over the revenue is unequally distributed over the period of two years and nearly eight months which it embraces, increasing in a geometrical ratio the further we remove from the starting-point. Thus it is an exceedingly moderate estimate that at least one-half, or in round numbers $600,000,000, of this debt was incurred during the twelve months ending September 30, 1863. An equally moderate estimate would add the same amount for the nine months of the last fiscal year ending June 30, 1864. But on September 30, 1863, the paper dollar, in which all the disbursements of the United States Government are made, was still worth within a fraction of 70 cents in gold, while on June 30, 1864, it was worth only 40 cents, so that its average value during the nine intervening months was only about 55 cents; or, in other words, its purchasing capacity was diminished nearly 22 per cent., and the expenditures of the Government must be increased by that percentage. We may thus add, without fear of error, between 700 and 800 millions to the admitted war debt on September 30, 1863, making the total on June 30 about two thousand million dollars.

We are, in fact, not left to à priori reasoning in this respect; for though we have not as yet so detailed an official statement for the later period, and some of the loans above enumerated have been converted into other forms, the grand totals are before the public. The following, then, are Mr. Chase's own figures for the three fiscal years respectively ending—

	Interest-bearing Loan	Paper money
June 30, 1862 .	$454,887,418 .	$269,331,954
June 30, 1863 .	183,545,377 .	401,036,482
June 30, 1864 .	451,401,307 .	243,053,863
	$789,834,162	$913,422,299

Interest-bearing Loan . .	$789,834,162
Paper money in circulation .	913,422,299
	$1,703,256,461

This, confessedly, does not include several months' arrears of pay due to an army which, on the pay-roll at least, musters nearly a million of men. Nor does it include the accounts of unpaid requisitions, and suspended accounts, and other claims against the Federal Government for regular war services, nor the huge mass of contingent individual and State claims requiring the action of the Departments or of Congress, and concerning which Mr. Whiting, the solicitor of the War Department, writes in a published letter that they amount to 'many hundreds of millions of dollars'

It is clear, therefore, that Mr. Fessenden entered on his duties with a war debt, in loans contracted, in legal tender notes issued, or in unsettled liabilities, of $2,000,000,000 at the most moderate calculation, and yet the conquest of the South is so far from being achieved that the President calls at this moment for 500,000 additional recruits. The national debt of England, accumulated during a century, with a population nearly one-third larger than that of the Federal American States, is not quite double this amount, at a rate of interest little more than half the minimum interest paid in America. In other words, supposing the war debt of the United States funded at this moment, the interest would already now fall heavier per head than that of the English national debt on the population of the United Kingdom. The national debt of France, with a population double that of the Federal States of America, had not in 1862 quite reached the magnificent figure of the American deficit for three years only of war; and though the French debt has largely increased since 1862, it is not even now more than two-thirds as much per head. Nor is this the worst aspect of Northern finances. Both in England and France the general Government commands the entire taxable resources of the country, and the local or municipal taxes or rates are restricted within very narrow local limits. In a federation of States, each of which is self-governing, the case is vastly different. The cream, so to speak, of the taxation is due to the authority which makes and administers the laws to which the citizen looks for protection of life and property, and this of course is the State Government. Prior to the war no other direct taxes were paid, and the revenues of the Federal Government consisted exclusively of duties on imports and sales of public lands. What the Federal Government can obtain is, therefore, only the surplus which the different States, after supplying their own necessities, can spare. Now, nearly all the States were, before the war, deeply indebted, and this indebtedness has swollen since then from the same causes, and nearly in the same proportions, as that of the Federal Government. An attempt has been made to add these two formidable amounts, and it has been found that in the case of Pennsylvania, one of the wealthiest of the States, her own debt and her share of the Federal debt amount together to one-half of the assessed property, real and personal, in the State. In the State of Iowa, the whole of the assessed property is just sufficient; so that, to pay the principal, each man in Pennsylvania must give half of what he is worth in the world, and in Iowa the whole.

With this millstone around his neck Mr. Fessenden inherits for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1865, the following budget, in which every item is as favourably stated as circumstances would possibly admit:—

Estimated revenue:
From customs . . .	$103,213,000
From taxes . . .	109,000,000
From miscellaneous . .	36,421,000
	$248,634,000
Total estimated expenses .	880,000,000
Estimated deficit . . .	$631,366,000

Unsatisfactory as this prospect is, it is clear that every source of revenue has been drawn upon to the utmost. The tariff, the chief source, has, from being protective, become virtually prohibitive. The internal taxation, which, as we have remarked, must be superadded to that for ordinary purposes of government already levied by the several States, is onerous in the extreme, difficult and expensive of collection, and therefore comparatively unproductive. To illustrate this fact most forcibly, it is sufficient to say that before the war, when the great cotton and tobacco producing States still belonged to the Union, the revenues of the United States, in the acme of their prosperity, never exceeded $77,055,125. This was the actual revenue of the last fiscal year of the Union, ending June 30, 1860. In the year ending June 30, 1861, when the withdrawal of the Southern representatives permitted the famous Morill protective tariff to be passed, but when, in anticipation of the coming catastrophe, the Southern exports and imports had been exceptionally large, the revenue reached $85,387,313. Between these two may be found the maximum normal revenue of the Union as it was before the war. Is it possible for any country to suddenly double, quadruple, nay, increase tenfold, its normal revenue, and especially is this possible for a country which has lost one-third of its territory and population, and that the most productive third? It is no wonder, therefore, that the Federal Government, knowing itself hopelessly bankrupt, is lavish of promises, but does not trouble itself in any manner, either by a sinking fund or otherwise, to make even the pretence of providing for keeping them.

Virtual Recognition.

The Congress of the United States, before its late adjournment, has declared by a solemn legislative enactment that the Union presided over by Mr. Lincoln consists at present of twenty-four States. It has enacted that, in the approaching Presidential election, only twenty-four States shall vote. It is therefore admitted, inferentially but none the less clearly, that of the thirteen States represented in the rival Congress at Richmond, eleven have no longer any lot or part in the glorious model Republic of North America. The two not so cast out of the happy sisterhood are Missouri and Kentucky, whence we may deduce that the object of the war, in the opinion of the Federal Congress, is now limited to the possession of these two States, or, in other words, to a question of boundaries. The innocent reader will probably suppose that if eleven States are excluded from the number of thirty-four which constituted the Union in its entirety, there must be twenty-three left. But this is not the case, for the same Congress had some time since anticipated its present confession of the hopelessness of reconstruction by admitting, in direct violation of an express stipulation of the Constitution, certain insurgent counties of the State of Virginia as an independent and sovereign State. It is the organised recognition of this rebellion against the lawful State Government of Virginia which, under the name of Kanawha or Western Virginia, forms the twenty-fourth star of that galaxy to whom is given the blessed privilege of voting for Mr. Lincoln or his successor in November next.

That our readers may understand the full portent of this tacit confession of the finality of the Union, we transcribe from the Constitution of the United States the essential clauses regulating the election of a President. It must also be remembered that this election is the only act in which the people of all the States participate simultaneously, and which can in any manner be considered a national act. The individuality of the States is recognised to the fullest extent. Not only are they left free to decide in what manner they will consult the wishes and preference of their respective citizens—whether by the ballot-box and popular elections or by the action of the Legislative Assembly, as was done in South Carolina—but the separate State existence is further recognised by making the vote of the State only partially dependent upon its numerical strength of population. Each State casts two votes by right, to which are added as many votes as it has representatives in the popular branch of the Federal Congress. Thus, the smallest State in population would have at least three votes. In this way the Presidential election at once symbolises the whole theory of the Constitution, and in practice illustrates the proper working of each part of the machinery of State and popular action. The Constitution says:—

> Each State shall appoint, in such manner as the Legislature thereof may direct, a number of electors equal to the whole number of senators and representatives to which the State may be entitled in Congress. . . . The person having the greatest number of votes shall be the President, if such number be a majority of the whole number of electors appointed. . . . If no person have a majority, then, from the five highest on the list, the said House (of Representatives) shall in like manner (by ballot) choose the President. But, in choosing the President, the votes shall be taken by States, the representation from each State having one vote. A quorum for this purpose shall consist of a member or members from two-thirds of the States, and a majority of all the States shall be necessary to a choice.

In declaring that these clauses shall apply to only twenty-four States, the Government of the United States has at length formally recognised the dissolution of the Union. This formal recognition is the act of the highest legislative authority, and is as complete, explicit, and direct as words and forms can make it. It is remarkable, too, for having, unlike most other acts of the Lincoln Administration, assumed a form as nearly constitutional as could probably be devised for the registration of an act for which the Constitution itself makes no express provision. It is, in short, in substance if not in precise phraseology, just such an Act as should have been passed three years and a half ago had the North been animated by respect for the Constitution rather than lust of power, and, if passed, would have avoided all the bloodshed of the past, and possibly much of the now inevitable anarchy of the future. What may be its effect at this eleventh hour it is perhaps difficult to say. Its bearing upon the position in America, and still more upon the attitude of this country, is nevertheless a matter of some interest.

Happily for mankind, it is in the very nature of shams to be shortlived. So long as appearances only are in question, the most barefaced imposture may succeed, and its success may be not a little aided by a friendly willingness to be imposed upon. But it breaks down inevitably under the ordeal of actual work. No effort of credulity can make the wooden nutmeg of the Yankee impart a flavour, or the pasteboard steam-engine of the Chinaman perform its work. And so it has proved in the present instance. Perhaps the most impudent fiction ever palmed off upon a too easy faith was that which represented secession as the work of a few unscrupulous individuals, and claimed the seceding States themselves as still, in fact and in right, members of the Union. It served its turn, indeed, in inducing the Governments of Europe to stand aloof so long as their recognition could be of any value, and so far it is entitled to such praise as successful impositions may claim. But whenever it has been exposed to any practical test it has broken down. It broke down when the soldiers and sailors of the 'rebel' States had to be treated not as rebels, but as prisoners of war; when the portions of the States themselves occupied by Federal troops were placed perforce under a régime not of reconstruction but of conquest; when their ports were subjected to a blockade unknown to municipal law. These, however, were but partial failures, proportionate to the strain put upon it. Its final collapse, now formally proclaimed by its inventors themselves, is the immediate consequence of the first effort to bring it into general operation. There is but one absolute test of what States are and what States are not really members of the Union. That is to say, there is but one national act in which, as States, they bear a part, and participation in which is an essential element of membership. This act is the election of a President, and for the first time since 1860 the period has now come round when this practical test of membership must needs be applied. The result has been very simple. To the election of a President an absolute majority of all the votes cast in the electoral colleges is, by the Constitution of the United States, essential. On the theory that the Union is still unmutilated, these colleges cast in the aggregate 309 votes, thus requiring a majority of 155 votes to elect. But 83 of these votes are gone with the seceding States, and the majority of 155 has thus to be gained out of a total of 226—a majority, that is to say, not of more than one-half, but of more than two-thirds of the whole number cast. Such a majority could not be obtained, and it was necessary to provide some solution for the difficulty. Two courses were open. The majority required might be reduced, or the number of the missing votes fabricated. The latter expedient was first tried, and every engine of arbitrary power put in motion to secure some sort of return from the seceding States. The attempt failed. One alternative alone remained. This alternative has at length been adopted, and the last shred of the fiction which represented the seceding States as still members of the Union has been flung aside. In the forthcoming election they are to bear no part. They are declared formally out of the Union.

The effect of this tardy but complete recognition is, so far as the United States are concerned, tolerably clear. Let us examine for a moment, in conclusion, its bearing upon our own position. That position has been sufficiently anomalous from the first; it now becomes simply ridiculous. Plus catholique que le pape, we persist in attributing to the Government of the United States functions which that Government itself now expressly disclaims. We cannot receive Mr. Mason, for, say we, Mr. Adams is still the Minister of the seceded States. But Mr. Adams, unless he too is disposed to 'rebel' against the authorities at Washington, repudiates that unprofitable honour. We cannot recognise Mr. Davis, for, say we, Mr. Lincoln is President of the whole thirty-four States. But Mr. Lincoln's highest expectations, as a candidate for reelection to the Presidency, are at this moment legally limited to the suffrages of only twenty-four States. Shall we confess that we hardly appreciate the advantages of the situation? Mr. Lincoln, coiled comfortably in his manger and loudly proclaiming that though he cannot eat oats himself no one else shall, is perhaps well enough; but poor England, with one eye on the provender and one on the grinning teeth that guard it, does not present to our mind a very dignified figure.

The Dismemberment of Denmark.

The meanest of mankind are always generous enough to give advice and consolation. Unfortunately, advice gratis is rarely worth more than it costs, and the wordy consolation that the tribe of Job's comforters will intrude upon the afflicted is only an impertinence and an annoyance. We lately heard a story apropos to this observation. A bereaved parent being told that he ought not to grieve, seeing that his child was now safe from the temptations and dangers of the world, replied: 'I pray, then, that all your children may die young.' How awfully poor Denmark has been bored with advice, and how much she has suffered from heeding it! And now, in the hour of her great affliction—now, in the interval, as it were, between the death and the burial of her national independence—her friends are plaguing her with consolations. We beseech our contemporaries to cease offering them to Denmark, for they are especially ungracious as coming from English journals. To tell Denmark that she is better off for being despoiled of her dominions must seem to the Danes a bitter taunt. Suppose we lost Ireland, or that India no longer acknowledged our sway, it would be cold comfort to be told by foreign critics that we were improved by the loss of dominion. Still more objectionable is the suggestion that Germany will be punished for her evil deeds. Even if that happens it will not reconstitute the kingdom of Denmark. All this shows that we have an uneasy conscience for having permitted might to triumph over right, and it never seems to occur to those who are perpetually prating about retribution that the Powers which stood by and refused to help the weak against the strong are not free from moral responsibility. We have no consolation to offer Denmark, except the poor one that her loss is our shame, and that we have permitted her to be the victim of a grievous wrong which only has its parallel in the partition of Poland. We cannot disguise from ourselves that Denmark has been abandoned to her strong antagonist, that she has been despoiled of her dominions, and forced by her relentless foe to drink the cup of humiliation to the very dregs. It is impossible to read the terms of peace without a feeling of indignation. M. Bismarck, in order to show Europe, and particularly England, how little the German Powers care for popular sentiment, went out of his way to degrade the gallant little nation he holds in his pitiless grasp. M. Quaade, the Danish envoy, begged very hard indeed that his Government might have a voice in the ultimate disposal of the Duchies. He knew that he was asking for a concession of no practical value, and that the voice of Denmark would not be listened to by Prussia. Indeed, if we are correctly informed, he stated as much, and frankly admitted that he only desired the condition to make the treaty less galling to his countrymen. The Danish envoy pleaded in vain, and was obliged to submit. We repeat, then, that we have no consolation to offer Denmark; but such an event as the dismemberment of an ancient European kingdom ought not to be passed over in silence, and it will be well for us to consider the causes that have led to such a deplorable result. They are instructive and pregnant with warning.

No statesman has been so thoroughly misunderstood as M. Bismarck. By this time Europe knows that the power behind the throne of Prussia is by no means to be despised, and that M. Bismarck has vast ability, inflexible will, and great boldness; but even now his character and designs are not duly appreciated. M. Bismarck conceives that he has a mission to fulfil, and in all he does he thinks he is performing a work which entitles him to the gratitude of his own generation, and which insures him the applause of posterity. He sets himself up as the apostle of absolutism, and wages an uncompromising war against all forms of constitutional government both at home and abroad. It may be that he was ambitious of extending the domains of Prussia; but that was not the sole, nor even the principal motive, of his antagonism to Denmark. He was perfectly sincere in intimating to Lord Wodehouse that what he objected to in Denmark was her form of government, or, as he chose to call it, her democratic institutions. When King Christian made peaceful overtures at Berlin, he was told very plainly that peace was impossible until he had dismissed his then Ministers and replaced them by men who were in favour of the doctrines of royal prerogative and who did not believe in parliamentary government. And now that Denmark is subjugated, the Prussian Minister esteems the military triumph and the acquisition of territory as nothing compared to the important victory he has gained over constitutionalism. He boasts, and not without reason, that he has struck a heavy blow at constitutional government in Europe.

The Prussian Parliament has been defeated, for without seeking its aid or consent the King has carried on a war. Prussian liberals thought, perhaps, that they would be able to embarrass the Government by refusing to vote the sums requisite to pay for the expenses of the war. M. Bismarck does not intend to give the Parliament a chance of refusing. The Duchies are to reimburse Prussia for the cost of conquering them, and already a loan is talked of, or rather a mortgage of their revenues. So, also, the Federal Diet has been put hors de combat, not because M. Bismarck has any special dislike to the minor Governments of Germany, but because the Diet has become the exponent of a popular sentiment. M. Bismarck is not the man to hide his light under a bushel, and he loudly proclaims his wonderful success. He says he has made the King absolute in Prussia, and Prussia absolute in the Diet. But these are not his only achievements. He points to Denmark and tells us how he has struck down constitutionalism and established an absolute instead of a popular Government. Then still more grandly he talks of what he has done for England. All classes in this country were for Denmark and against Prussia. The conquest of the Duchies was denounced by the English press and in the English Parliament. Yet, says M. Bismarck, England did nothing to help her ally; and he adds, with that blind insolence which is too often the fruit of success, that he has taught the useful lesson of how this country may be governed without paying any regard to the wishes of the people as expressed in Parliament and by the press. This, we know, is a gross exaggeration, but truth compels us to confess that in other respects, barring a little poetical licence, M. Bismarck's song of triumph is founded on facts. He has governed Prussia independently of the Parliament, and he has treated with haughty contempt the will of the German people as manifested by the Diet. He has destroyed constitutional liberty in Denmark, and compelled King Christian to call to his councils men not unfitted to serve the King of Prussia himself. He has most unquestionably set at defiance the will of England, for we venture to say that on few questions has there been such perfect unanimity as there was in favour of helping Denmark. M. Bismarck went to war for the purpose of damaging constitutionalism, and he has succeeded beyond his most sanguine expectations.

So much for the motives of Prussia; but as M. Bismarck could not have succeeded if opposed by any of the great Powers, we must enquire how was it that England became such a pliant tool in the hands of the Prussian apostle of absolutism? To reply that the policy of the Government was vacillating, and that the policy of the Opposition was equally unstable, is rather to state an effect than a cause. We want to know why the Government and why the Opposition sanctioned a gross outrage on an ally who had every claim on our protection, and why they permitted the germ of constitutional liberty in the North of Europe to be nipped in the bud. The answer is plain. In the even division of parties, the extreme Radical faction which is led by Messrs. Cobden and Bright, though small in numbers, has considerable influence, and neither party likes to offend it. Messrs. Cobden and Bright and their small following have taken up with the doctrine of non-intervention, which is a kind of political application of the maxim of Cain that we are not our brother's keeper. The doctrine of non-intervention is, indeed, to a certain extent laudable. We have no right to interfere in quarrels that do not concern us; but it does concern us to see that the treaties to which we are parties are respected, and, in spite of the sneers of Messrs. Cobden and Bright, we will add that we are interested in the progress of liberal institutions. But from the first Messrs. Cobden and Bright avowed themselves opposed to any intervention on behalf of Denmark, and their organ, the Morning Star, was the only English newspaper—or rather the only paper published in England—that took the side of Germany.

M. Bismarck would not have attempted the dismemberment of Denmark but for the non-intervention theory. Relying on that, he cared not for our protests or our threats. The ruin of Denmark has been effected by the action of Prussia and the inaction of England; and the first was impelled by hatred of constitutional liberty, and the latter is due to the efforts of those English politicians who talk so much about their love of liberty. It may be strange, but it certainly is true, that Messrs. COBDEN and BRIGHT are always on the side which strikes at the honour of England, and are always, consciously or unconsciously, helping on the cause of absolutism.

M. BISMARCK hopes that he may be able to make absolutism the only form of government known in Europe, and that the day may come when not a sovereign will owe his throne to the suffrages of the people, or find it necessary to bow to the decisions of a popular assembly. Already M. BISMARCK'S Holy Alliance is intriguing against the young King of GREECE, because he obtained his crown by a revolution and by the votes of the people. What is that to England? Shall we permit M. BISMARCK to do in the East as he has done in the North? Shall we permit him everywhere to triumph over constitutional liberty? If not, we must fight. Thanks to the non-intervention theory of Messrs. COBDEN and BRIGHT, our protest is valueless, and we have no moral influence. After what has happened to Denmark, no nation will believe in our remonstrances until we have actually engaged in war. We do not say that Messrs. COBDEN and BRIGHT have compelled us to go to war. We may, if we choose, sacrifice honour, right, and liberty to procure peace. But we say that, if it had not been for Messrs. COBDEN and BRIGHT'S non-intervention theory, we might have maintained the cause of constitutional liberty without an appeal to the sword.

THE ALABAMA AND THE SUMTER.*

An Irishman once remarked to a friend who was boasting of his pedigree that he did not care for an illustrious descent, but he certainly envied his posterity. Whether the world is progressing in civilisation and happiness is rather hard to determine, but beyond question those who live a hundred years hence will in some things be better off than we are. They will be able, for example, to study the records of the past under considerable advantages. We are not only making history, but in our newspapers, our biographies, and our autobiographies, we are supplying the historian of unborn generations with such abundant material, that he will be enabled to produce a picture of these times such as we in vain desire of the eighteenth century. The historian of the great conflict in America will be able to present his readers with such minute details as will make them thoroughly familiar with the contest which now engages the attention of the civilised world. He will be able to set forth with statistical accuracy the relative forces of the belligerents and the progress of events which have demonstrated the capacity of the South to maintain her independence against the numerical superiority of the North. And the story of the patriotism and devotion of the Confederates will assuredly command admiration. In 1861 far-seeing European statesmen, who were not beguiled by Federal reports of Union feeling in the South, were convinced that the conquest and subjugation of a warlike community inhabiting 800,000 square miles of territory was impossible; but no one on this side of the Atlantic, however sanguine of the ultimate success of the South, thought that she would make so successful a resistance as she has done. Taken unawares, without an army, without arms, without ammunition, without foundries, without skilled artificers, and cut off from communication with the markets of Europe, it was not unreasonably supposed that the Federals would be able to take all the chief towns of the Confederacy, and to penetrate into the very heart of the country. Very different has been the result of the conflict. Although the North has made sacrifices of men and treasure which even with the facts before us seem almost inconceivable, Richmond, the capital, still defies the foe; Charleston has not been captured; Mobile has not been attacked; Wilmington has not been touched by the invader; the Mississippi is still closed to the commerce of the West; Texas has repelled the Northern forces; and it may be fairly said that the only conspicuous trophy that the North has to show for a loss of men that has decimated her arms-bearing population and an expenditure that has plunged her into ruin, is the city of New Orleans. But still more remarkable is the triumphant success of the Confederates in making themselves independent of the markets of the world. We do not underrate the achievements of the Southern army in saying that the efforts of the South in other respects are not one whit less honourable or illustrious. Until this war broke out, the South was entirely dependent upon the North and upon European markets for all her manufactures. Now she makes her own clothing; she makes her own implements of husbandry; she takes iron from the bowels of the earth; she has foundries; she has workshops, where the metals, at present more precious to her than gold, are converted into weapons of [illegible]. We [illegible] to affirm that never before has a people [illegible] such wonderful ingenuity and such indomitable perseverance.

But, as is truly remarked in the volumes before us, it was easier for the Confederate Government to create an army than to create a navy. Indeed the difficulties seemed to be insuperable. How was the South, [illegible] ship-builders without skilled labour, [illegible] mill, and subjected to a blockade, [illegible] the vast naval power of the North? [illegible] fore, on the part of the [illegible] to consider the sea and the [illegible] federacy as being under the sway of the Federals so long as the war should last. Yet [illegible] of the war belong to the South. She was the first [illegible] memorable fight in the Hampton Roads, [illegible] of iron [illegible] wood. She has built [illegible] done splendid service, and which are a terror to the [illegible] navy of the foe. She has captured Federal gunboats by [illegible] which have proved that Southern rivers can in many cases be effectively defended by land forces. She has also solved other problems very important in the defence of rivers and harbours. With torpedoes she has kept the Federal ironclads at a respectful distance, and when, as in the case of Charleston, they have ventured to engage the land batteries, she has shown that the so-called invulnerable ironclads can be repulsed. And the Confederates have gained another triumph that exceedingly annoys the Northerners. Latterly the most sceptical have been convinced that the Federal blockade has been set at nought by Confederate enterprise, and at this moment the merchants of New York may learn from the Liverpool Customs' Bill of Entry that the effects of the war and the blockade have been to throw the American carrying trade into the hands of the British, and that the cotton trade is not stopped, but is merely continued without the intervention and the consequent commissions of New York merchants.

We have deemed it right to preface our notice of the volumes before us by these observations, because, whilst fairly enough the Sumter and the Alabama will occupy the foremost place in the history of the nascent navy of the South, and their gallant commander Captain Semmes has won for himself an imperishable name, it would be a false and injurious impression to suppose that the Sumter and the Alabama alone give the South a claim to be considered as a naval power. No, the career of these two vessels is only a splendid manifestation of that heroism, energy, and fertility of resource that will inevitably give the Confederates a naval power worthy of their territorial greatness. Still, if the Confederates had done nothing more than has been accomplished by the vessels under the command of Captain Semmes, the story of their naval enterprise would have been one of the most remarkable episodes of the war.

We do not propose to present our readers with an outline of the 'Cruise of the Alabama and the Sumter.' To do so with anything like fairness and accuracy, it would be necessary to write a review nearly as long as the volumes before us, for these volumes are entirely free from what is technically termed padding, and they narrate the incidents with a brevity which shows us how closely the editor has followed the journals and private papers of Captain Semmes, and how that gallant commander emulates the dignified terseness which characterises the despatches of that great soldier Robert E. Lee. Besides, we have already published in THE INDEX a history of the doings of the Sumter, written by one of her officers; and the present account, though more replete with details, is substantially the same. Yet we cannot forbear a passing comment on the first chapter of the history of the Sumter. A merchant steamer is hastily converted into a cruiser, and after long watching dashes through the blockading squadron of the Federals, gets to sea, and for the first time the flag of the Confederacy is displayed on the highway of nations. The little Sumter accomplished a remarkable work. She brought home to the merchants of New York and Boston the fact that they could not wage war with impunity. Captain Semmes at first endeavoured to save his prizes, and he applied at two ports for permission to leave them until they were adjudicated upon by a regular prize-court, but his fair intention was frustrated, and he had no resource except to burn the vessels that he could not ransom. Altogether the Sumter cost the Federal marine dearly—'eighteen vessels captured, seven burned with all their cargo on board, and two released on heavy ransom bonds, representing themselves no inconsiderable amount of damage.'

The Sumter, being used up and unfit for service, was sold, and Captain Semmes was preparing to return to the Confederacy when the launch of the Alabama gave him the command of a vessel which will always hold a conspicuous place in the annals of naval warfare. From September 5, 1862, when the Alabama made her first prize, till April 27, 1864, when she made her last, she captured, ransomed, or destroyed sixty-four vessels, including the United States gunboat the Hatteras, which was sunk off Galveston. The greater part of the captures were made during the first year, which is accounted for by the United States merchant navy being since transferred to neutral flags. Long before the close of her career, the Alabama had accomplished the work of ruining the Federal marine; and the present Confederate cruisers, and the additions that may be made to them, will make fewer captures, because there are fewer vessels to capture. So long as this war lasts the commerce of the North cannot recover from the blow received from the Alabama, for ordinary vigilance on the part of the Confederates will [illegible] flag [illegible]

[illegible] He had to decide questions of international law such as are usually referred to [illegible] It is very [illegible] that he fulfilled this duty in such a manner as to avoid any quarrel with neutral powers, and in a way that gained him the respect of those officials with whom he had [illegible]. When he had occasion to remonstrate against what he deemed unjust treatment, he did so, not in a [illegible] but with a dignity and spirit which usually procured what he required.

The fight off Cherbourg, which resulted in the destruction of the Alabama, is freshly remembered. There may be, perhaps, some difference of opinion as to the prudence displayed by Captain Semmes in risking his crippled ship against the Kearsarge. We trust that the day will never come when an English captain or a Confederate captain will be so prudent as to shirk every encounter [illegible] has the largest crew and the biggest guns. Our forefathers shot Admiral Byng for such a display of prudence, and our Nelsons, Collingwoods, and Blakes—the men who gave to Britain her supremacy on the sea—were never too prudent to fight against odds. However that may be, there is no difference of opinion that, in accepting the challenge of the Kearsarge, Captain Semmes acted like a gallant gentleman, and the way the battle was fought made defeat honourable. The captain and the crew who fight their ship to the last—who refuse to haul down their flag until she is sinking—cannot lose honour; and we venture to say that the gallant ending of the Alabama will not be the least of the services the noble vessel rendered to the Confederacy.

Here we might conclude, but we feel called upon to take some notice of a review of the 'Cruise of the Alabama and the Sumter,' which appears in the current number of the Athenæum. We trust that we need hardly say that we are not so forgetful of what is due to Captain Semmes as to suppose it requisite to defend him from one of the most virulent and vulgar attacks that ever disgraced the columns of a journal. In days gone by the Athenæum occupied a somewhat influential position, and therefore we being jealous for the honour of English journalism, beg to state for the information of distant readers, that now-a-days the censure or praise of the Athenæum does neither good nor harm, and it is a matter of supreme indifference that the literary journal should abuse all books on American topics that are not written to suit the taste of Parson Brownlow and Ben. Butler. As a literary curiosity, we would, if we had the space, reprint the article from the Athenæum, but, as we cannot do so, it will suffice to remark that Captain Semmes, the honoured guest of England, is, with [illegible] spite and worse than Billingsgate vulgarity, compared to Jack Sheppard, Jonathan Wild, and Don Juan. Very amusing, too, is the profound ignorance of the reviewer. Will no publisher take compassion on our contemporary, and present it with some popular history of England and of her relations with foreign countries? The reviewer writes: 'We can have no toleration of slavery in any shape or under any excuse. We can have no friendship with slaveholders. We can have no peace with a slave empire.' Really this is charming! The reviewer, we suppose, is not aware that Spain, Turkey, and Brazil are slaveholding countries, and that we really are at peace with them. We suppose he is not aware that at the present time there are slaves in the United States, and that we are at peace with the Government of Washington. We suppose this genius of the Athenæum never heard of a proclamation issued by Mr. Lincoln, in which all who would return to the Union were to retain their slaves under the guarantee of the Union. We suppose the reviewer has never heard of the equalisation of the sugar duties by which, for economical reasons, England admits slave-grown sugar on the same terms as free-grown sugar. The reviewer sneers at Captain Semmes for certain expressions of piety that occur in his journal, and declares that, Captain Semmes being a Marylander, the motive of his conduct 'cannot be patriotism, for his own State goes with the North.' We will not attempt to enlighten the reviewer as to the position of Maryland, but we are confident, if the Athenæum is circulated in the United States, that, with the exception of Parson Brownlow, Benjamin Butler, and men of that class, no one even there will read the attack on Captain Semmes without being amused at the ignorance displayed in it, and utterly disgusted with its injustice and ribaldry. It will not hurt either Captain Semmes or the book; and, for the matter of that, it will not hurt the Athenæum. Long before such an article as that we are referring to could be admitted, a journal must have arrived at that stage in its existence when an editorial blunder, no matter how gross, can do it no harm.

[FIRST NOTICE.]

Is it yet time to write the history of the cotton famine? Is that great national calamity, with the vast mass of commercial distress and domestic misery it entailed, sufficiently a thing of the past to have its record treated as complete? Are we justified in believing that, if not absolutely recovered, the trade of Lancashire has passed beyond the danger of relapse, and that, if not yet prosperous, it is still on the sure road to prosperity? We have great doubts on these points. First, so far as cotton itself is concerned, we do not feel certain that we have yet secured an adequate supply from non-American sources, and we do not know when the American cotton-fields may be again opened to us. Have we really so stimulated production in India, and Egypt, and Brazil, that we can depend on an adequate supply from these countries so long as the ports of the South remain shut? And if we can have enough cotton to keep our mills employed, can we have it at other than a famine price? While 'middling Orleans' and its substitutes range from 2*s.* to 3*s.* per lb., we hardly think that the cotton famine is ended. At that price the market must be narrow, and production limited. At that price multitudes who formerly bought ten yards of calico will now buy five; many who used to wear calico will now buy linen or flannel; and some who were our customers will rather go naked than pay the cost of a yard or two of coloured cloth. At that price it is impossible that the whole of our mills should be reopened, or the whole of our population employed. And there is one case which might easily plunge us into a state little better than that of December 1862. If, next spring, there should be strong expectations of a peace in America, half the land destined for cotton in other countries would be sown with some crop of less precarious value; if, by autumn, those expectations should not have been realised, there will be but half a crop to feed the mills of Lancashire in 1866. It is true, secondly, as regards the operatives, that the numbers now dependent on public or private charity are comparatively small; but this is not owing entirely to the amendment of trade. Some of those who were dependent on charity have left the cotton districts and found work elsewhere, at half or a third of the wages they earned in 1860, the last year in which Lancashire was prosperous. For them, the cotton famine is not over, any more than a famine of wheat is ended when a people has obtained a bare sufficiency of potatoes. Finally, as to the amount of looms and spindles at work, we spoke a day or two ago with an intelligent and well-informed manufacturer, whose opinion was that at no time during the famine had less than one-third of the whole amount been at work, and that now the number employed did not exceed two-thirds. We doubt, therefore, whether it be time to write the history of the cotton famine. The distress is less than it was—much less than it was; but it has not been lessened in full proportion to statistical appearances, still less in proportion to the diminished space which it occupies in the newspapers. The public has grown weary of the subject; the evil has been reduced within manageable limits; the means of Lancashire herself have been made available, and proved adequate for its relief, and we hear comparatively little about it. And no doubt, if things go on as they are, we shall one day see the end of it. It may be that cotton will never return to pristine prices, that calico will never recover its old advantage over linen and woollen cloth, and that her ancient importance will never return to Manchester. But still we are at present on the way to better things; the trade is convalescent; the operatives have ceased to be a starving body, though some of them are still in want, though many of them are paupers—while before 1861 there was no class in the country which did so little to burden the rates—and though none of them have regained the prosperity and comfort which marked their condition before the ambition of Abraham Lincoln, and the ferocity of the Puritan preachers of New England, blasted the industry of Lancashire and sealed the fate of America. We may stop short on our upward road; we may suffer a painful relapse; but at present it certainly seems that the tide has turned—that we have passed the worst of our sufferings—and that, if nothing happen to turn the current of improving fortune, each year will witness an increase in our supplies of cotton, an increase in the number of spindles and looms at work, an improvement in the condition of the operatives, and a reduction of the poor rates of Lancashire. Such is the view which has, apparently, induced the writer of the volume before us to issue at this time a history of the Lancashire Cotton Famine.

It is the necessary duty of a reviewer, in dealing with such a work as this, to give his attention chiefly to those portions of the author's views with which he is compelled to disagree—to spend his time and space rather in correcting errors and in supplementing deficiencies than in describing or recommending the work as a whole. It is only fair, therefore, to begin by saying that Mr. Arnold has done his business well and carefully. His actual narrative is clear and straightforward, though there are passages of description and flowery sentiment which the reader will do well to skip—attempts at fine writing which disfigure the earlier pages of the volume and discourage further attention. These are the errors of an inexperienced author, and do not detract from the solid merit of a work which is distinguished by lucidity of style and candour of spirit. Mr. Arnold means to be fair, and takes care to be intelligible. He has prejudices, and he does injustice; but not wilfully nor perversely. He is not a man of profound knowledge, nor of deep thought; his views are the superficial commonplace views of the majority of men who do not look deeply into the causes of any social phenomena, or consider thoroughly the mutual rights and obligations of any form of human relation; but he has no spite against any class of his countrymen, and is obviously actuated by an honest desire to give an impartial account of the facts before him. He appears to have a prejudice in favour of the Federal cause, but if this be so, he has kept his partialities in strict subjection, and it is only by the turn of a sentence here and there that we are led to suspect them. We are inclined to think him sometimes unjust to the manufacturers; but he does them more justice than do the great majority of people unacquainted with Lancashire life and Lancashire ideas, and the bulk of his readers will rather accuse him of indulgence than of bitterness.

He is not foolish enough to lay the blame of the cotton famine in any degree upon the manufacturers, save that he thinks they ought to have taken more pains to develope the culture of cotton and the opening of communications in India. Mr. Bright made some efforts in this direction, but his violence, his false accusations, his reputation, and his unpopularity neutralised the effect of his arguments. For the rest, the manufacturers trusted in the philosophy of free trade. During the corn-law contest, the Protectionists earnestly urged the folly of rendering England dependent for her supplies of food on sources which might be closed in time of war. It was answered that demand would insure supply, war or no war; that profit was too strong for powder, and that there was no blockade which could keep out articles that paid cent. per cent. This false and foolish doctrine—false and foolish in its generality of statement, and in its absolute and unlimited character—sank deep into the mind of Manchester; and the cotton manufacturers were perhaps the class of all others which considered the supply of cotton least precarious. But had they thought otherwise, they could not have helped themselves. They could not give 7½*d.* for colonial cotton while American could be had for 6*d.*; to have done so would have been to exclude themselves from the market; and, therefore, the Southern States gradually beat all other competitors out of the field, and Lancashire became absolutely dependent upon them. Even secession hardly alarmed the manufacturers. They did not believe in disunion; when disunion became a fact, they did not believe in war; when war began, they did not expect an effective blockade; and when the blockade cut off their supplies, they were slow to believe in its continuance. It is noteworthy that they and the buyers of cotton at large seem for a long time to have believed in the Federal arms. Cotton rose when the South was victorious, and fell when she was beaten, indicating clearly that it was to 'reconstruction,' not to independence, that the speculators looked for the opening of the Southern ports. The manufacturers misjudged their case and their prospects from first almost to last, and they lost much money by their errors. Any man who had confidence enough in the Confederates to buy and sell on the supposition that they must finally triumph, might have made an enormous fortune—some did make enormous fortunes—out of the contrary opinion of the market, before the world at large came round to his conviction. But it would not have made the distress one whit less severe if the manufacturers had taken a sound view from the first. They could have done nothing; the force of commercial necessity was utterly irresistible.

It is true that there had been overproduction in 1860, and that this would have created much trouble in 1861, even if there had been no American war, and that it did aggravate the distress of 1861–62. There were large stocks in India, and at home, and everywhere, which had been bought at the prices of 1860, and which had to be sold off before the price of calico could rise to the level of that of cotton. The consequence was that the diminution of production was much greater than it would have been had it depended only on the scarcity of cotton. Manufacturers dared not add to stock in expectation of adequate prices; for they knew not but that, before they could sell, the American war might be over, and cotton might fall from 1*s.* 6*d.* to 1*s.* per lb. Merchants could not give them orders at adequate prices while there was yet on hand cloth bought at the prices of 1860, in sufficient quantity to supply the wants of the world till the middle of 1862. Thus the overproduction of 1860 aggravated the distress of 1861. But the manufacturers were in no sense answerable for that overproduction. During 1860 they had made only 'to order;' and they held in 1861 less cloth than at any other period. It was by speculators and exporters that the overproduction of 1860 was enforced. It was by them that the stocks were held in 1861. And when the price of calico rose with, though after and less than, the price of cotton, the large profits realised on these stocks fell entirely into the hands of merchants and speculators. Little or none of it went to repair the losses of the manufacturers. Those who made profit out of the cotton famine among the manufacturers, made it by not manufacturing. They sold their cotton, and they speculated in cotton, and by speculation they contrived to share the profits of Liverpool brokers and London capitalists; as manufacturers they could not make a penny. From want of special acquaintance with facts of this kind, Mr. Arnold goes frequently astray in estimating the waste of wealth and the impoverishment entailed by the cotton famine. Its losses fell upon the capital invested in the employment of labour; it wasted the means and sapped the strength of the manufacturers. Its compensatory profits went into pockets from which few or no wages are paid—to speculators and merchants. It was on these, therefore, rather than on the manufacturers, that the distressed operatives had a strong claim. Those whom the famine ruined had some moral title to assistance at the hands of those whom it enriched. For want of fairly understanding these circumstances, writers of all sorts, and Mr. Arnold among them, have given undue credit to Liverpool and laid undue blame on Preston and Manchester—have exalted the merchants at the expense of the manufacturers. The former made millions and gave thousands; the latter lost millions, and still they gave. But because the losers were in closer personal relations with the operatives, their liberality seemed but the fulfilment of an obligation; the winners, lending a small fraction of their winnings, gained the credit of large generosity. In occupations of which the conditions are better understood, similar injustice would hardly be done. If a bad harvest had impoverished the farmers and poured a flood of wealth into Mark Lane, we hardly think that any one would at once extol the corn-dealer for giving a small percentage of his profit to the poor, and abuse the half-ruined farmers for doing no more. It should be remembered, throughout all discussions on the Lancashire cotton famine, that the merchants and brokers of Liverpool were gainers; that the landlords, except the owners of cottage property, were little affected; while the millowners were fellow-sufferers with their workpeople. This borne in mind, we shall hardly be inclined to think so highly of the merchants who gave their one or two thousands as of the earl who put down six; while the highest honour of all seems due to those who kept their mills running at a dead loss, or fed their workpeople themselves, at a cost of perhaps 500*l.* a week (26,000*l.* a year). Of course there were very few who were in a position to do anything of this sort. A poor man could not do it; and hundreds of manufacturers, employing thousands of operatives, were almost as poor as their hands. A man whose whole wealth, except what was absolutely required to work his mill, was invested in bricks, and mortar, and machinery, which had ceased to be a source of profit and become a source of expense, could not be asked to bring himself to absolute ruin by generosity of this kind. If he had employed his hands in 1862, he must have deprived himself of the power of employing them for ever after. It was only by men of great surplus wealth that this magnificent generosity could be displayed. And by most of the few firms so situated their workpeople were so treated that no complaint was possible; here and there some men have behaved ill, and their selfishness or meanness was laid hold upon and exhibited to the world as characteristic of a class of men who, outside their own province, have always been regarded with the jealousy which waits on new-gotten wealth and the suspicion which springs of ignorance. Mr. Arnold is above injustice of this sort; but, in acknowledging that those who behaved well, and even nobly, were assuredly the many, he gives undue prominence to the shortcomings or the aberrations of the few. He speaks the truth; but the impression left is not quite the true one.

We must not forget that the theory and practice of the relations between employers and employed in Lancashire is less feudal and friendly than in the south of England. The squire conceives that there exists between him, his farmers, and his labourers, some other bond than those of wages and rent: he believes, if he do not act up to his belief, that his tenantry have a claim to help and kindness at his hands, and owe him respect, deference, and regard on their part; and the tenantry would not generally allow that the relation is purely commercial. With the manufacturer the case is very different. Unless his operatives happen to be his tenants, they have often no relation with him outside the walls of his factory; they pride themselves on their independence of him; and they, as much as he, would, in prosperous times at least, repudiate the idea of anything like dependence and protection subsisting between them. They owe him work; he owes them wages. If they can get better wages or easier work elsewhere, they would not dream of remaining with him. In such a state of things it is difficult to establish any peculiar claim of the operative on the capitalist, apart from that of Christian neighbourhood, arising from acquaintance and connection; and the claims which were in some cases put forth by the operatives were rather suggested by the sympathy of extraneous advisers than prompted by their own views of the relation between themselves and their masters. A slaveholder is bound to support his slaves in sickness and health, prosperity and adversity; a landlord, while he continues to expect the reverence and exercise the authority derived from the feudal tie, cannot shake off the claims of his tenantry to a modified form of assistance and protection: but if those who claim such absolute independence as does the factory operative when all goes well are to ask peculiar consideration and assistance from their employers in time of adversity, their demand must rest on the bonds of Christian brotherhood rather than on political or social connection. Mr. Arnold, in criticising the conduct of the two parties, is apt to lose sight of such points as these.

THE CONFEDERATE CAUSE IN FRANCE.

Paris: August 9.

During the past week the press has been completely absorbed in the consideration of the farce recently played by certain non-accredited diplomatists on the scene of Blondin's performances—the Falls of the Niagara. Generally speaking, the true character of this pretended negotiation has not been misunderstood; nevertheless, far greater importance has been attributed to it than it really deserves. The Moniteur du Soir is of opinion that 'there is no reason for considering this first interchange of ideas as definite.' The Temps affects to call Messrs. Clay and Holcombe (the latter name is written Halcomb) accredited negotiators, and asserts that the partisans of the South are mistaken in regarding the Niagara affair as an indication of the weariness prevalent in the North; it sees in it, on the contrary, a proof that the Government of Washington is fully assured of the energy and indomitable perseverance of the Unionist populations.

The Memorial Diplomatique and the Patrie have presented the question in its true form. The first of these journals, in a special article upon the subject, gives the following political and constitutional reasons in proof that such negotiations must be barren in their result, and that Messrs. Holcombe and Clay could have had no object but that of representing Mr. Lincoln's Government as indisposed towards peace:—

The object of the revolution which gave rise to the war between the Southern and the Northern States was the assertion, by the former, of their independence and sovereignty, from whence proceeds the double right of possessing certain institutions suitable to themselves and of separating from the Confederation into which they had entered.

The Government of Richmond is simply the agent of these sovereign States, which, far from vesting it with full powers, have explicitly specified that they reserved to themselves the exclusive right both of modifying their peculiar institutions, and also of withdrawing, when they pleased, from the new association which they had formed.

To ask the Government of Richmond, therefore, to consent to a reconstitution of the Union, and to the abolition of slavery, is to ask of it two things which it has not the power to perform—the disunion or union of the States, and an interference with one of their peculiar institutions.

These conditions, even if approved of by the people of the Confederate States, could only be accepted by the people itself exercising its authority in the terms prescribed by the Constitution, and in conformity with the American theory of the Republic; namely, either by each particular State in its quality of sovereign, or by a general convention of all the States, representing the entire people.

If the mechanism of the Government of the Confederate States be duly examined and understood, the key to many difficulties is immediately discovered, and many gross errors, into which those who discuss American matters too frequently fall, may be avoided.

If an objection be made to our assertion that the United States, possessing the same institutions as the Confederate States, denies the sovereignty of the States, in wishing to constrain some of them to remain in an association which is no longer suited to them, and to abolish the slavery now existing amongst them, we answer that the United States' Government violates the Constitution of the country, whilst by the Confederate States it is respected.

This difference in comprehending the principles of the Constitution is the sole cause of the war. As reason could gain no hearing in the solution of this difficulty, an appeal to arms was the result.

The Mémorial then states that the aim of Mr. Lincoln evidently was, not to treat for peace, but to make it appear that he was disposed to do so, and thus take advantage of the pacific movement in the North for the purposes of his election. It concludes as follows:—

It is, therefore, certain that the United States' Government is not desirous of peace; it is by war that that Government is maintained, and war it will continue to uphold so long as Mr. Lincoln remains at the White House.

The Patrie, in an article written by M. Aucaigne, has shown itself still more sarcastic; it jeers at George Sanders and laughs at Colorado Jewitt. Although M. Aucaigne is mistaken in citing Messrs. Clay and Holcombe as members of the Confederate Congress, he nevertheless fully appreciates the praiseworthy efforts made by these honourable Southerners, who in their private capacity of citizens have sought the pacification of their country.

With respect to Mr. Lincoln's ultimatum, the Patrie thus expresses itself:—

It must not be forgotten that, even supposing the South were to-day to re-enter the Confederation, with its slavery abolished, there would still remain slaves in the States of Kentucky, Tennessee, &c., which, faithful so far as appearance goes to Mr. Lincoln, have obtained from him the right of enjoying their peculiar institution free from his interference. Let the President, therefore, first of all proclaim abolition in those States in which his authority is acknowledged and obeyed; and we may add that we shall think all the more of him if, when propositions of peace are made to him, we hear him proudly reply, 'No truce, no reunion, so long as you wish to return to us bringing your slavery with you.'

The Moniteur, the Constitutionnel, the Nation, and the France have published, relative to these famous Niagara negotiations, an excellent communication from New York furnished through the agency of Havas.

The last-named of these journals, the France, informs us that on July 31, two screw-corvettes, carrying Confederate colours, were seen off the roadstead of Brest.

The Presse, which for some time past has not busied itself with American matters, gives a short article on the subject of the imprisonment of Mr. Howard, the author of the apocryphal proclamation of a draft of 400,000 men. M. de Girardin's journal says that all the statements put forth by this unfortunate journalist have been fully realised—that it was vain on the part of Grant to outflank Lee, he is now reduced to make an attack on Petersburg, and the President, instead of calling for a draft of 400,000, now calls for 500,000. The offence of the journalist therefore consisted in his being too reserved, and the President has punished an imaginary crime.

Although the Opinion Nationale has refused to make any further reply to the questions asked by the Pays, the latter journal, in conformity with its determination before stated, has not ceased to interrogate the Opinion. On Thursday last it proposed the following question to its opponent:—

Why should we pity the Poles who suffer beneath the implacable hand of Russia, when all pity, all respect, and all consideration are refused to those of their countrymen who suffer beneath the cruelly cunning hand of Mr. Lincoln—when we find their complaints unnoticed, a deaf ear turned to the despairing cries of these unfortunate victims of American barbarity, and all right and decency trampled under foot?

In a word, why should the Czar of St. Petersburg be censured by a courtier of the Czar of Washington?

Of course the Opinion offers no reply to this.

The same number of the Pays contains, under the form of a letter from a subscriber, a complete refutation of all the assertions put forth by the Opinion in its controversy with that journal. This refutation leaves nothing to be desired; its language is moderate, its style easy, and its arguments conclusive. It begins by refuting the term 'rebels' as applied to the Southerners, and remarks that there can be no rebels in a country where there are no subjects, the absence of the one necessarily implying the absence of the other. As to the second assertion made by the Opinion, that the South withdrew itself from the Union on account of fears entertained by the slaveholders, owing to the election of Mr. Lincoln, the Pays replies that the South withdrew itself only in face of the advances made by the Abolitionists and the Protectionists, whose aim was to form a geographical party, which would place the South under tutelage, and suppress its voice in Congress. The separation, continues the correspondent of the Pays, when it first originated was, in its character, simply a protestation against the humiliating position which the North was preparing for the South; slavery was not its motive, for slavery existed in the loyal States at the commencement of the contest, it exists there still, and constitutes, up to the present moment, part of the Constitutional institutions of the United States. The Government of Richmond has never proclaimed as a principle that emancipation was a thing impossible, it has declared slavery to be a domestic institution, subject exclusively to the action of the particular States, and over which the Federal Government had no jurisdiction. Was he right? The Constitution proves it. This remarkable letter terminates as follows:—

To the cries of 'Liberty' so often and so cruelly uttered by MM. Labbé, Bonneau, or Malespine, I answer, 'Humanity.' And—shall I say it?—I am proud to find that my compatriots have hitherto succeeded in thwarting the internal projects of the friends of the Opinion Nationale.

Allow me to say, in conclusion, that the ridiculous fury of the Northern organ is a source of no small amusement to the Confederates. They are also quite aware that the Opinion Nationale, notwithstanding its high-sounding title, is far, very far, from being the faithful expositor of the national opinion of France.

The Siècle still undertakes to lecture the American correspondent of the Times. A few days ago it considered it very wrong on the part of this correspondent to have stated as a fact that General Hood had decided to defend Atlanta until he should receive reinforcements from Lee, and that Forrest's corps had succeeded in cutting off the retreat of the Federals. The Siècle regards this as counting one's chickens before they are hatched, and adds in a sportive tone: 'The Times' correspondent in the United States has been carrying on this little business for a long time past.' The day following that on which it had thus bantered the unknown correspondent of the Times, the Siècle published the three pretended conditions on which, it had been said, Messrs. Clay and Holcombe would consent to discuss terms of peace with the Federal Government. Now it so happened that, at the very time when it published this statement, papers had been received forty-eight hours before in Paris, which implicitly stated that such stipulations had never existed, save in the imagination of certain American journalists, evidently as correctly informed as the editors of the Siècle.

This is the journal which undertakes to correct the Times' correspondent when he speaks of American affairs.

It seems to be quite the fashion just now, with the Northern organs in Paris, to attack the Times' correspondent. Here is a specimen of the unjustifiable manner in which the Opinion Nationale speaks of him:—

The Special Correspondent of the Times at New York, whose false statements as to the military position are complacently conveyed to us by the telegraph twice a week, had announced the arrival at Richmond of all the booty carried off by General Early in Maryland. This news, like all else sent by the Times' Correspondent, is contradicted. The retreat of the Confederates has not only been disturbed but prevented. The Unionist general, Crook, overtook them on July 18 at Snicker's Gap, and after a desperate engagement, in which he was victorious, captured 300 prisoners and 300 wagons laden with corn.

Well! these lines, so cutting, so peremptory, evince the most complete ignorance of the matter of which they speak, or the most arrant bad faith. The pretended victory of Crook, announced in the New York journals of the 21st, was, as you are aware, contradicted in those of the 23rd. Now, as the journals of the 21st, 22nd, and 23rd, reached Paris by the same mail, the Opinion has either not taken the trouble to read them, or, as the Pays (which does not allow any of the errors of the Federal organ to pass unnoticed) has stated, the Opinion has extracted those statements only which flatter its political prejudices.

But is it not a thing unheard of that a journal, which, in less than a fortnight, has committed error upon error in speaking of American affairs—which has stated that it was informed, through private intelligence, that Mr. Slidell had set out for Vichy on a political mission, whilst at the same time he has not yet left Paris—which has mistranslated the Confederate manifesto—which has announced the capture of Atlanta as a fait accompli—which, in fine, relates to-day an imaginary Federal victory—is it not a thing unheard of, I repeat, that such a journal should take upon itself to treat the worthy correspondent of the Times, Dr. Mackay—a man of talent, of the highest respectability, and an eye-witness of what he communicates—as a child who chatters at random, not knowing what he says? It is, however, by such bombast as this, and by cramming his articles with proper names and geographical disssertations, never hesitating to place himself in every imaginable circumstance, and to assume that he alone is aware of what is passing in America, that M. Malespine has succeeded for now nearly two years in inducing a portion of the French public to believe that the Federals were most immaculate Republicans—the Confederates, negro-eaters.

Under the title of 'Le Commencement de la Fin,' M. Aucaigne has contributed a very spirited article to the Progrès de Paris, an excellent journal which appears twice a week. He represents the North as exclaiming on every occasion, whether favourable or unfavourable, 'This is the commencement of the end of the rebellion!' and is of opinion that, provided Europe will lend some slight assistance, we shall in reality soon witness the commencement of the end; but it will be the commencement of the end of the war of conquest now carried on by the North, and not the end of the 'rebellion.'

The Florida, the competitor of the Alabama, has also found her historian. The indefatigable M. Aucaigne has related in the Patrie the first exploits of this cruiser, whose name has already become a terror to the Yankees, and whose career is likely to be brilliant.

AFFAIRS FINANCIAL AND COMMERCIAL.

Wednesday Evening.

MONEY AND DISCOUNT MARKET.

The state of the Money Market is not encouraging, but the rates indicate partial apprehension from the pressure at the Bank. This arises from the bankers and brokers not discounting freely; and since they only make loans at the official minimum, the weight is turned upon Threadneedle Street. The Bank directors are charging from 8 to 9 per cent., and the latter is the quotation for three months' sound trade paper. There is plenty of capital afloat; but through the operation of the Bank Act, the 'screw' works heavily upon those who require financial assistance. With the present state of things in existence, it is perfectly certain that speculation will for the moment be altogether arrested. This will prove so far encouraging, as it will allow matters to right themselves while the Money Market is resuming its original position. The late light rains have been exceedingly beneficial throughout the country, and the harvest is now more favourably spoken of than it was a fortnight ago. If the Bank directors shall further advance the rate, it will sooner bring affairs to a crisis; but it seems to be generally believed that no great strain will be allowed without the interference of Government, as a relaxation of the Act will be more than ever imperatively required should the terms go beyond 9 or 10 per cent. During the time money has been fetching full rates at the Bank and in Lombard Street, the quotations for short loans at the Stock Exchange have varied from 7 to 8 per cent., and back again to 5 and 6 per cent. No doubt can be entertained that if money were to ease in value there would be a general recovery in the Stock and Share Markets.

BULLION AND SPECIE MOVEMENTS.

The market for bullion and specie still retains an unsatisfactory aspect. The withdrawals of gold from the Bank this week for transmission abroad have been to the extent of 138,000*l.*, whilst the amount sent in has been only 4,000*l.* The arrivals of specie, likewise, have not been large, reaching only to 101,006*l.*, of which 64,225*l.* was from New York, 33,181*l.* from the Brazils, and 3,600*l.* from the West Coast; but nearly the whole of these arrivals have been purchased for transhipment. The Magdalena, for the Brazils, takes out 8,500*l.* The silver market remains in a very quiet state, and the price for both bar and Mexican dollars remains without change. The nominal quotation for the former is 61$\frac{1}{4}$d. per oz., and for the latter 63*d.* The amount of gold at present advised from the Australian colonies is very small.

HOME AND FOREIGN SECURITIES.

All the Stock markets have been very much depressed during the week, but that for the English Securities particularly so in consequence of the rate of discount having been so unexpectedly advanced on Thursday last. As soon as the alteration in the Bank rate became known, the funds declined $\frac{1}{4}$ per cent., and there was a similar fall on the following day; and since that period there has been a further unfavourable movement to the extent of $\frac{1}{4}$ per cent., making the total decline since this day week of $\frac{3}{4}$ per cent. Under the circumstances the brokers show but little desire to transact business, and until there is an improvement in the value of money, it is not likely that any material improvement will take place. Consols closed this evening at 89 to 89$\frac{1}{8}$ for money, and 89$\frac{1}{4}$ to 89$\frac{3}{8}$ for the September account. Exchequer bills have further declined, and are now down to 25*s.* to 15*s.* dis. In the Foreign Stock Market business has been slightly more active, and the decline in prices has not been so great comparatively as in the English Securities, and this evening there was a little more firmness exhibited. Greek closed at 23$\frac{3}{8}$ to 23$\frac{5}{8}$, being a fall of $\frac{1}{2}$ per cent. as compared with this day week. Mexican, 28$\frac{1}{2}$ to 29, or a decline of $\frac{3}{8}$ per cent.; Spanish Passives have receded $\frac{3}{4}$ per cent., being down to 29$\frac{5}{8}$ to 29$\frac{7}{8}$; but the Passives have advanced $\frac{1}{2}$ per cent. and are up to 11$\frac{3}{4}$ to 12; Turkish Six per Cents. of 1854, are 89$\frac{1}{2}$ to 90$\frac{1}{2}$; and those of 1862, 69 to 69$\frac{1}{2}$, being a fall of $\frac{1}{2}$ and $\frac{3}{4}$ per cent. respectively.

CONFEDERATE COTTON LOAN.

The market has been remarkably steady this week in spite of general depression. On the Stock Exchange we close 75$\frac{1}{2}$ to 76$\frac{1}{2}$, firm. Four per cent has been given for the call of a large amount during the month of September, therefore ex dividend and drawing.

AMERICAN SECURITIES.

Although there has been rather more doing this week in American Government and Railway Securities than for some time past, still business in this department continues very much depressed, and the dealers evince no desire to operate unless under special orders. Prices show no improvement whatever, but on the contrary are in most instances lower. The only dealings recorded are in Atlantic and Great Western Railway, Pennsylvania section, at ·73. Erie, $100 shares, all paid, at 41$\frac{1}{2}$, 41$\frac{1}{4}$, 41$\frac{1}{2}$, and 41. Illinois Central, $100; shares, $90 paid, at 42$\frac{1}{2}$, 43, and 44 dis. Do. do., all paid, at 53, 51$\frac{3}{4}$, 52$\frac{1}{2}$, 51$\frac{1}{2}$, and 52$\frac{1}{2}$.

RAILWAY SECURITIES.

The market for British Railway Shares has again become exceedingly depressed, in sympathy with all the other departments, and prices for the most part have undergone a considerable relapse; but it may be observed that when the greatest falls have taken place they have occurred to some extent through depreciated dividends. In the present state of affairs there is little disposition shown to operate, consequently the transactions are more restricted than usual. As compared with last week there has been a decline of 3 per cent. in North Eastern (Leeds), and do. (York); of 2 per cent., in Lancashire and Yorkshire, Midland, and North Eastern (Berwick); of 1$\frac{1}{2}$ per cent. in London, Brighton, and South Coast, London and North Western, and Manchester, Sheffield and Lincolnshire; of 1 per cent. in Edinburgh and Glasgow, West Midland (Oxford), London and Blackwall, Chatham and Dover, London and South Western, North Staffordshire, South Devon, South Eastern, Vale of Neath and West Cornwall: of $\frac{1}{2}$ per cent. in Metropolitan, and North Bristol: and of $\frac{1}{4}$ per cent. in East Anglican, and North and South Western Junction. There has also been less doing than usual in Foreign Railway Shares, and those connected with the British possessions, and prices generally are weaker.

MERCANTILE SUSPENSIONS.

The announcement has been made of the suspension of Mr. Ferdinand Frankenheim, merchant, but whose difficulties have arisen through losses on the Stock Exchange. The liabilities are estimated at 100,000*l.*, and the books have been placed in the hands of Messrs. Coleman, Turquand, Youngs, and Co.—The suspension is also announced of Messrs. Newby, Carson, and Co., in the India and China trade. The books have been placed in the hands of Messrs. Edwards and James, accountants.

MEETINGS OF PUBLIC COMPANIES, &c.

At the half-yearly meeting of the East London Bank, the report, which was unanimously adopted, stated that the gross profits had been 10,576*l.*, against which had been charged the current expenses of the head-office and branches for the half-year, amounting to 3,941*l.*; interest on current and deposit accounts amounting to 2,037*l.*; rebate calculated at the bank rate at the date of making up the accounts, viz., 6 per cent., amounting to 1,640*l.*, leaving an available balance of 2,957*l.* to be appropriated to a dividend at the rate of 5 per cent. per annum for the first half-year, free of income tax. A resolution was also adopted for increasing the capital of the companies from 1,000,000*l.* to 2,000,000*l.*—At the half-yearly meeting of the London and County Bank it was shown that the net profit for the past six months, after deducting all charges, amounted to 109,501*l.*, which, added to 16,668*l.* brought forward from the last account, made a total of 126,169*l.* Out of this sum a dividend was declared of 6 per cent., and a bonus of 10 per cent. for the half-year, both free of income tax, amounting together to 104,443*l.*, and leaving a balance of 21,726*l.* to be carried forward to profit and loss new account. The report was unanimously adopted.—At an extraordinary meeting of the London Bank of Scotland, resolutions were passed authorising the voluntary winding-up of the company, and appointing the directors as liquidators, with powers to transfer the assets to the Mercantile and Exchange Bank.—At a meeting of the Mediterranean Extension Telegraph Company the usual dividend of 8 per cent. per annum was declared on the preference shares, and of 4*s.* per share, equal to 4 per cent. per annum, on the original capital.—At the half-yearly meeting of the International Hotel Company, the report, which was adopted, showed that the gross receipts had been 10,025*l.*, and the expenditure 7,204*l.*, leaving a net profit of 2,820*l.*, which, with the amount of 974*l.* brought forward from the previous half-year, after paying the dividend and deducting the sum voted for the directors, gave a sum of 3,795*l.* From this a dividend at the rate of 4 per cent. per annum was declared for the half-year, leaving 814*l.* to be carried forward.—At the twenty-first half-yearly general meeting of the Lands Improvement Company a dividend at the rate of 10 per cent. per annum for the half-year was declared.

PROGRESS OF ENTERPRISE.

The present state of the money market being very unfavourable to the introduction of new joint-stock companies, only two or three have been brought forward this week, and it is probable this branch of enterprise will be very dull for some time, unless money should unexpectedly become cheaper.—The prospectus has been issued of the Crystal Sanitarium Company, the undertaking being promoted for the purpose of carrying out the recommendation of a large section of the medical profession, the special objects of which are implied by the name of the Company. A fine and eligible site has been selected for the required purposes, and operations will be commenced as soon as sufficient funds are raised. The capital asked for is 250,000*l.*, in 12,500 shares of 20*l.* each. A deposit of 1*l.* will be required on application, and 2*l.* on allotment.—The Mersey Steel and Iron Company is another undertaking just introduced, for which a capital of 800,000*l.*, with power to increase, is sought to be raised. The deposit on application is to be 1*l.* per share, and 1*l.* 10*s.* on allotment. The object is to purchase and extend the Mersey Steel and Iron Company, for which the following terms have been agreed upon:—The works and machinery, together with the stock-in-trade, are to be taken at a valuation as a working concern, and the goodwill and business, including large orders on hand, with all other rights and interests of the Company, are arranged to be valued on the basis of the average profits of the three years next preceding the transfer of the property. The present proprietors take 20,000 shares, being one-half of the capital of the Company, and the directors have secured the services of Mr. Clay as managing director.

THE COURSE OF THE PRODUCE MARKETS.

Dear money continues to impede the progress of trade in the produce markets, and transactions are upon the smallest possible scale, whilst prices are again in many cases lower. There is an increased disposition to realise, but this has become extremely difficult, as sales of any important amount could only be effected by reducing prices materially. Meantime, arrivals having for some time past been of fair extent, stocks are increasing. The progress that is being made with the harvest, and more favourable anticipations in reference to the crop, have caused renewed heaviness in the corn trade, and both English and foreign wheats have sold at a further decline in price. Oilcake of all kinds is still in demand, and has further advanced in value, 10*l.* 10*s.* to 11*l.* being now the quotation for New York barrels, and 10*l.* to 10*l.* 5*s.* for bags. Petroleum is depressed, and American refined difficult to sell at 2*s.* 1½*d.* per gallon on the spot, and 2*s.* 2*d.* for October to December. Crude is quoted 18*l.* 10*s.* to 19*l.* per tun. Linseed oil continues in good supply, owing to the demand for cake, and there are free sellers at 36*s.* 6*d.* per cwt. both here and in Hull. Rape oil is dull, but refined is still held for 46*s.* 6*d.*, and brown for 43*s.* per cwt. Palm is rather dearer, fine Lagos making 35*s.* 6*d.* to 36*s.* Cocoanut oil is very unsettled and rates uncertain. Sales of Ceylon are said to have been made at 38*s.*, but 38*s.* 6*d.* to 39*s.* are the prices generally quoted, and for Cochin 40*s.* to 40*s.* 6*d.* In fish oils there is not sufficient doing to stamp quotations. Business has to-day been done in French turpentine at 69*s.*, which is rather under late nominal rates. The tallow market, without being active, continues firm, the protracted droughts being against production; 41*s.* 9*d.* for Y.C. on the spot, and 43*s.* 9*d.* for the last three months, have been the current quotations since our last report. Hemp is still a very slow sale at 33*l.* to 35*l.* for inferior to fine clean St. Petersburg. Saltpetre has undergone a further decline in quotations. Dye goods are for the most part firm, although not active. Jamaica logwood sells at 4*l.* 2*s.* 6*d.*, and Jamaica fustic at 7*l.* to 7*l.* 5*s.* per ton.

LIVERPOOL, Wednesday, August 10.—Our cotton market during the past week has maintained a very steady appearance. Business has not been particularly active, and prices show less firmness. The advance in the value of money has had a great tendency to check speculation, and more disposition is now evinced by holders to press sales, but buyers do not seem inclined to become purchasers except at a further reduction. The arrivals have been moderate, but quite sufficient to meet all demands. The sales this week have been 30,000 bales, of which 5,900 have been taken on speculation and for export. The total sales this year down to the present time have been 1,694,640 bales, and to the same period in 1863, 1,259,736 bales. The imports this year have been 1,363,461 bales against 892,746 bales last year. There have been taken by the trade this year 1,048,530 bales, against 706,749 bales in 1863. This year the exports have been 336,594 bales, whilst last year they were 269,314 bales. There have been taken on speculation this year, 293,340 bales, and in 1863, 278,313 bales. At the present time the estimated stocks are 266,114 bales, and last year at the corresponding period they were 307,210 bales. The closing quotations this afternoon were: American descriptions, 30*d.* to 32*d.*; Pernambuco, 31½*d.* to 32*d.*; Maranham, 31¾*d.* to 32*d.*; Maceio, 29¾*d.* to 30*d.*; Bahia, 30*d.*; Egyptian, 29¼*d.* to 30*d.*; Smyrna, 26¼*d.* to 26½*d.*; Surats, 14¼*d.* to 23¾*d.*; Bengal, 16¼*d.* to 16½*d.*; Scinde, 16¼*d.* to 16½*d.*; China, 18¼*d.* to 20½*d.*; and Japan, 21½*d.* to 22½*d.*

At Manchester business in all branches continues very dull; and is caused chiefly by the inanimate state of the market at Liverpool and the unsettled state of the money market. Buyers on the one hand refuse to operate at present, believing that prices must come down, and spinners and manufacturers showing an indisposition to accept the terms offered. For shipping yarns the market is exceedingly flat, and little or no business is doing. In home trade yarns business is also very quiet, the manufacturers purchasing only in retail. Where offers have been made, slightly lower rates have been accepted, but only for very small quantities. The latest advices from India announced that both mule twist and grey shirtings are slightly improving; but this has had but little or no effect on the home markets. In the cloth market there is literally nothing whatever doing; manufacturers are holding out for full prices, believing that there is no present prospect of the raw material becoming cheaper, though perhaps there is a little weakness on the part of holders of large stocks, though prices can hardly be tested in consequence of the apathy of purchasers. The quotation of all kinds of yarns and cloths is at the present time higher than at any period during the cotton famine, and merchants naturally hesitate about laying out their money in such high-priced goods under present unfavourable circumstances. Although all the markets are evidently weaker, there is no quotable change from the prices previously published.

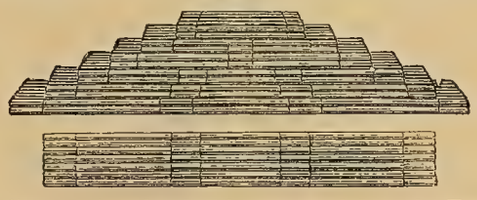
DUNCAN'S PATENT RATAN CANE SPLINTS.


THESE Splints are introduced and recommended to the Faculty for the great advantages which they possess above others,—viz., their comfort, coolness, and durability, as well as the facility with which they may be applied to the fractured limb.
As cleanliness is an important consideration, these Splints possess that quality pre-eminently, as they may be readily washed without the slightest fear of injury.
They are especially adapted to the constant usage of the General Hospital, and the movements of an Army on Service, as they cannot easily be injured. For Colonial practice they are recommended for the same reason.
They have been submitted to, and have received the approbation of, the Principal Medical Officers of the Army Medical Department.
The Splints cannot be injured by moisture; and are manufactured either with or without pads.

Report of the Confederate Secretary of War.

Confederate States of America, War Department,
Richmond, Virginia, April 28, 1864.

To His Excellency Jefferson Davis, President, &c.

SIR,—I have the honour to submit to you the following report of the operations of this department:—

In the brief period since my last report, the inclemency of the season has enforced comparative inaction on the armies in the field. Operations on our part have been mainly defensive, but have been varied by some brilliant affairs of an offensive character, executed generally by cavalry detachments. The enemy have essayed several serious invasions and various marauding incursions. The results have been almost invariably honourable to our arms.

The large force thrown into Mississippi, with the purpose of marching to the attack of Mobile, expended itself along less than a third of its contemplated course, in discreditable ravages against non-combatants, and hasty damages of the railroads, speedily repaired. A decisive repulse of the formidable cavalry column designed to cooperate with them from Tennessee, by not half its force of recently recruited men, under the bold leadership of General Forrest, followed; and then, at the first intimation of the assembling of a force adequate to encounter them, the main army, some twenty-five or thirty thousand strong, beat a hasty retreat. Their whole plan of campaign was effectually broken up; and, besides the losses sustained in men and material by straggling and capture, their troops returned exhausted and discouraged to their strongholds, whence they have not ventured since to emerge.

More signal disaster punished their invasion to subjugate Florida. They were met promptly and gallantly by General Finnegan, with a smaller number of hastily collected troops, and completely defeated, with heavy loss and utter rout, in the decisive battle of Olustee. Driven back to the protection of their ships of war, they received large reinforcements, and for a time threatened the renewal of their invasion, but their most bloody experience of the prowess of our forces, and the great consequent discouragement of their troops, doubtless induced despair of success. They have since withdrawn nearly their entire force, and relinquished as desperate the invasion of a State so courageously defended.

Various raids of the enemy have been made by cavalry, generally in indefensible portions of the Confederacy, and for the most part for purposes of mere rapine and destruction. They have been conducted with a precipitation most wasteful to their men and animals, and indicative of constant apprehension, but have been marked by a malignant spirit and practices of infamy and barbarity that would have disgraced brigands or savages. Their warfare has been almost exclusively on peaceful citizens, and their avowed object has been the destruction of private property; the taking off of the slaves, even by force; the waste of stores and means of subsistence; the destruction of animals and implements of husbandry, and the privation of all means of future production and support to the whole people.

The most important of their raids, undertaken with an unusual force and a special aim, surpassed even their many inhuman enterprises in the atrocity of its discovered designs. It was avowed as an effort, with five thousand picked horsemen, sustained by light artillery, to seize and hold temporarily the capital of the Confederacy, and to liberate the large number of their prisoners held in its vicinity. Our pickets had been thinned by the withdrawal of our cavalry for recruitment and supply, and the enemy succeeded in starting without observation on their enterprise, but it was conducted with a timidity and a feebleness that were in ludicrous contrast with the boldness of the conception and the extent of their means. Fifteen hundred of their number, detached to Charlottesville, for the double purpose of destroying our railroad communications and distracting attention by varied attacks, with the view of subsequently reuniting with the main column, were easily repulsed by a mere handful of half-armed artillerymen with a single gun, when in a few miles of their contemplated prize of Charlottesville, and compelled to fly affrighted back to their main army. Another detachment of some thousand men, under an officer, Colonel Dahlgren, deemed by them one of especial merit, was sent across the country to pass some distance above the city to the south of the James, and coming rapidly on that side, where there was least reason to expect a defensive force, and near which, on an island, were the greater portion of the prisoners, to aid in a combined attack to be made on the north side by the great body of the troops under General Kilpatrick, esteemed among their most enterprising generals. Dahlgren marked his course to the river, unimpeded by any hostile force, only by ravage and incendiarism, but failed wholly to effect a crossing, and sought to cover the timidity that shrank from trying a doubtful ford, by an act of savage vengeance on his negro guide, who indeed well merited his fate, but not at the hands of the enemy, for his treachery to an indulgent master, and his attempted services to a cruel foe. Baffled in this part of his plan, he hastened towards the city on the north side of the river, to unite with Kilpatrick in his proposed attack. Meantime, some hours before his arrival, that attack had been made by the great body of the forces under Kilpatrick, and repulsed by only a few hundred men on one of the outer lines of the city defences, with such ease as, but for the limited number engaged, would almost have deprived the victory of glory. Kilpatrick retired baffled, to find another opportunity, if not, to beat a retreat. Later, near night, Dahlgren approached on the road from the west, down the river, and encountered, a few miles from the city, the most advanced battalion of our forces, which happened to be of the local reserves, and to be composed of clerks recently organised and untried in war. This too was in the open field, without defences of any kind. Yet the charge of this select body of the enemy's cavalry, in superior numbers, was speedily repelled, and they driven off in ignominious flight. Their only purpose seemed escape, but as they hastily pursued after the retreating column of Kilpatrick, they learned that he too had been attacked in the night and his forces dispersed. This gallant deed had been done by General Hampton. He, approaching with about 400 cavalry, hastily summoned to the aid of the city, had been apprised of the locality of the enemy by Colonel Bradley Johnston, who, with a small party of horsemen, had been for many hours courageously scouting round and skirmishing with their forces. Despite his insignificant force General Hampton at once charged the enemy in his camp, and after a brief struggle, routed them, capturing many men and horses. Being too weak to pursue, he was compelled to allow them to escape with impunity, but their only thought afterwards seemed to be of rapid flight, and the next day they found a refuge in a supporting force of cavalry, that had been sent up the peninsula to their relief. Startled by the intelligence of this disaster, Dahlgren's men seem, many, to have scattered, finding their way to Kilpatrick's column, while their leader, with some hundreds of his choice men, crossed the Pamunkey, with the hope of evading Hampton, and escaping across the country to Gloucester Point. In King and Queen, they were encountered by some few furloughed cavalry and a local company, hurriedly summoned for pursuit. Ambuscaded by them, Colonel Dahlgren and a few of his men were killed, and the residue of the force under his command speedily surrendered as prisoners. Thus ingloriously and disastrously terminated an expedition, inaugurated with formidable forces, and with high anticipations of great results. But the disgrace of failure was exceeded by the infamy of the base designs of the expedition. On the body of Colonel Dahlgren, the chosen and specially trusted leader, were found copies of the plan and purposes of the expedition, and the original of his address to his soldiers on starting. These disclosed, unequivocally, the nefarious purpose, after liberating their prisoners, to turn them loose, armed and maddened by privation and every evil passion, and by them, with the aid and under the protection of the embodied forces, to sack, burn, and destroy the city, and to kill the President and leading authorities of the Confederate Government. The dullest sensibility will sicken and revolt at the horrible brutalities and atrocities that must have attended such a carnival of crime. The perpetration of such deeds by an infuriated soldiery, under all the fierce impulses of a sanguinary struggle, and in the flush of triumph, is by all nations felt to be a reproach on the character and humanity of man; but that such horrors should have been deliberately planned and ordered by the authorities of any people professing to be civilised and Christian, must inflict an indelible stigma of hypocrisy and infamy. Such fell designs might seem almost incredible of any other people, but they are supported by irrefragable evidence in the possession of the papers themselves, with conclusive indications, internal and external, of their authenticity. It is only the culmination of many inferior exhibitions of like malignity and atrocity. The captives taken in the abortive effort to perpetrate these or like atrocities, must be admitted to have forfeited all rights to the privileges of civilised warfare, and might well be punished by their intended victims, as the worst of criminals; but it has been thought to comport more with the dignity and self-command of an enlightened Government, as well as to be more consistent with the humanity, clemency and Christianity that has, throughout this war, characterised our people and authorities, not to mete out bloody retaliation on the subordinate instruments of an infamous Government, but to consign them for retribution to the reprobation of outraged Christendom and the lasting stigma of recording history.

Our armies in the field are believed to be in excellent condition and spirits. Inured to war, and practised in habits of endurance, they have passed through the exposure and privations of the winter and inclement spring with remarkable health and content. Animated by an invincible resolution not to be subdued, and a zeal of patriotic self-devotion beyond all praise, they have almost universally reenlisted for the war, and voluntarily renewed the pledge of their all—their property, their labour and themselves—to the sacred cause of the safety and independence of the country. They have reacted on the people everywhere, encouraging the bold and shaming the timid to more confident reliance on a future of success, and have effectually hushed the whisperings of despondency or disaffection. They were never more confident and reliant on themselves and their commanders, and relatively, as is believed, more nearly than heretofore approximating the number of their enemies, they await with assurance and ardour the shock of the coming campaign.

The measures of legislation to secure meritorious officers and repress irregularities and desertion, have operated beneficially on the discipline and morale of the army. Thorough organisation may not yet have been effected in forces which had to be suddenly and provisionally organised, but steady advance is being made to the attainment of the utmost discipline and efficiency. The recent assignment at the capital of a supervising commander of all the armies, besides promoting the harmony and consistency of military movements, has brought to aid in the work of organisation the experience, known administrative capacity, and acknowledged abilities of one of our leading generals, and may be expected to prove productive of salutary results.

Some deficiencies of organisation yet require emendatory legislation. The staff, affording to the quick intelligence of the general his perceptive and administrative faculties, should be constituted of the best material, have the highest attainable experience and qualifications, and be animated by strong incentives to activity and improvement. Unfortunately, in our army, it has not enjoyed the repute, nor, perhaps, in consequence, commanded the merits desirable for its efficiency. From unavoidable circumstances, probably, the staff has been too much the object of favouritism, through the recommendations on behalf of personal friends, or the refuge of supernumeraries and those by non-election or otherwise thrown out of the line of regular service. They have come to be considered in some measure as attachés to the persons and fortunes of their respective generals, rather than as officers selected for peculiar qualifications and assigned to special duties. In consequence of this kind of estimation, probably, they have not been allowed rank consistent with their importance, or regulated appropriately by the standard of merit. These evils it is most desirable to remove, and it is respectfully suggested that the remedy may be found in organising the respective departments of the staff into separate corps, with due gradations in rank, and in affording the incentive of advance on the exhibition of qualifications of superior merit. Some increase in the numbers to be attached to the larger commands of the army, as well as the proposed advance in rank, would also seem advisable. This is, indeed, almost a necessity in relation to the commissary and quartermaster branches of the staff service. The law has never made direct provision for the appointment of such officers to organisations larger than brigades. Experience has demonstrated them to be essential, not only to the army as a whole, to assure harmony and unity to its movements and due distribution of supplies, but likewise from similar reasons to corps and divisions, which not unfrequently have to act independently and at wide intervals of distance. In consequence, there has been no alternative but for the general in command, or the department, to withdraw and assign, by detail, from their proper brigades, the quartermasters and commissaries indispensable to the larger organisations of the army. Such assignments have rendered oftentimes imperative the appointment of other officers of the same branch of service to the destitute brigades; and thus indirectly, and with only the rank and legal assignment of brigade officers, have these essential officers of the staff been secured to the divisions, corps, and armies in the field. This has been so well understood, that in one of the acts of Congress there has been implied sanction by reference to such division and corps officers. Still, action in such cases, without more direct authorisation of law, is always embarrassing to the department, and not incapable of mischievous effects in the establishment of precedents, and it is earnestly recommended that such appointments be directly sanctioned by law.

In another particular, respecting the appointment of quartermasters and commissaries, it is desirable the law should be made more explicit. The only authority for the appointment of these officers, not for commands in the field, but for the general service of the bureaus, is conferred by the act of February 15, 1862, which provides:

'That in addition to the number of quartermasters, assistant quartermasters, commissaries, and assistant commissaries, now allowed by law, the President shall have authority to appoint as many of said officers as shall, in his discretion, be deemed necessary at permanent posts and depôts.'

This seems to contemplate that the officers of this class for the general service are only required at posts and depôts, and are expected to be stationary there; but in reality there is an imperative necessity for a greater number to be distributed and actively engaged in all parts of the Confederacy, purchasing, accumulating, and moving supplies, and supervising the administration of the extended operations of the commissary and quartermaster's service. As such officers are all remotely connected with, and report to, the respective bureaus stationed at the capital, or more immediately to a superior officer at some post or depôt, the above act was, from an early period after its passage, construed to authorise the appointment of as many quartermasters and commissaries as the necessities of the general service demanded, and such has been the continued practice of the department. Doubt may, however, exist whether this be not a latitude of construction dictated rather by the necessity of the case than justified by the language and original conception of the act. The law should explicitly confer a power of appointment co-extensive with the needs of the service, for the exercise of a questionable right of appointment is always to be deprecated. In such matters encroachment is facile and precedents dangerous, and as little latitude to excess as practicable should be left by the law makers.

On another point, of more importance, ambiguity exists, which should be corrected by more explicit legislation. It is in relation to the appointment and tenure of office of the general officers of the provisional army. The system pervading the organisation of the provisional army does not allow the appointment of officers at large assignable to any command appropriate to their grade of rank, but only to the officers of each special organisation, on the legal continuance of which their commissions are dependent. This is clear as to the company and field officers, as may be illustrated by the fact that such officer of a company or regiment is not a captain or colonel at large of the provisional army, but only the captain or colonel of his particular company or regiment. The disbandment or termination of the service of such special organisation loses the officers their commissions. The same principle of organisation seems to have been originally contemplated in the provision by the act of the Provisional Congress of March 6, 1861, for the appointment of general officers to brigades and divisions, and by analogy, as is presumable, likewise to the commanders of corps when they were authorised. It would thus have resulted that appointments of general officers could only be made to special brigades, divisions, or corps, and that if any general officer was either wounded, incapacitated, temporarily, or otherwise withdrawn from his special command, no successor could be appointed; and that on any brigade, division, or corps being broken up or radically changed by the diversion or redistribution of its component parts, the general officer would go out of commission. The inconveniences and hardships hence resulting were so great and manifest, that although in the first instance a disposition was manifested by the Executive to maintain this scheme of appointment and tenure of office, almost of necessity it had to be practically overlooked in the many changes inevitable in the composition of such large organisations, and general officers came to be assignable from one brigade to another, or to secure an actual commander in the field in case of temporary disability of the general officer previously commanding, from capture, wounds, or other temporary cause, were appointed for the destitute organisations. This came to be recognised and acted on as a necessity by Congress, as well as the Executive, and to obviate the inconveniences or embarrassments which might result from a deficiency in the number of general officers, the Act of October 13, 1862, was adopted. This Act provides 'That the President be, and he is hereby authorised, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, to appoint twenty general officers in the provisional army, and to assign them to such appropriate duties as he may deem expedient.' Under this law there is no doubt that the Executive may appoint, to a number not exceeding twenty, general officers of the provisional army at large, who may be assignable to any command or duty appropriate to their rank, whose commissions are not contingent on their special commands. As thus a number of supernumerary officers, not exceeding twenty in number, were authorised, it was considered, by construction, to obviate, so long as that number was not exceeded, any obligation of discharging such general officers as were, from any changes of the service or otherwise, thrown out of their special commands, and to allow even those originally appointed to such special commands, by being considered as among this number of supernumeraries, to be assigned to any other appropriate duties or commands. On these points, however, well-founded doubts exist, since the original appointments may perhaps more justly determine whether the general officer be the officer of a special command, dependent on its continuance, or be one of the supernumerary class assignable at will. Such construction, however sustainable by the language and apparent contemplation of the law, would be both unjust and mischievous. Very many of the most capable general officers in the service, oftentimes because of their superior merits selected for other more important stations, under the changes of the service are no longer attached to the special commands for which they were appointed, and successors have replaced them, or in the distribution of forces their original organisations have been broken up. Shall they be thrown out of commission and deprived of commands? Nor would the injustice be more than partially remedied by placing them among the supernumerary class, since for that a new appointment would be necessary, which would deprive them of their original date, and postpone them to all juniors previously in commission. On the other hand, if those originally appointed as supernumeraries are always to be considered as of that class, and not on assignment to a particular command to hold the relation of a commander originally appointed for it, the number allowed by the law would be at once exceeded, without meeting the deficiencies of the service. An invidious distinction would be established between officers of the same grade in the provisional army, founded solely on the accident of appointment, which could not fail to be prolific of jealousies, rivalries, and discontents.

In view of the whole subject, it is recommended that all general officers of the provisional army, like the supernumeraries, be made independent of their commands, and assignable, according to rank, to any appropriate command or duty.

A slight extension of the power of appointing chaplains for the army is likewise desirable. There is, happily, a large religious element and much devotional feeling in our army, which every consideration of policy, no less than grateful duty, requires should be consulted and fostered. At present, chaplains can only be appointed to posts and regiments. Now, the men of one of the most important branches of service, the artillery, are not regimentally organised, but formed either in detached companies or arranged in battalions. Hence to them cannot be afforded the guidance or consolations of religious ministry. It is suggested that a chaplain should be allowed for every ten detached companies, or to two battalions, when so situated as to permit to them a common ministration.

The Act of the late Congress for retiring disabled officers and men has been put in execution, and is working beneficially for the army. Its provisions, however, do not seem to have been commensurate with the claims of equity and gratitude due to the gallant soldiers who have been shattered in health, or maimed by the exposures and wounds of service. It is confined in its operation only to such as are still on the rolls of the army, and has no respect to those who may have been, by resignation or otherwise, heretofore put out of service. No adequate cause, either in reason or justice, can be perceived for such limitation. Indeed, on the score of merit, the cases of those who had continued, while incapable of active duty in the field, on sick leave, or in positions of legal duty, rather cumbering than aiding the service, appear less entitled to consideration than those more disinterested officers who sacrificed their commissions, often their sole dependence, from honourable sensibility, lest they should block the promotion of the inferior officers on whom their duties had been cast. Not a few cases of this kind have been known to the Department, in which the acceptance of the resignation, while constrained by the interests of the service, has been done with pain and regret at the necessity of allowing the self-sacrifice which a sense of honour imposed on the gallant officer. The sole consideration which can exist to prevent the extension to all such resigned officers of the privileges accorded by the act to those still in service, is the ungracious one of economy, which, in a liberal view, would be as inapplicable from true policy as from a due regard to the sentiment of justice and gratitude involved. As very many of those disabled or scarred veterans are still capable of much service at posts or other light duties, their restoration to rank would probably prove much more a gain than a burden to the country, while it would manifest grateful appreciation and secure some partial provision for the honoured sufferers of our campaigns. It is, therefore, earnestly recommended that the privileges of the act be extended to embrace those who, from like causes of disability or wounds in service, have heretofore resigned or been discharged.

The corps of engineer troops authorised by the late Congress, after not a few impediments and delays resulting from the reluctance of commanders to part with, by details, their veterans from the line, have at last been organised, in the main of new material, and have been provided with the requisite trains and implements of service. They have been the object of special interest and care to the able head of the engineer bureau, and to his intelligent supervision and persistent efforts are mainly due their efficient organisation and complete provision. They are composed for the most part of picked men, and embody many valuable mechanics and skilled labourers, who, guided by the intelligence and experience of officers selected from their peculiar qualifications and training as engineers, cannot fail to prove eminently advantageous in facilitating the movements and providing the defences of our armies. Their merits and value are already warmly appreciated and acknowledged by the generals who have enjoyed the advantages of their services; and it is not doubted they will so advance, with increased experience and practice, in estimation and utility, as to fully vindicate the wisdom of their organisation.

The boards of examination, the military courts and the provisions of the late law allowing officers to be dropped on the recommendations of commanding generals, are operating favourably on the discipline and efficiency of the army. Grave doubts have, however, been expressed by one of our most distinguished generals, whether changes by a law of the late session in relation to the military courts have not so closely assimilated them, in the necessity of referring charges and having them reviewed in each case by the commanding general, to general courts martial, as to have diminished their efficiency in facilitating the dispatch of cases and promptitude of punishment. Modification of the law in these respects is therefore respectfully suggested. Indeed, the mass of business cast on the reviewing authorities—the commanding general, the department and the President—by these various modes of removing incompetency and punishing offences, cannot be dispatched without neglecting other duties of higher import. The responsibilities, however, entailed are of so grave and delicate a character, and involve so much of personal discretion, that they cannot be discarded or consigned to others. Remedial legislation in these particulars is urgently demanded. It is, with deference, suggested that an officer, to be connected with the Adjutant-General's bureau, and to be designated the Judge Advocate-General, with the rank at least of colonel, to be aided by assistants, one to be with the commanding general of each separate army in the field, with the rank at least of lieutenant-colonel, be authorised, whose duty it shall be to review in the first instance all sentences of the military courts, courts martial, and examining boards, with the right of appeal within a limited time, where the cases were tried in the field and the sentence deprived the accused of either commission or life. This appeal might be first to the general commanding, who might either decide it finally or suspend execution and refer it, through the Judge Advocate-General to the department, to be decided by it, or, at its discretion, submitted to the President. In all cases not arising and tried with an army in the field, the review might be, in the first instance, by the Judge Advocate-General, subject to the right of like appeal, when life or commission was the forfeiture of the sentence, to the department, which should either decide or submit to the President. Of course, the privilege of interposing by executive clemency, vested in the President, would remain unaffected, and application, in appropriate form, might be made to him in all cases. By the plan proposed, or some similar one, all venial cases and a large proportion of grave ones would be disposed of, without burdening the commanding general or the department. So only those of special gravity would come to the department, or claim the action of the President, while the gracious prerogative of mercy would in all be reserved to him. Promptitude and certainty in the disposition of all cases would be reconciled with due consideration and full revision.

More important advantage to the service, it is believed, would result from the extension of the power now entrusted to the Executive, of assigning to commands, with temporary rank, officers of the Confederate army, to officers likewise of the provisional army. The power has been both useful and convenient with respect to the former, and the considerations that recommend it apply with daily increasing force to officers of the provisional army. In the service, the power of promptly rewarding and advancing decided merit presents an invaluable incentive to improvement and the display of high qualities. The right, too, of selecting from all ranks or branches of the service, without being restricted by the gradations of permanent rank, the officers who may have shown qualities eminently adapting them for special commands, must conduce greatly to the development and command of the highest qualifications of leadership. Surprise has not unfrequently been felt and expressed that, though happily blessed with not a few generals distinguished alike by skill and success, yet with our armies, composed in large degree of such intelligent and cultivated men, and characterised by such high courage and proclivities for war, more of conspicuous ability and military genius have not been elicited and displayed. That these rare and inestimable gifts exist latent within our armies cannot be doubted, but our system, especially in the provisional army, has not been calculated to foster or discover them. Officers in that army made strictly dependent on and confined to limited organisations in special branches of the service, and, whatever their peculiar qualifications, cannot be permanently assigned nor be advanced, save by the accident of promotion by seniority, or even on the display of distinguished valour and skill, except in their limited organisations. As the officers of the provisional army improve in experience and military attainments, it becomes more and more important that they should not be confined to special branches of service, but have varied or enlarged spheres of action, so as to be prepared for more general commands, and that their special capacities should be utilised to the greatest advantage. Besides the benefits attained by temporary assignments, grave inconveniences would likewise be avoided. All advancements, when made, especially with officers not trained by military education or experience antecedent to the war, must necessarily be in large measure experimental and of doubtful results, and yet they are permanent, however unsuited or inefficient. Unless positively incompetent, the officers must remain in their new commands, scarce equal to their duties and incapable of inspiring confidence or enthusiasm, and yet often by their rank overshadowing or blocking the way to their superiors in all the endowments for command. It would have been far better to have tested, by temporary assignment, the qualities of the officer for the increased rank and command, before he was irretrievably fixed in it. It is often found that an admirable captain proves unequal to the command of a regiment, or an accomplished colonel fails in the wider command of a brigadier, and not unfrequently in even higher rank will the distinguished subordinate general prove inadequate to wider or independent command. The officer, especially in an army so improvised and hastily organised, should be tested and approved in each important advance, by command with temporary assignment, before being permanently established in his increased grade. In short, the practice of such assignments would afford the highest incentives; would give enlarged experience and opportunities of display; would foster and elicit special merits and military genius, and would assure, in permanent commands, approved capacities.

Serious inconvenience has been caused to officers in the field, and much suffering in some instances to officers at posts, by the late law giving, but restricting the former to, one ration, and allowing the latter the privilege of purchasing only one. It is respectfully recommended that the law be so amended as to give officers in the field one ration, and to allow to all the privilege of purchase, subject to such regulations as may be imposed by the department. This cannot possibly result in any injury to the public service, while the object of the late law will be attained, which was obviously to confer a benefit and not work a hardship.

In this connection, it is appropriate to advert to the peculiar and rather anomalous provision of the existing law regulating the pay and allowances of general officers. No difference in these respects is made among them, with the sole exception (under the present exceptional rates of prices) of trivial effect, that to the general actually commanding an army in the field there is the added allowance of a hundred dollars a month. No distinction otherwise in pay or allowances is made from a brigadier up to a general. As with increase of rank and command additional expenditures and charges are imposed, the simple consideration of justice would demand correspondingly increased pay and allowances. Equality in such cases is inequity, but, in addition, it is contrary to all experience and practice to have no consideration in compensation to increased dignity and more important service. A singular illustration of the present inequity of the law is presented by the fact that the veteran general recently assigned to the duty of directing, under the President, all our armies, and required to incur all the expenses of a residence at the capital, is deprived of the additional allowance he would have had as a general commanding an army in the field, and receives no more than the latest brigadier. It is surely only right that pay and allowances should have an appropriate relation to rank and extent of duties, entailing, as they must, larger expenditures, and it is confidently hoped that our general officers of the more advanced grades will no longer be enforced to the embarrassments, privations and destitution of attendants, by which, under the present compensation allowed and the restrictions on the subject of rations, in the midst of their anxieties and high responsibilities, they are now annoyed.

Attention is likewise called to the necessity for some adequate provision to defray the expenses of officers travelling under orders. The present allowances are insufficient to bear the charges, which no economy, or even parsimony, can avoid, and the inadequate pay of the officer little enables him to discharge such expenses. The simplest justice requires that, at least, the necessary expenses incurred in obedience to orders should be defrayed by the Government.

Some provision should likewise be made to compensate the commissioners directed to be appointed by the Act suspending, in certain cases, the writ of habeas corpus. The duties are of a delicate and responsible character, and the compensation should be liberal enough to engage the services of men of high character and intelligence.

The recent military bills, increasing the range of conscription, have engaged the constant attention and energetic efforts of the able head of the Conscript Bureau in their enforcement. His accompanying report, to which attention is invited, will exhibit results so far attained in recruiting the armies, and, at the same time, explain the embarrassments and impediments which have hindered more rapid execution. These have resulted very much from the necessity of examining the numerous claims presented for exemptions or details under the exceptions and avowed policy of the law, and from the difficulty of commanding the class and number of assistants and officers for the multifarious duties cast on the bureau. Owing to the decadence of the volunteering spirit, a large proportion of those liable to enrolment prefer claims of exemption or detail, which justice, and regard for the aims avowed in the law, require to be investigated and decided. At the same time the omission of Congress to authorise the appointment of officers for enrolling service, and the expectation that officers to be retired under the Invalid Bill would suffice by assignment for such duties, have placed the conscription service under something like a temporary privation. The period of such transition from old to new agencies, under the most favourable circumstances, would have been embarrassing and retarding, but the delays have been increased by the necessity of awaiting the process of retiring

In natural connection with [illegible] the thought is attracted to the [illegible] gallant soldiers, now languishing [illegible]. The sympathies of a [illegible] the deepest interest, and the [illegible] responded to those feelings [illegible] with dignity and [illegible]. The protraction of their [illegible] has been due solely to the inhuman policy and perfidy of our enemy, which [illegible] has omitted and refused to [illegible] the cartel of exchange. With the terms of that [illegible] our Government has been [illegible], and in a variety of modes, even by an extraordinary [illegible] of the second officer of the Government, has sought to re-establish its operation or to arrange satisfactory measures of exchange. Its remonstrances and its overtures have alike proved futile, and the Government of the United States must stand responsible before the world, and in the sight of a just God, for all the privations, sufferings, and loss of life, by disease or otherwise, entailed by confinement on the prisoners held on either side, not less on their own than on ours. The latest among the shifts and subterfuges adopted by them to evade compliance with their plighted engagement, has been the selection, with the ostensible purpose of renewing exchanges, for the mission of treating on the subject with our authorities, of General Butler, the infamous author of so many atrocities in a former command as to have received the execration of the world, and to have been banned by the proclamation of the President with the name and character of an outlaw and a felon, to whom were to be extended none of the privileges of civilised warfare, but whose crimes, if he came into our power, were to be visited with the condign punishment of an infamous death. It may well excite surprise and indignation that the Government of the United States should select, for any position of dignity or command, a man so notoriously stigmatised by the common sentiment of enlightened nations, but it is not for us to deny their right to appreciate and select whom they may, not inappropriately perhaps, deem a fitting type and representative of their power and characteristics. While we maintain belligerent relations with them, we must, of course, recognise the official character of whatever officers they may empower to act within their own limits and within the sphere of their separate action. We must, therefore, recognise the fact of official position being held by such a character, and this was done contemporaneously and subsequently to the issue of the President's proclamation, by our generals in the field, when compelled to necessary official relations with the Federal commander at New Orleans; but when option can be exercised by ourselves, and within the limits of our own territory or within the control of our armies, it is neither to be expected, nor would it comport with the honour or dignity of the Confederacy, that an outlaw and a felon should be received and admitted to the courtesies or privileges of civilised warfare, or exempted from the liabilities of a criminal. It has held him up to the detestation of Christendom and obtained the answering award of moral condemnation from the tribunal of enlightened public sentiment everywhere. Within its limits, and wherever its power may enable it to execute justice, he has been and will be held an outlaw and a felon. To essay more would be a [illegible] ful[illegible] against the criminal, yet entail inconveniences to our own Government and injury to innocent victims of his malevolence. In this view, the Government has sought to regulate its action. It has not denied the power or position, however unworthily bestowed by his own Government on General Butler, within their limits, but has refused to receive or admit him within ours. If an honest purpose of effecting exchanges, in compliance with the cartel or on equitable terms, be really entertained by the enemy, all the arrangements essential thereto may be readily attained consistently with the position thus justly held by our Government, while, if the selection was intended merely as a pretext of avoidance, or for the purpose of gratuitous offence, the hypocrisy of the one design or the malignity of the other will be exposed. Since this relation has been held, some limited exchanges by indirect communication have been effected, and hopes are entertained, especially in view of the increased number of prisoners which recent successes have given us, that the inhuman policy and delusive pretences of the enemy will be abandoned, and the equitable stipulations of the cartel be again acknowledged and executed. Such consummation would thrill with emotions of gratification the whole population of the Confederacy, and bear relief and consolation to thousands of families throughout the land. For a fuller history and explanation of all the pro-

The requirement [illegible] of local appraisements [illegible] to a general [illegible] a very defective mode of securing only just compensation, and is [illegible] calculated to [illegible] desires and to foment the discontents which always spring from inequality and diversity of prices. Such appraisements, it is submitted, do not afford a [illegible] criterion of just compensation and [illegible] circumstances of the Confederacy. A much juster rule would be the cost of production with a fair profit thereon, to be determined by [illegible] of undoubted probity and intelligence. The expediency of the tithe tax has been fully vindicated, as it has proved a most valuable resource for the subsistence of the armies and the most acceptable form of imposition on the producers. It should certainly be continued, and, in my judgment, on some leading articles of subsistence, such as beef, wheat, rice, and products of the sugar cane, should be increased. Some delays have arisen in its collection from the lack of adequate transportation, and from the want of harmony between the assessors and collectors. As the supervision of both classes of officers is now reposed in the same department, more unity of action may hereafter be expected. In the amendments made to the law, however, at the last session, too limited a time has, according to the judgment and experience of the officers charged with its execution, been allowed for collection before the privilege of commutation. That period is limited to five months only, within which all collections must be completed. With the means of transport and storage possessed this is physically impracticable throughout the whole Confederacy. An extension of the period to at least eight months is therefore recommended.

[illegible] large sacrifices for [illegible]

rious results should enable the people overrun to endure the many sacrifices such policy of withdrawal must entail.

In Texas and Louisiana, the invasions of the past winter have either accomplished ridiculously small results, in comparison with the formidable commands employed, or have been successfully repelled. In Western Louisiana especially, the various advances of the enemy into the interior have met from our forces, under the skilful leadership of General Taylor, repeated and signal discomfitures. Of the most formidable of their invasions, attempted apparently for the subjugation of the whole country by several converging columns of their land forces, aided by a formidable fleet of gunboats on the river, we are as yet imperfectly acquainted with results, as the wise policy of our able commander has withdrawn the scene of conflict to the far interior. We have only meagre and glozing accounts through the journals of the enemy, yet they suffice to show reiterated disasters sustained, and afford grounds for sanguine hope to us that they have met the retribution of fearful losses and may have been entirely captured or destroyed. Another San Jacinto may signalise the annals of the south-west, and illustrate the fearful risk to an invading army of pressing, with the purpose of subjugation, to the interior defences of a free and gallant people.

The abundant productions of this fertile region have fortunately precluded all deficiencies of supplies for subsistence to either the armies or the people. In this respect they are fully provided. Their needs are rather of munitions and manufactured stores. Even before the interruption of communications with the east, efficient means had been adopted for the establishment of foundries, arsenals, and manufacturing establishments of various kinds, and for the development of the mineral and other internal resources of the country. These efforts have been since pressed with increased vigour and with most creditable success. No long time will elapse before, in all material respects, the trans-Mississippi department will be made self-sustaining for war. Meantime, most liberal contracts and all other practicable measures have been adopted to afford them requisite supplies by importation of arms, munitions, and quartermaster's stores. These have been, at least, partially successful, and have met the most pressing wants. The deficiency most to be deplored is of a full supply of arms, and this has resulted from no want of foresight or exertion on the part of the Government, but from casual miscarriages and unexpected and most unjustifiable seizures of large cargoes by neutral powers. The subsequent rendition of them, with acknowledgment of error, at distant points, by no means remedied the mischiefs the injustice had inflicted. Notwithstanding the frustration in this way of well-concerted arrangements for supplies of arms and munitions, others have been rewarded with success, and measures, now in train of execution, it is confidently hoped, will soon remove existing deficiencies. It is not improbable this has been already more speedily and effectively accomplished by the triumph of our arms and the capture of the abundant stores of the enemy. It is certainly mortifying to think that brave men are kept from the field, when their all is staked, by the want of arms, yet if they can be supplied by the spoils of victory, they will find, in their equipment, at once encouragement and an inspiration of generous emulation to gallant achievements. They will know, too, the value of their arms, and how they should be both guarded and used.

The legislation of the late Congress for the trans-Mississippi department was both liberal and provident. Provision was made for the peculiar needs incident to its comparative isolation from the supervision of the central Government, and all the agencies of a partially independent Government were authorised. In the same spirit has been the action of the Executive. Added rank and dignity have been bestowed on the able commander and administrator at its head, and to him has been intrusted the full measure of executive powers which, under our constitutional system, could be exercised by other than the President. Thus, full confidence has been manifested by both branches of the Government in his fidelity, capacity, and judgment, and all the incentives to effort, and all the means of accomplishment which could be commanded, have been imparted. It is not doubted such unusual trusts are merited and will be justified in their exercise, and that continuing confidence and sanction to his administration of affairs will be assured by its happy results. Accounts concur in representing him as enjoying likewise the esteem and confidence of the people of the department. They, notwithstanding the sacrifices and losses to which they have necessarily been subjected, are believed to be resolute, hopeful, and reliant both on themselves and their leaders. Portions of their country may be overrun or temporarily occupied by the hosts of their unscrupulous foes, but they know that with the resources in men and means, and the advantages for defence of their extensive department, employed with energy and skill, the attempt to subdue a people as brave and determined as themselves is one of folly and madness. They endure with fortitude their temporary ills, await with patience the hour of approaching retribution, and anticipate with confidence the overthrow of their hateful enemies and their final disgraceful expulsion or destruction. In view of the means at command, of the invincible spirit of the people, the skill of their leaders, and the approved prowess of their soldiers, the trans-Mississippi department may be regarded as no less than the States of the Confederacy east, prepared, against the utmost efforts of their malignant enemies, for successful defence, and assured of ultimate triumph.

Attention is invited to the accompanying report of the Commissioner of Indian Affairs. Credit is due to that officer for the dangers and privations he has endured in twice visiting the distant abodes of the Indian tribes. His presence and influence among them have proved salutary in affording encouragement and maintaining fidelity. It is important they should be dealt with in a spirit of consideration and liberality. They should not suffer from the changes which have been made in our financial system, the necessity and wisdom of which they cannot be expected to have foreseen or now to understand. The recommendation, therefore, by the Commissioner of timely legislation to authorise substitution of the new currency for the old, without loss to them, is approved and seconded. The great body of the Indians, notwithstanding their losses, are attached to the Confederacy and confident in its fortunes, and, with reasonable consideration for their peculiar wants and feelings, may easily be retained in amity and fidelity.

We have now entered on the fourth year of the war; and the end is not yet. Originating in the wrong and perfidy of our enemies, it is continued through their rage and hate. We have asked and seek only peace and separation from them. They profess to enforce a detested union, and wage really a war of conquest and extermination. Prostrating their own constitution and surrendering their liberties, they are intent only to crush ours. A campaign of momentous events is impending on us. For it our people stand prepared and resolute. Nor have their representatives proved unworthy exponents of their indomitable purpose and self-sacrificing patriotism. The measures of the late Congress, considered as a combined system, are characterised by high resolve and enlarged statesmanship. They concentrate the energies and resources and command the men and property of the Confederacy in larger measure than have ever been done by any Government. The whole male population capable of arms, from seventeen to fifty, are either marshalled to the field or organised in reserves, ready to be summoned. One-third of the currency of the Confederacy has been annulled, and taxation of unprecedented amount has been exacted from all values. One-tenth of productions in kind has been claimed without pay, and, besides, the residue and all property has been subjected to seizure and conversion for public use at moderate rates of just compensation. The railroads, the great means of internal trade and communication, are made primarily subservient to the necessities of Government. Even the great writ of personal liberty is suspended in cases requisite to preclude evasion of military service, or to repress uprisings of disaffection or disloyalty. In short, by their representatives, the people, not reluctantly, but eagerly and fearful rather of shortcoming than excess, have, through regular constitutional action, commanded for their country and its cause the labour, property, and lives of all. In the consciousness of such devotion and sacrifice to a righteous cause, they may well feel reliant and indomitable, and await with constancy and faith the shock of coming battle. They have, too, much to encourage and every incentive to nerve and animate. Our enemies exhibit unmistakable indications of despondency, of approaching bankruptcy, and internal convulsion. They will be, during the year, in the throes of intense political struggle, distracted beyond all precedent by the jars and strifes of acrimonious factions, contending for the prize of almost despotic power and madly extravagant expenditure. To a large proportion of their people, and among them the wisest and the best, the vile faction who are the authors and prosecutors of the war are scarce less odious than to ourselves, and with nearly as much reason, since its triumph is the practical subversion of their constitution and laws, and the precursor of speedy destruction to their, as surely to our, liberties. If any redemption remains to the people of the United States from the wickedness and madness that have urged them to this war, it can only be by recurrence to the principles of self-government in the people of the States and to the counsels of peace.

All the indications of the incipient campaign, too, are auspicious and inspiring. Cheering accounts of successes greet us from every quarter of the Confederacy. Since the penning of the first pages of this report, the notes of decisive victory, imperfectly heard from the remote confines of the trans-Mississippi, have been swollen by the acclaim from Paducah and Fort Pillow, and have culminated in the shouts of complete triumph at the brilliant achievements of a young and rising general of North Carolina on his native soil. Many minor successes contribute to justify grateful exultation, but all should fail to excite presumption, and only animate to greater effort and to humbler trust in the blessing of Heaven on our arms.

The greatest incentive yet remains. Our only outlet to existence and safety is through the portals of victory. We have burned the ships behind us. It will not do to fail. Subjected to the hate and brutality of our malignant foes, to what depths of penury, misery and baseness should we not be crushed? Our Confederacy would be extinct; our States broken up; our institutions, social and industrial, uprooted, and our people stripped of property, liberty and all rights, now and in coming generations, the thralls of Yankees and their allied hordes of miscreant foreigners, held to the tasks of drudgery and infamy by the insolent ministry of our slaves in arms. No conquered people would have ever writhed under such masters, nor have been steeped in such bitterness and infamy. For this end shall we have made such priceless sacrifices of blood and treasure, and done and dared as our army and people have in this war? Shall the hosts of our gallant dead our noble army of martyrs—in vain have attested with their lives the sacredness and truth of their country's cause? Are they to live in memory not enshrined amid the halo of fame for the inspiration and reverence of future generations, but branded for warning and execration, with the lasting stigma of a rebel's name and a traitor's fate? Are the thousands and tens of thousands of the invalided, the scarred and maimed heroes of this war, instead of being followed through life with the homage of honour and gratitude, to drag out a wretched existence, the conspicuous objects of detestation, obloquy, and contempt? Shall we and ours, from the honoured sire and beloved mother to the maiden in her purity or the prattling innocent, with all our homes and means, be the victims or prey of Yankee insolence, cupidity, and hate? We cannot, in sober verity, afford to be conquered. Such existence offers no boon to tempt nor consolation to reconcile. In contrast, on the other hand, through the vista of no distant time, see the Confederacy of our choice established in power and dignity; our States in the benignant exercise of acknowledged sovereignty; the courage and virtues of our people tested and approved; our institutions, social and industrial, vindicated and freed from malignant intermeddling of fanatic or insidious enemies, confirmed on the basis that so happily reconciles capital with labour and harmonises dependence with protection, and the desolated homes and ravaged fields of our favoured land restored and flourishing under the benignant smiles of peace and plenty. Let our people 'look on this picture, and then on that,' and choose. For it is a matter only of choice and the will to fulfil it. We have the numbers, the resources and the means adequate to our certain redemption and triumph, if only they be commanded, concentrated, and wielded with energy and unity by the will of a people unalterably fixed never to succumb, but to prefer release in the grave and refuge with God to the horrors and infamy of lasting slavery. We have only to act in this spirit, and humbly confiding in the favour of Heaven, we may be assured no distant day will witness the confusion and discomfiture of our enemies and the permanent attainment to us and our posterity, through the achievements of victory, of peace, freedom and independence.

Respectfully submitted.

JAMES A. SEDDON, Secretary of War.

A REMARKABLE ORDER.—The following, for the genuineness of which, however, we cannot undertake to vouch, is published in the New York Daily News, as copied from the Mobile Register of 30th May.—'Adjutant's and Inspector General's Office—Richmond, May 21, 1864.—Special Order No. 234.—Owing to the inestimable service rendered to the Confederate States by Major-General N. P. Banks, U. S. A., all officers and men in the service of the Confederate States are hereby prohibited from harming a hair of his head, and are especially ordered, under all circumstances, to allow him to escape. By order, S. Cooper, Adjutant and Inspector-General.'

Notes on Events of the Week.

AMERICA.

THE following brief outline of the assault on Petersburg on July 30, which resulted in a complete and disastrous Federal defeat, is taken from the elaborate accounts that have appeared in the New York papers.

So long ago as June 20, General Grant conceived the idea of capturing Petersburg by mining, and on June 25 the work was commenced under the superintendence of Colonel Pleasants. The distance between the Federal front and the Confederate fort which was to be undermined, was not less than 400 yards. The ground was unfavourable and presented many serious engineering difficulties. With perseverance and ingenuity these difficulties were overcome, and on July 25, just one month after the commencement, Colonel Pleasants announced to General Grant that the mine was finished, and that under the fort of the enemy six or eight tons of gunpowder were deposited. No time was then lost in making final preparations for the attack, and we may add that nothing was neglected which promised to insure success. The rifle pits were pushed as near as possible to the Confederate lines, cannon were posted in every available niche, and an effort was made to mislead the Confederate commander as to the intended Federal movement. A force was sent across the river as if the siege of Petersburg was to be abandoned, and, if we may credit the reports of the Northern press, General Lee detached a large body of troops to oppose the new stratagem of the enemy. On Friday, July 29, this Federal force was secretly withdrawn from the north side of the river, and in the course of the night the army was placed in the concerted order of attack.

At twenty minutes before 5 o'clock on the morning of the 30th, after two abortive attempts, the mine was sprung. The earth quaked, there was a cloud of dust, there was a yawning gulf, three columns of red earth mingled with guns and men shot up into the air, and then descended a mangled and shapeless mass. It is said 250 Confederate soldiers of South Carolina were in the fort at the time of the explosion, and that they nearly all perished. Long before sunset their deaths were avenged.

Immediately after the mine was sprung the Federal artillery opened, and ninety-five guns kept up a continuous fire of shot and shell. Soon afterwards the assaulting column rushed forward, took without much opposition that portion of the outer line of defences that had been laid open by the blowing up of the fort, and made an attack upon the inner line of defences. This they were compelled to do, because the position they had acquired was covered by the Confederate guns, and altogether untenable. So far the plans of General Grant had succeeded. He had effected a surprise, and attained possession of a portion of the Confederate defences. But he had to deal with an army of veterans, who were unmoved by the catastrophe that had lately happened. On the Confederate side there was no panic, no evidence even of excitement. With marvellous coolness the fire of their guns was promptly directed on the breach through which the Federals were crowding. When the enemy charged, they were suffered to approach within complete range, when a deadly and destructive fire was opened upon them. The line swayed, was broken, and had to re-form. On this happening a division of negro troops was pressed forward. They were encountered by a deadly fire, became demoralised, and fled, or rather endeavoured to flee. They were mowed down by hundreds; 53 of their officers were put hors de combat; and a Northern writer says the black division of the army of the Potomac was wiped out. The Confederate reserves came up; the Federals were attacked and driven to their entrenchments. Before nightfall the ground they had taken in the morning was again in possession of the Confederates, and all their labours for a month past had been in vain.

The estimates of the Federal losses are, as usual, conflicting. Some put them down at 5,000, and others at 15,000. As the official estimate is between 5,000 and 6,000, the entire loss was probably between 11,000 and 12,000. General Bartlett, his officers, and about 1,000 men were captured; but we expect it will be found that the number of prisoners taken is small in proportion to the total losses, and that the slaughter was disproportionably large. On the day following the battle, Generals Grant and Butler sent flags of truce for the purpose of obtaining a short suspension of arms whilst the wounded were moved and the dead were buried. A truce was not agreed upon until Monday, August 1, and from our former experience of Grant's manœuvres the delay is easily explained. He tried, we presume, as he has done before, to avoid a confession of defeat, and the Confederate commander refused to be duped. Whilst the truce continued no intercourse was permitted by the Confederate officers between the soldiers and pickets of the respective armies.

IF anything could increase the panic in New York, it was that the news of defeat was heralded by a reported victory. On Sunday the 31st, it was announced that Grant had blown up a fort, and captured the outer line of defences at Petersburg, and thereupon the sanguine people rejoiced over the capture of Petersburg and the immediate taking of Richmond. Grant was once more the hero of the war, and he was lauded as the greatest general the world has ever seen. A few hours later it became known that Grant had utterly failed in his attempt on Petersburg, and had suffered a most disastrous defeat.

THE rumours of another Confederate invasion of Pennsylvania turn out to be true. What force the Confederates have on the north of the Potomac is not certain, but it is estimated at from 30,000 to 40,000 men. The town of Chambersburg has been partly burnt. According to the Federal account, this was done because a contribution of $100,000 in gold was not paid. It seems (we are still quoting from the Northern statement) that an order was given to fire the Court House, Town Hall, and Bank [illegible] buildings, and that the [illegible] the surrounding [illegible], and that [illegible] private buildings [illegible].

Considerable alarm is felt on account of the [illegible] movement of the Confederates, and the Governor of Pennsylvania has called for 30,000 [illegible] for [illegible] service.

On July 31, Mr. Lincoln and General Grant met at Fortress Monroe, and [illegible] on board a steamer. [illegible] of the consultation [illegible] that the army of the Potomac [illegible] Washington.

A court of inquiry is to be [illegible] the cause of the late disaster at Petersburg. [illegible] usual plan adopted by Mr. Lincoln to allay popular excitement consequent on a defeat.

It is said that Admiral Farragut has attacked Mobile, and that the result was unknown. Nothing can be done against Mobile without the co-operation of a large land force, and that the Federals have not just now at their disposal.

The Federal Government is still rigidly suppressing all war news, and particularly any news from Georgia. It has, however, transpired that a division of Sherman's cavalry under General McCook was defeated by the Confederates on July 27, and that, out of 3,500 Federals, only 500 have returned to headquarters.

The Northern press is calling for an enquiry respecting the failure of the attempt made on July 3 to capture Fort Johnson on James Island. It is alleged that the boats got aground in consequence of a mistake in reference to the tide, that Colonel Gurney, the commanding officer, did not accompany the troops; that Colonel Hoyt, who was in immediate command, got separated from his troops and was taken prisoner, and that his successor in command, Colonel Conyngham, was also taken prisoner. Only one volley was fired, and then, says the correspondent of the New York Herald, 'Some officer gave the order to retreat, and a general skedaddle took place.'

Unless a man's heart is hardened by Abolitionism he cannot read the account of the late assault upon Petersburg without feeling the deepest commiseration for the unhappy negroes. Whenever a deadly fire has to be faced, when an unusually desperate forlorn hope has to rush on certain death and destruction, the Abolition officers order their negro soldiers into the post of danger. The miseries endured by the negroes under Yankee rule are truly horrible and heartrending.

The letter of our New York correspondent, dated August 1, gives an explanation of the plan adopted by New England to supply its quota of the conscription by negroes. As the Government wanted men and not money, and as New Englanders will not fight except by deputy, it was settled that negroes should be received as recruits. It has also been arranged that recruiting may go on in 'disloyal' States, which means that stolen negroes may be enlisted in place of the Yankees. As a negro recruit is entitled to bounty we may be sure the New Englanders will save their pockets as well as their skins.

Our correspondent also sets forth the programme of the M'Clellan or War Democrat party, and exposes the fallacies on which it is based. He also very briefly glances at the state of Federal finances, and notifies an important movement now being agitated by the merchants of New York. They propose that for the future all sales shall be made for gold, and that if greenbacks are used they shall only be taken at their specie value. This proposition is not openly avowed, although it is freely discussed in commercial circles. If carried into effect it would be a death-blow to the Federal credit.

There has been an election in North Carolina for Governor. The candidates were Governor Vance and Mr. Holden. The former, who supports the policy of the Confederate Government, was chosen by an overwhelming majority. Mr. Holden, who is in opposition to the Government, received but few votes.

On July 9, Governor Brown, of Georgia, published a proclamation calling upon all the able-bodied men in the State to take up arms in order to repel the invader.

The steamer Clara Bell, proceeding from Vicksburg for White River, was attacked on July 24 by a Confederate battery near Carolton Landing, and was entirely destroyed.

The Chicago Tribune publishes a long correspondence showing that the officers of the Federal Government have been trading with the South, and supplying, amongst other things, a large quantity of shoes for the use of Confederate soldiers.

We learn by the last advices from New York that Senators Wade, Henry, and Winter, and Mr. Davis have published a report, charging Mr. Lincoln with usurpation, and a design to secure his reelection by unfair means.

Judge Handlin, who was appointed by General Butler to the third district court at New Orleans, has been removed from his office by the bogus Governor Hahn, because in one of his decisions he recognised the existence of slavery in the State of Louisiana. The subject was discussed in Mr. Lincoln's New Orleans Convention, and a large minority of members were opposed to the proceeding. It was remarked that, even according to Mr. Lincoln's proclamation, slavery did exist in certain parts of the State.

We find in the New York World some [illegible] from Mr. Lincoln's [illegible]

[illegible] 'This war, [illegible] it, is carried on [illegible] ... that sentiment there, this war is not only an error, it is a crime.'

On August 1, the Mayor of New York issued a proclamation in reference to the 4th, set apart by the President as a day of humiliation, fasting, and prayer. He then recommends political [illegible] to pray for peace. [illegible] the ministers of the various churches [illegible] the duty of opening prayer [illegible] congregations, and especially those ministers who have inculcated the doctrines of war and blood, so much at variance with the teachings of their Divine Master, I would humbly recommend that they will on that solemn occasion invoke the mercy of Heaven to hasten the relief of our suffering people, by turning the hearts of those in authority to the blessed ways of peace.' This utterance of Mayor Gunther is a sign of the times.

The watering-places in the North are not well attended this season. The New York Herald says: 'It is evident that there is a very uneasy feeling among our wealthier classes, and the steady depreciation of the currency has compelled the well-to-do classes to economise in their expenditures. Even the shoddy people find that contracts upon which pay cannot be procured promptly are not always unmixed benefits, especially as the pay, when it does come, is in depreciated currency. The watering-place hotel-keepers had better make all the money they can this summer, for there is every prospect of a beggarly account of empty rooms next year. By that time all the burdens of this dreadful war will be felt in all their severity by all classes of people, and by none more than the very rich. This is sure to be the case whether the war continues or peace is restored.'

Mr. Voorhees, of Indiana, has been unanimously renominated for the Federal Congress.

On August 6 gold was quoted in New York at 250.

A Thoroughly Yankee Calculation.—A writer in the Jefferson County (New York) [illegible], [illegible] relating to the number of men [illegible] this war, gives the following results: [illegible] It had in a wall twenty-five [illegible] would [illegible] If piled up in a ten acre lot, they would be nearly [illegible] feet high. And if laid upon the ground, they would cover every foot of soil in Jefferson County. Seventy-five thousand tuns of human blood have been spilled in [illegible] to turn every spindle in Lowell, and if the tears were added to the flood, it would turn the machinery of the continent, and the unavailing sighs would fill every ocean sail. The [illegible] has not yet been told. The millions of wounded [illegible] for he must be taken [illegible] total of evils incident to this bloody and [illegible] war.'

The following are the losses of the negro regiments in the assault on Petersburg:—23rd regiment, coloured—15 officers and 400 men killed, wounded, and missing. 28th regiment, coloured—11 officers and 150 men killed, wounded, and missing. 27th regiment, coloured—6 officers and [illegible] men killed, wounded, and missing. 29th regiment, coloured—[illegible] officers and 270 men killed, wounded, and missing. [illegible] regiment, coloured—7 officers and 200 men killed, wounded, and missing. 43rd regiment, coloured—6 officers and a large number of men killed, wounded, and missing. [illegible] regiment, coloured—Several officers and about 250 men killed, wounded, and missing.—New York Paper.

The Starving Process.—An officer of General Lee's army, writing to a friend in Baltimore, says the effect of Grant's 'starving process' has been to send down the price of provisions in Richmond. He writes: 'Corn meal, for instance, has gone down $20 a bushel. Grant had forgotten that the wheat crop had just been gathered in, also the hay crop, and the yield of both in this region has been most providential, so that we are for months to come independent of the South for food and forage. I do not exactly know why it should be so, but even meat has fallen $2 a pound during the past two days.'

ENGLAND.

[illegible] England in foreign countries has not been lowered. These results are the consequences of the combined efforts of an Administration of which I may be permitted to say that no other Administration that ever existed contained within itself a greater number of able, distinguished, and capable men. I venture without fear of contradiction to say that there never was a Government in which every department of state was better filled than it has been filled by the Government which is now in power, and therefore it would be unjust to attribute any peculiar merit to any one member of the Administration.'

Of all the sights which have been this summer provided for the amusement [illegible] of the public, few were better deserving of a visit than the Donkey Show at Islington. We have long been accustomed to horse shows and dog shows, to exhibitions of poultry, [illegible] and [illegible] but a donkey show is somewhat of a novelty. If the public [illegible] that the donkeys [illegible] which we in England have been too long accustomed to consider it, but that attention and kindness will make this despised animal docile, [illegible] show will not have been one of the least profitable uses to which the Agricultural Hall has been applied. Animals were exhibited by the Prince and several members of the aristocracy, but the interest of the show naturally centred in the donkeys accustomed to work, and exhibited by the costermongers. Many prizes were distributed among the exhibitors, and it is not too much to say that those prizes were well deserved. We were informed by the owner of one donkey that attracted considerable attention, that it ought to possess, for that which he himself occupied the drawing-room floor of his residence, the dining-room floor was placed at the service of the donkey. This was perhaps carrying kindness rather too far, but if all owners of donkeys were animated by a similar spirit, they would be amply rewarded by having in their possession a really valuable animal. Much amusement was created by the races, especially by the steeple chase, for which many of the exhibitors entered, and great skill and spirit were displayed by the characters. The show was not confined to donkeys, but extended to the kindred animal the mule, of which many fine specimens were exhibited. Two, which were exhibited by Tom Sayers, caused great amusement, from the vain efforts of the visitors to ride them; few could succeed in even mounting; none, even if they succeeded in this preliminary step, long retained their seats. It is not too much to say that many present would probably have been capable of riding Bucephalus, but we doubt if Alexander himself would have been equal to the task of riding the mules of Sayers. We are glad to find that the donkey is at length in a fair way to be appreciated. He has risen above the level of the mere social drudge, and is recognised as an animal worthy of attention. We have seen too long to what a low condition ages of ill-treatment have reduced him; we now see that, if proper pains are bestowed upon him by his master, he can prove himself an animal of which that master may be justly proud.

On Monday evening last, Mr. Lindsay addressed his constituents at Sunderland. After touching briefly upon home politics, he dwelt at considerable length upon the condition of affairs in America. He reminded his hearers of the prediction made by him at the commencement of the troubles, that after the dissensions which had arisen the Union could never be restored. This was contrary to the opinion held by the Northerners and by many people in this country, who believed, for two reasons, that the 'rebellion' would soon be put down; firstly, that the slaves would rise; and, secondly, that the insurrection was not general. As to the rising of the slaves, the war has now lasted upwards of three years, and yet the slaves have not risen, from which he argued that the condition of the slaves could not be so bad as it had been represented to be. The hon. gentleman also showed that the Northerners are not so anxious as they affect to be for the abolition of slavery. 'It is not the abolition of slavery that the Northern people desire. It is empire and nothing but empire. The North asks our sympathy with them, but we say, "We know you too well. You cannot have our sympathy because you are not in earnest in the object you profess to have."' The subjugation of the South practically means the massacre of eight millions of white people to give liberty to three millions of blacks. As to the restoration of the Union, Mr. Lincoln first called for 70,000 men. Since then he has called altogether for 2,300,000, in addition to nearly half a million of militia. Yet the subjugation of the South is no nearer than it was before Bull's Run. Not merely were these enormous supplies of men obtained; the Northern Government had also contracted ruinous liabilities, and yet the restoration of the Union is farther off than ever. He showed the enormous amount of injury entailed, not merely upon America, but on the people of Europe, by the continuance of such a state of things, and argued that it was the duty of every man to protest against it. He called attention to the various meetings held in the North for the purpose of condemning the war, and quoted a resolution passed at a crowded meeting in Ohio, which was as follows: 'That in the further prosecution of the war, by whomsoever conducted, or from whatsoever object in view, we behold nothing but a fruitless waste of life and treasure, accumulated debt, overwhelming taxation, and national ruin to both sections.' He reminded his audience that the Emperor of the French had long held the opinion that the mediation of England and France and other European countries would have the effect of bringing about the cessation of hostilities; and while he approved of the course the Government of this country had adopted, of abstaining from taking any part in the war, he regretted that they had withheld those friendly offices which would, in his opinion, have strengthened the hands of the peace party in the North, and might, if now made, influence in a manner favourable to peace the Presidential election. The honourable gentleman showed that he was speaking, not merely in the interests of the South, but also of the North. He lamented the angry words used on the other side of the Atlantic towards this country, which he would return with words of sorrow for their calamities, and would say to the President of the Northern States, 'Remember the words of your namesake, old Abraham, to Lot: "Let there be no strife, I pray thee, between thee and me, and between thy herdsmen and my herdsmen, for we be brethren. Is not the whole land before thee? Separate thyself, I pray thee, from me. If thou wilt take the left hand, then I will go to the right; or if thou wilt depart to the right hand, then I will go to the left."'

The impossibility of producing any armour plating of sufficient strength to protect vessels against the assaults of heavy ordnance has at length been demonstrated beyond all possibility of doubt. On Tuesday, a floating Warrior battery was exposed at Shoeburyness to the fire of the 600-pounder 13½-inch Armstrong muzzle loader. The target formed the centre of a wooden framework, 30 feet by 20 feet, and had a backing of 18 inches of teak, protected by 4½-inch armour plates; it was moored 500 yards from the battery where the gun was mounted, the charge of powder being reduced from 70 lbs. to 51½ lbs., thus producing the same effect as if the gun had been fired at a distance of 2,000 yards with the full charge of 70 lbs. The first shell missed the target, the second grazed the armour plate, and the third striking the sea in front ricocheted and took effect upon the upper armour plate passing through both the plate and the teak backing, and in fact detroying the target. No ironclad so struck could have ventured to expose itself to a second shot. The fourth shot only took effect upon the wood-work; and the fifth, which concluded the experiments, was fired with no better result. The slight inaccuracy in the firing is to be attributed to the small charge of powder made use of. Had the shot struck the target fairly instead of merely ricochetting, it is impossible to estimate the damage that would have been done; as it is, sufficient was achieved to prove the hopelessness of attempting to resist the attack of such a gun by armour plates. We congratulate the Admiralty and the country on the possession of such a gun, and on having had in the attempts to solve this difficult problem so able a coadjutor as Sir William Armstrong.

We regret to announce the death of one of the most successful of our English actors. Mr. Robson died at his house in Ampthill Terrace last Thursday night. He has so long been an invalid that we could hardly hope to see him again adorn the stage from which sickness drove him in the zenith of his fame. His first efforts are said to have been unsuccessful, but he persevered. In a long engagement at the Grecian Theatre he endeared himself to his east-end audience, and after his migration to the Olympic his talents attracted to an obscure theatre in a dirty street the fashionable residents in the west, with whom he soon became a great favourite.

On August 8, the first stone of the monument to Daniel O'Connell was laid in Sackville Street, Dublin. As might have been expected, vast crowds witnessed the ceremony, and a monster procession such as used to follow the 'great liberator' himself on state occasions was arranged to celebrate the event. Like those, the banners of the various trades were its most conspicuous ornament; like those, it resolved itself again into its component atoms without any disorder or attempt at a breach of the peace taking place. A banquet was held in the evening at the Round room of the Rotunda, chiefly remarkable for the absence of all men of position and celebrity, and for the harmony and loyal feeling which seemed to animate the company. The meeting broke up about midnight. We regret that Belfast has for the last few days been thrown into a state of disorder. Fierce fights have taken place between the Catholics and the Orangemen, and considerable damage has been inflicted upon life and property. The police behaved during the riots with great address, forbearance, and courage, but their unaided efforts were not sufficient to control the excited crowds which patrolled the streets intent on inflicting mutual injuries; the presence of the military has been found necessary, and it is hoped that they will be able to repress any further attempt at an outbreak.

India.

'No news is good news.' We are happy to find that the troubles which are passing around us are not likely to be swelled by Indian difficulties, if we except the disposition manifested by the Bhooteas to be troublesome, and who seem disposed to insist upon the fulfilment of the treaty extorted by them from Mr. Ashley Eden, when on a friendly visit in their territory. Their demands cannot, of course, be complied with, but we may hope that the prudent firmness of Sir John Lawrence will enable him to avert a war. The revolt in Affghanistan appears to have received a check, although Azim Khan is still in our territories. Afzul Khan has again sought refuge in the territories of the Khan of Bokhara.

New Zealand.

The war appears to be at a standstill, but the settlement of the difficulty with the natives is feared to be no nearer than it was at the commencement of the disturbances. The colony is sick of the war, and the natives, at least for the present, do not seem inclined to carry it on. But few of the chiefs, however, have submitted, and numbers of the natives still remain under arms waiting for a favourable opportunity to occur for resuming hostilities.

THE CONTINENT.

The Danish difficulty.

The counterstroke to the seizure of Rendsburg by the Prussians has been the occupation of Lauenburg by the Federal troops of execution. This matter is likely to create some ill-blood yet among the majesties of Germany. The semi-official Norddeutsche Allgemeine Zeitung contents itself with saying, 'Prussia has for the present considered it sufficient to demand explanations of the step from the Governments concerned,' that is, from Hanover. The Hanoverian Government, however, disclaims all knowledge of the occupation of Lauenburg, and say that they are even surprised at such a step. It appears that the occupation was ordered by General Hake, upon instructions from the Dresden cabinet. Herr von Beust, the present virtual ruler of Saxony, has shown himself fully equal to a contest with Herr von Bismarck in violence, stiff-neckedness, or insolence; the quarrel between the two is, therefore, likely to be edifying. Dresden will probably be again reminded that she lies within little more than a day's march of the Prussian frontier, and that Saxony only exists upon sufferance. The Saxon representative has given notice that he means to propose to the Diet that an explanation be demanded of Austria and Prussia in reference to those Powers having permitted the King of Denmark to cede rights to them to which he himself had no title. The result of these squabbles can only be to show that Austria and Prussia on the one hand have no right to keep the Duchies, and on the other hand, the Diet has no right to claim them; whence it will follow that they are still provinces of Denmark in a state of revolt fostered by the two great German Powers: the time is not far distant when Austria will have to look back upon this war as a precedent in the matter of a revolted Venice.

The Hanoverian representative at the Federal Diet has been instructed to declare that should the Diet be unable to obtain satisfaction for the events which have taken place at Rendsburg, and which directly affect the authority of the Diet, Hanover would withdraw her troops from Holstein to avoid a possibility of a second violation of Federal rights. This skirmish on an abstract point of authority will not be of great importance on the immediate issue of the late war; the withdrawal of the Federal troops from the soil of the Duchies will only facilitate the arrangements shortly to be made by Austria and Prussia for the government of those countries.

It appears that the rectification of the frontier of Jutland, by which the Germans pretend to set at rest for ever all quarrels which may arise in that quarter on the subject of nationalities, is to be all in favour of Germany. Instead of giving to Jutland a portion of North Slesvig, which is recognised to be Danish, that province is to be deprived of a portion of its territory which runs down into the Duchy of Slesvig, and contains several thousand purely Danish inhabitants. The Prussian notion of a rectification of frontier is said to be based on the dressing of a battalion of soldiers, and nationality is to be sacrificed to an exact squareness of outline.

The Duchies.

As we have said, Austria and Prussia will be in no way sorry to see the departure of all Federal troops from the soil of the Duchies. Negotiations have been going on between these two Powers, and are probably now terminated, respecting the establishment of a joint provisional government in the Duchies, to which the Diet is to be requested to give its sanction.

The clergy and gentry of the district of Kiel held a meeting in that town on the 9th inst.; twenty-three persons only were present. The draft of a petition to the Slesvig-Holstein Commissioners was submitted to the meeting for signature, explaining the necessity of a common government for the two Duchies under the protection of Prussia, and dwelling upon the importance of the closest possible union with that Power. An animated discussion ensued, after which five of the principal persons present declined to sign the document.

Germany.

The King of Prussia is yet on the move, and is not expected at Berlin before the beginning of next month. The Feudalist journals have been loud in their strictures on those who call upon him to take advantage of the momentary lull in the troubles of Europe to call together again his House of Representatives.

A letter from Dresden states that a general meeting of the European Academy of Fashion has just been held in that city. Nearly 200 members were present. The principal subject discussed was a project of erecting an edifice for a superior school to teach the arts relating to dress. The idea is, that the establishment shall comprise a museum of costumes of all epochs, and a benefit fund for the relief of journeymen tailors unable to work. It appears that we are living under the dominion of a Vehmgericht, a secret tribunal by which the cut of our coats and the amount of cloth in our nether garments is decided upon inexorably. Have so many millions lived and died, some in purple and fine linen, others in rags and foul linen, others again in rags simple, and so on down to the last grade adorned with the primitive figleaf, in ignorance of this mighty judgment-seat, on which is enthroned the European Academy of Fashion? How comes it, by the way, that the Germans, the nation of tailors, and the inventors of this noble Academy, are the worst dressed people in Europe?

Denmark.

The exchange of prisoners is going on between the two quondam belligerents. Austria has returned 1,500 to their country; the remaining 4,800 of whom she had charge have been transferred to Prussia, who seems not at all so well inclined to allow them to leave her fortresses. On the other side, the Danes have sent off 1,000 natives of Slesvig, who had been serving in the royal army, to their homes at Flensburg; some of those taken at the Island of Sylt have also been returned. Prussia gives notice that she intends to keep a certain number of officers of high rank as hostages for certain political prisoners whom she declares to be in the dungeons of Copenhagen.

The Prussian commander in Jutland has prohibited by a general order the exportation of horses, oxen, pigs, bacon, rye, and oats during the armistice. We thought he had provided for this danger by prudently taking into his own possession all such articles when he found them in Jutland.

France.

MM. Garnier-Pagès, Carnot, and the other eleven gentlemen who were fined 500 francs for illegal association have decided upon appealing against the decision, and challenging the opinion of the superior tribunal.

The Emperor left Vichy for St. Cloud on Sunday, the 7th inst., and remains there until the arrival of the King of Spain. Great fêtes are in contemplation to be given to his honour at Versailles, the Tuileries, and St. Cloud. We defer an account of the programme of these fêtes, which bid fair to rival even the splendour of the court of Louis XIV.

On the 8th inst. the great annual distribution of prizes at the Sorbonne to the pupils of the Colleges of Paris and Versailles took place. M. Duruy, Minister for Public Instruction, in presenting the prizes, delivered an address, in which was one passage which claims our attention. He pointed out the general results gathered from the various annual competitions at the Sorbonne since 1830. He said: 'The movement of our studies during the last 33 years has been as follows: from 1830 to 1840, oscillations without any determined character; from 1841 to 1851, ascensional progress; from 1852 to 1859, general decadence in science as well as in literature, except in one faculty—history. Since 1859 the curve which had descended turned upwards, and a portion of the ground which was lost began to be recovered.' The Presse took up the argument where M. Duruy left it, and pointed out that the progress of the studies in the University was seriously influenced, whether for good or evil, by the political atmosphere with which they are surrounded. Any one examining the four periods marked out as above by M. Duruy, will observe that the varieties in the development of study corresponded with the political changes of the time. From 1830 to 1840 there existed a continual state of party struggle against the system of government established in 1830. From 1841 to 1851, though parties still continued to oppose one another, the nation was rallying round one common idea, that of universal suffrage. The movement of ideas during the period was prodigious. From 1852 to 1859 there was again a decline; Government dealt out liberty with a very sparing hand; the press had lost independence; ideas were in a state of stagnation. At length, in 1859 an upward current set in; the extension of the political relations of France by the Italian war and the treaty of commerce enlarged the mind of her people; a common sentiment again united all men, that France ought not to lag behind other countries in the race for liberty. Thus it appears that there is a close connection between the public liberties on the one hand and the development of public education on the other.

While on the subject of education, we may notice the revival of a scheme which has long been nursed in the minds of some ardent individuals. It purposes to promote the acquirement of modern languages on an extensive scale by a system of international education. Large institutions are to be founded in France, England, Germany, and Italy, at which the course of study is to be precisely identical; so that, a boy who has arrived at a certain point of study in one country will be able to remove to the kindred establishment in another, and resume his instruction exactly where he left off. Thus he would suffer no hindrance in pursuing his general or classical education, while he would have the advantage of studying the modern languages, each in its own native country. The scheme has been tried already in France to a certain extent, and with success. When tried internationally, it will hardly escape lamentable failure, so long as the habits of thought in the various countries remain as distinct as they now are. The devisers of this scheme appear to think that the education in England, France, and Germany differs only as to the method pursued, and not as to the end obtained. A very little consideration will lead us to conclude that the education differs mainly in the results which it produces; an educated Frenchman differs entirely from an equally educated Englishman, and he again from a German; and the difference arises from the fact that the leading idea in the mind of each is absolutely different. What should we think of the naturalist who proposed to educate a Polar bear, a Russian bear, and a 'grizzly' into three perfect bears by sending them for six months to Spitzbergen, six more to Warsaw, and six again to the Alleghanies? They would all be dead before the conclusion of the experiment; and little short of this would be the fate of the luckless little Frenchman, German, and Englishman, thus transferred from city to city, like a travelling carpet-bag, to be filled with an assorted collection of the knowledge of each country.

An attempt was made last year by the Imperial Government to remove the Post Office from its present position near the Halles Centrales to the Rue Rivoli. It was stopped by the determined opposition of the business-men, who declared that they could not afford to have their post-office so far off. The idea has now, however, been revived, and by an Imperial decree of the 9th inst. was pronounced an act of public utility. The Emperor aims at carrying Paris by main force westwards, and grouping it round the Place de la Concorde as a centre. If this is effected, the proposed new post-office will not be far out of the way. In the report presented to the Senate during the late session it was declared that there was no hope of a decided improvement in the present postal arrangements so long as the office remained on its present site, as it was impossible to enlarge it to the necessary size.

Frankowski, an agent of the Polish National Government, was tried on the 9th inst., at the Court of Assize for the Seine. He was charged with having altered the numbers of some bonds of the Crédit Foncier of Poland, stolen during the insurrection. The court sentenced him to two years' imprisonment, that being the lightest punishment that could be inflicted.

ITALY.

It is asserted that in consequence of renewed negotiations between the French and Papal Governments, the ex-King of Naples, Francis II., will leave Rome, and return to Munich in the course of this autumn. The Italian authorities are, of course, doing their utmost to aid in effecting this very desirable object.

Two new cases of religious abduction, one exactly similar and the other parallel to the famous Mortara case, have occurred. The first is that of a young Jewish boy, Joseph Coen by name (Cohen is an ancient and distinguished name among the English Jews), of the age of eleven years, who was apprenticed in Rome to a Christian shoemaker. He soon afterwards declared his intention of embracing the Christian religion. He was accordingly taken by his master and a Neapolitan priest, and accompanied by a relative of his own, to the asylum for new converts. The rector of this establishment declares that he examined the boy, and found him conscientiously determined to take the step; he therefore laid the facts before a cardinal superior of the asylum; another examination of the boy was then held before four persons, two of whom were barristers, and it was decided that his conviction was sincere, and uninfluenced by any low motives. The parents, however, protested, and the father of the boy was then requested to attend, in company with another of his own persuasion, a third examination, held to satisfy him. The father, however, declined to attend, and the matter is still pending. The other case of abduction occurred at Centallo, in the province of Cuneo, in the kingdom of Italy. The object of it was a girl who had been confided to a theatrical manager named Suzzi, to be educated for the stage. From him she was decoyed away by a priest for the purpose of taking monastic vows. On the application of Suzzi, however, the place was discovered in which the girl was confined, and the priests were made to surrender their prize.

A meeting to demand the dissolution of the Chamber of Deputies was to have been held at Florence; but information of the same having reached the authorities, they could not permit it to be held for such an object, and the meeting was consequently abandoned.

Preparations are being made at Florence to celebrate the 600th anniversary of the birth of Dante. The municipality of that city sent a request to the authorities of Ravenna praying that the ashes of the great poet might be restored to his native city. The answer was, that since Itality unity had been effected, Dante could no longer be considered as in exile at Ravenna, and that he was consequently as much there in his own country as if he were at Florence.

BELGIUM.

King Leopold left Paris for Brussels on the 9th inst., and proceeded straight from his capital to his private residence at Laecken.

The election of members of the Chamber of Representatives took place on the 11th inst., and resulted in a majority of twelve for the Liberal party over the whole of Belgium. The democratic journals of Paris are loud in their jubilee for the triumph of Liberalism over Ultramontanism; but to an impartial bystander the matter appears to have been one little connected with principle of any kind, except that of self-interest. The result of the elections depended on the choice of the citizens of Antwerp. These worthies care little about politics, but are extremely anxious to lose the privilege of fortifications, which straiten their movements, impede the expansion of their city, and can only be of use to the country by bringing destruction upon the city which they protect in the shape of a severe and unsuccessful bombardment. They once thought to force Government into the necessity of relieving them from the fortifications by joining the Ultramontanes; now it appears they consider that they were mistaken, and restore their allegiance to the Liberal party.

SWITZERLAND.

Some weeks ago the Federal Council of Switzerland made a demand on the Austrian Government for the person of the Polish ex-Dictator Langiewicz, on the ground that he was a Swiss citizen. Conditions were drawn up by the Court of Vienna on which liberty would be given to the ex-Dictator. They were accepted both by Langiewicz and the Federal Council. The appearance of the Emperor of Russia in Germany seems, however, to have raised fresh difficulties, and Herr von Rechberg, on his return from Kissengen, thought fit to withdraw his promise. The Federal Council has now made another formal claim for the extradition of Langiewicz.

On the other hand, as if to show the impartiality of their judgment, the Council has given notice to the Government of the Canton of Ticino that Mazzini is preparing to return thither. We know nothing further, except that the police have given orders in consequence to the local authorities of Lugano, where he will probably land.

POLAND.

The city of Warsaw has returned to its accustomed life and vivacity. The theatres, the bands, the parks, all attract their crowds. But there is one entertainment which is successful above all others in collecting a mob of sight-seers: it is the weekly transportation of political offenders from the railway station to St. Petersburg. From 4,000 to 8,000 persons assemble to pay their last adieux to their banished friends. This fashion has been but lately introduced by the agitators. An attempt was made to keep the day of departure a secret; but as surely as the day came, so surely was the station surrounded by a dense crowd. Only a few dozen persons are sent off at a time, yet thousands go to bid them farewell. The police do not appear to trouble themselves with the matter.

SPAIN.

We have already had occasion to notice the singular though little noticed disturbances which have lately been agitating Spain. It appears that these still continue with the same certainty and the same secrecy. A few scraps of intelligence leak out here and there, such as the statement in the Noticias of the 9th inst.: 'On account of the alarm existing at Madrid, the Government will take measures to maintain public order;' and again, in the Diario Espanol of the 11th, we read that the Libertad and the Iberia have been prosecuted for publishing seditious writings, and have been brought before the military tribunals. A Catalonian commission has arrived at Madrid to confer with the Government upon the means of terminating the industrial crisis. A conference has been held at the Ministry of War, in consequence of which General Prim has been requested to take up his residence at Oviedo, whither he accordingly proceeded on the evening of the 13th. He was accompanied to the railway station by a large crowd.

MEXICO.

The Emperor has published a highly important decree, appointing the Empress to the regency, in the case of death, or of any other accident which may render it impossible for him to continue to govern.

The Municipality of Mexico having resolved to raise a triumphal arch in honour of the Empress, the Emperor, in a letter addressed to his Minister of State, S. Velasquez de Leon, has directed that with the marble destined to construct this arch, a monument should be raised to the heroes of Mexican independence—Hidalgo, Morelos, Iturbide, &c.—the first stone of which he has expressed his intention of laying with his own hands.

PERU.

The utmost exertions are still being used by the Peruvian Government to have all the war vessels in readiness in anticipation of bad news from Spain. All the neighbouring States have expressed their sympathy with Peru, save the Republic of Ecuador, which takes advantage of the general distrust of Spain to drive a thriving trade with that country in contraband of war. The Spanish Government have sent yet another frigate, the Carmen, to reinforce the Pacific squadron.

CHINA AND JAPAN.

The war between the Imperialists and the rebels still 'drags its slow length along,' and seems as far as ever from the end, owing very much to the aversion which the Imperialist generals display for attempting active measures. Nankin and Woochow are held by the rebels, but the whole of the surrounding country is in the hands of the Imperialists. The Prince of Nagatoo is still pursuing his obstructive policy in Japan, and resists the reopening of the Inland Sea which Sir R. Alcock is determined to effect. What measure will be adopted is not yet known. The Conqueror with a battalion of Marines is at Yokohama, and the 20th regiment will shortly arrive in Japan.

THE NEGROES BEFORE PETERSBURG.

(From the New York Daily News, Aug. 2.)

The butchery of negroes before Petersburg is a mournful illustration of Abolition philanthropy. The soul sickens while conceiving the nature of the fearful errand upon which these poor victims of fanaticism were sent. A breastwork is to be stormed in the face of a murderous fire that a military eye must have foreseen could be withstood by none but those of the most approved and stubborn courage and perfect discipline. A negro division of comparatively untried troops was selected to attempt that terrible assault, impossible to any but chosen veterans. The result was that the doomed blacks, mowed down by the enfilading fire, became bewildered and utterly demoralised, scarce knowing which way to run to escape destruction. In the language of the despatch, 'They seemed to be without any one to manage them, and finally they fell back to the rear, out of the range of the volleys of canister and musketry that were ploughing through their ranks.' Why is it that they were made a forlorn hope, to storm a position that the Commanding General must have known to be inaccessible, except to the most unflinching valour and the most complete organisation? If it was because the chance of victory was so desperate that the employment of white troops would have been too costly a sacrifice, we, who do not profess to be negro worshippers, pity them nevertheless for the terrible uses to which they are put. Had it not been abundantly proven upon other fields that black troops are not to be trusted in a military crisis, it might be supposed that the post of danger was given them out of pure love to prove their title to consideration as the Bayards and Sydneys of the age. But in view of their military antecedents, we can only understand that they were pushed forward to be butchered that better soldiers might be spared. That may be good for the white soldiers, but alas! the poor negro.

Northern Repudiation.—We quote the following from the Times city article of Monday last:—'The accounts from Germany show that the demand for United States bonds has not experienced the slightest diminution. The parcels brought to London by the weekly steamers and transmitted to Frankfort are absorbed as fast as they arrive, at prices which yield a good profit to the importers. Each successive fall seems to be regarded by the existing holders almost with gratification, instead of dismay, since they apparently entertain no doubt of ultimate payment in full, and consequently consider that each decline simply enables them to increase their acquisition of securities forced off by the Americans at a tremendous sacrifice from the momentary pressure of circumstances. They rely that the bonds are inherently worth par, and he who invested at the price of 60 regards a decline to 40 but as an excellent opening to buy more, so as to make an average price of 50 for a holding which he feels convinced will in a moderate time bring him back 100. In the present mood, therefore, of these investors, a fall to 30 or 20 would only be an increase of golden opportunities. The fact that repudiation has already been revived in some of the wealthiest and most influential of the individual States of the North appears not to have reached them, or to have reached them only to be disregarded. The instance of the State of New York refusing to continue the payment of its dividends in specie was alarming; but as such payments at the time of the creation of the debt were not, perhaps, actually stipulated, but merely implied, the measure did not constitute an open violation of definite contracts. It is true that the New York State Constitution forbade the introduction of a currency like that of greenbacks, and foreign purchasers of New York bonds may complain that it has taken place; but if the New York holders cannot make anything of that point, it is of no use for others to argue it. In Indiana and Pennsylvania the proceedings have been distinct, and no sophistry is attempted. Indiana declines to offer anything but greenbacks for the dividends which she expressly bound herself to pay to her foreign creditors in sterling, and Pennsylvania has characteristically given the sanction of law for the even-handed confiscation of the rights alike of her home and foreign creditors. Her debt was contracted under a solemn enactment that the interest should be paid in specie or its equivalent. As it has always been her habit to do everything with the soberness and precision worthy of her origin, she now passes a law to declare that she will pay only in greenbacks. Of course she might with equal propriety, after having contracted her debt under a stipulation to pay 6 per cent. interest, pass a law to declare that she will pay no interest whatever. The latter, perhaps, will come in due time, especially as whenever it comes it cannot further compromise the honour of the State. Annexed is an abstract of this piece of legislation, which, although it may be regarded as irrelevant by German investors, may help to confirm the caution with which in this country the Federal obligations that depend upon the aggregate honour of all the individual States of the Union should be regarded. It may be admitted that on such points it would not be fair to the American people to cite Pennsylvania as an average example, and it may also be admitted that the great majority of Americans themselves manifest a sincere delusion that they will meet their national debt with honour and ease. But they have not yet felt its pressure. As fast as dividends become payable, Germany and Holland send the cash for the purpose. When this supply shall fail, it is to be feared that the proclivities of Pennsylvania and Indiana, which are now simply passed over without condemnation, may then be looked at with direct approval:—'Act appeared May 3, 1864.—State of Pennsylvania.—Be it enacted, &c., That so much of an Act appeared June 12, 1840, as requires the interest on the public debt of this commonwealth to be paid in specie or its equivalent be and the same is hereby repealed, and that the said interest shall be paid by the State Treasury as the same shall hereafter fall due in such notes as have been or shall be declared by any law of the United States to be lawful money and a legal tender in payment of debts, public and private, within the United States. 2nd section repeals the 3rd section of the Acts of April 11, 1862, requiring the resumption of specie payments.'

TO OUR FRIENDS AND SUBSCRIBERS.

THE INDEX was established in May 1862, in the darkest hour of Confederate fortunes, by earnest friends of Southern Independence, with the distinctly expressed object of being the representative, in English journalism, of a gallant and struggling people appealing to the world not only for political, but still more for moral recognition. Since accepting this great trust, THE INDEX has unceasingly laboured, by the combined aid of English and of Southern writers, to enlarge and extend the common ground upon which two nations may cordially meet, which need only to understand each other in order to cherish the warmest mutual appreciation and lasting friendship. The chief and almost the sole difficulty has been, and is still, the callous indifference of the British Government on the one hand, and, on the other, the perplexity, to the European mind, of the unsolved and unprecedented problems involved in the management and education of four millions of the African race, intermingled with a population of the highest Caucasian type. This difficulty could be met only by a liberal fairness to every shade of honest opinion, by an inflexible adherence to truth under all circumstances, and by a bold avowal of convictions, even though ill received. THE INDEX does not claim to be neutral, but it claims to be independent in the highest sense of that word. It is because it must reflect and appeal to, at one and the same time, the public opinion of two countries as yet only imperfectly acquainted, that this somewhat unusual self-description is called for.

Thanks to arrangements now in successful operation, by which the Letters of regular Correspondents and Newspapers from all parts of the Confederate States are received within from twenty-five to thirty days from their date, THE INDEX is always enabled to present the very Latest Direct News from the South, as well as a faithful reflex of the tone and spirit of the Southern Press.

All communications intended for publication should invariably be addressed to 'the Editor of THE INDEX, 13 Bouverie Street, E.C.,' and unless authenticated by a responsible name, can receive no attention.

Advertisements should be sent and Money Orders made payable to J. B. HOPKINS, INDEX Office.

THE INDEX.

THURSDAY, AUGUST 18, 1864.

Confederate Official Documents.

NOTHING could possibly give an ordinary English reader so clear and comprehensive an insight, as the document we print to-day, into the internal working of that apparently mysterious organisation which the diplomatic world affects to treat as a rebellion, but which eight millions of a unanimous people, waging the most gigantic war in modern history, obey as their natural and lawful government with the enthusiasm of devotion. The document to which we refer is the Report of the Confederate SECRETARY of WAR, dated April 28 last, giving to the legislature of the Confederacy, through his official superior the PRESIDENT, an account of the work of his Department during the brief period intervening between his previous report and the last assembling of Congress. All the energies, all the moral and intellectual activity, all the objects of a brave and earnest nation, are concentrated upon successful resistance to an unprovoked assault upon their civil liberties and national independence. Commerce, industry, agriculture, are simply subordinate agencies in the accomplishment of this sublime task. The country is a vast camp, in which all the men are soldiers, whether armed with a musket, a hammer, or a plough; all the women are sempstresses or nurses to the army; and the children an annual harvest with which the enrolling officers fill up the gaps of the battle-field. With a nation in this glow of patriotic incandescence, the word 'war' comprises everything. The report before us, therefore, addressed as it is to the representatives of the people, neither intended nor prepared for cold neutral perusal, furnishes a complete picture, in which the lights and shades of the situation are faithfully reproduced. It has, moreover, the stoic characteristics of a Confederate official document, which exaggerates nothing except, perhaps, difficulties and dangers, and does this only in the stern purpose of more amply meeting them. Were the Confederacy a sham, instead of the stubborn fact which it is, we should hesitate, and we might properly be accused of indiscretion, in publishing textually, and without editorial precautions, a State paper so outspoken and so truthful as the one which it is now our privilege to lay before the intelligent student of cotemporaneous history.

With the report of the SECRETARY of WAR there come to us reports of other heads of Departments, and official copies of important documents and legislative acts. Few of these have the same general—we might almost say graphic—interest as the doings of the War Department while preparing for the supreme effort of the Virginia, and Georgia, and Pennsylvania campaign. We shall, therefore, in our next and succeeding numbers, confine ourselves to such extracts and summaries as will satisfy public curiosity about the internal economy of an infant State suddenly plunged into a war of unprecedented magnitude, and called upon, like HERCULES in his cradle, to crush at once two serpents threatening its young life—the formidable military aggression of a powerful enemy, and the deep-rooted prejudices of the civilised world.

In passing, we must pay a well-deserved tribute to the administrative ability and unshrinking frankness of Colonel JOHN S. PRESTON, the superintendent of the Conscript Bureau. From his admirably lucid statistics, it appears that within the three months which his report includes, without counting the States from which the accounts are missing or incomplete, 18,145 able-bodied men have been added to the Confederate army. Most of the complaints he urges do him credit as an executive officer, charged with delicate duties, and mindful that besides being a soldier he is also the citizen of a free country which sacrifices everything on the altar of patriotism save the rights of citizenship. The chief difficulties against which this officer has contended so successfully are summed up in the noble language of his superior in the Report we print: 'Some retardation,' he says, 'in the execution of the laws of conscription results necessarily from the persistent policy of the Department to rely for its regular administration on the prestige of law and the support of intelligent public opinion to established authority, rather than on military coercion by sustaining forces. Thus, instead of the forced gathering up, as with a drag-net, of all that come within the prescribed ages, there is the accorded privilege of volunteering, thereafter enrolment, with due respect to the limitation of the law and the claims for exemption and detail, and their appropriate assignment. As the regular administration of law is more tedious than the summary judgments of arbitrary authority, so this system sacrifices something of expedition to justice.' Compare this to the 'bullocks driven to the slaughter pen,' in Mr. LINCOLN's language, and the conscription riots in New York.

On the other documents before us we shall have more to say in our next impression. Suffice it for the present, that the Post Office Department, despite the enormously depreciated currency, reports, as usual, a large surplus of receipts over expenditures. The report of the COMMISSIONER on TAXATION is satisfactory. The SECRETARY of the TREASURY has the gratification to announce that the last appropriations considerably exceeded the needs of the different branches of the Government, and that there is in consequence a large credit to the account of the new appropriations. We are also furnished, for the first time, with a detailed statement of the funded and unfunded debt of the Confederate Government, and, comparing it with that of the North, and the normal resources of the two countries, the figures are not discouraging. The heroic remedy of compulsory funding and trenchant taxation, inaugurated in April, had already worked a great improvement in the state of the currency by the end of the month, though only a small portion of what is still expected from it. The policy of placing the whole foreign commerce, both as regards imports and exports, under Government control, and making it an arm of the national defence, had been perfected. Some additional regulations on this subject appear in our advertising columns to-day for the information of the commercial community. Thanks to this system, the foreign credit of the Government had steadily risen, the foreign debt was gradually being paid off even during the war, a surplus of funds was accumulating in Europe, and the resources of the country were husbanded for the importation of actual necessaries for the army and the non-military population. This success has even given rise to suggestions, such as that thrown out in the SECRETARY of WAR's Report, for extending the same principle to the redemption of the domestic debt, an idea with which the readers of the Index are not unfamiliar. Such are some of the leading features of the official documents, of which we propose to treat more at length on a future occasion.

Grant before Petersburg.

GENERAL GRANT has again unsuccessfully assaulted the defences of Petersburg. On July 30 the long matured plan, on which rested the last hopes of the Federal commanders, was put into execution, and the impossibility of the capture of the city by direct attack decided. For nearly six weeks GRANT's unwieldy legions had been huddled up within their intrenchments, almost motionless. The few cavalry raids sent out to cut off the communications of Richmond with the South were the only signs of active hostility. These were soon abandoned when it was ascertained that the temporary destruction of twenty miles of railway could only be achieved at the cost of the annihilation of the raiding column; and latterly GRANT's army was, to all appearance, besieged rather than besieging. There were no more flank movements to be made; any extension of his lines westward ensured defeat; assault of the intrenchments, which had two or three times foiled the best of his troops, was more than even GRANT dared venture upon. So, to use the language of the New York journals, he 'pressed the earthquake into his service'—in other words, fell to mining the Confederate position. By July 30 his preparations were completed; a mine had been sunk and a gallery carried under a prominent battery of six guns, the key to the outer line of intrenchments, and in this mine six tons of powder were deposited. It was known in the Federal camp, on the evening of the 29th, that the explosion and the assault were to take place; and the Confederate General, though he had no distinct knowledge of the locality of the mine, appears to have had some intimation of what was threatened, and to have made his preparations to meet any emergency.

Two days before GRANT tried a feint, which probably, if it had any effect at all, had precisely the reverse effect to that which it was intended to produce. He threw two whole corps across the James River, and made a great parade of despatching supplies in the same direction. But both corps recrossed on the following day to take part in the assault. It was hoped that by this clumsy attempt at a diversion, a portion of the garrison of Petersburg would be drawn off, or at any rate all expectation of an assault would be removed. But GRANT forgot that at Petersburg he had only to do with BEAUREGARD's corps, while LEE's principal force was in defence of Richmond; he forgot, too, that the wary general to whom he is opposed would at once perceive the nature of a movement, which so ostentatiously paraded a dangerous and useless division of his army. Long before dawn on the 30th the divisions selected for the assault were drawn up in columns behind the Federal entrenchments, and at 3 A.M. the signal was given for the explosion of the mine. The fuse failed more than once, and as the darkness rolled away the Confederates became dimly aware of the threatening assault. At length the fuse did its work. The formidable redoubt seemed for a moment uplifted from its foundations, and then sank, leaving a yawning crater in its place. There was no great explosion, only a dull roar, but three clouds of red dust rising high into the air, told that the work was done. The Federal troops were unable for some minutes to take the advantage of the surprise. The lines of the two armies were, in fact, so close, that they seem to have doubted whether the mine had not been sprung by the garrison. At length the truth came home to them, and with a cheer they charged for the shattered redoubt, covered by a terrible fire of artillery and musketry from the whole Federal line. But the delay had given the Confederates ample time to appreciate the position, and as the assaulting columns marched over the ruins of the redoubt they were met with a storm of grape and minié balls, which at once checked their advance. There was no shelter for them behind the Confederate works open in the rear, and fully commanded by the second line of earthworks. Swept down by hundreds they crowded into the chasms rent by the explosion, and then attempted to re-form for a charge upon the second line of intrenchments. To support them the coloured division was ordered up and launched against the works. But these, however, only elicited a more serious fire. After a few minutes the negroes broke and ran utterly demoralised; the panic communicated itself to the whole corps; a scene of disgraceful confusion arose, when the Confederates left their intrenchments and charged upon their beaten foe. There seems to have been no attempt at resistance. The Federal troops were entirely routed, officers and men; it was sauve qui peut; from 1,600 to 2,000 prisoners were taken, thousands were slaughtered; the general commanding the assault and his whole staff were captured; ultimately the remnant of the Federal columns fell back upon their own lines with the acknowledged loss of 5,600 men. Correspondents estimated the casualties at from 8,000 to 10,000 killed, wounded, and prisoners. Thus ended what will in all probability prove the last assault upon Petersburg, resulting in the most crushing disaster and disgraceful defeat that has yet befallen the great army under GRANT.

If any other general were in command, we should predict a speedy return of the Federal army to Washington. But GRANT's fortunes are so entirely bound up with those of the present Administration that he may yet linger on before the walls of Petersburg for some months with a view of saving Mr. LINCOLN. He cannot entertain any serious hope of capturing the town which Beauregard, with his Carolinian troops, holds so easily against the whole Federal army. He has no prospect of a diversion. He must know that his stay south of Petersburg only gives the Confederate raiders licence to harass Maryland and Pennsylvania, and may seriously imperil the Northern capital. Practically his force of 100,000 men is nullified by Beauregard's division so long as he maintains his present lines, and we confess we are unable to understand the strategy which detains him there. Nevertheless, his admirers still believe in his resources and inventive powers, and we can only hope that they estimate his tenacity rightly, and that the end of September will still find him keeping up the semblance of a siege of Petersburg. In one respect, perhaps, Grant is right. He has slaughtered his veterans. The flower of his army is gone. Behind intrenchments he is still powerful, but we doubt very much whether his troops are fit for the movements which inaugurated this campaign, and whether the motley regiments of negroes, hundred-days men, and raw recruits which now compose a large proportion of his army, would face Lee's disciplined soldiers in the open. However, his last failure may open his eyes. The North is not only alarmed but angry. It might have put up with forced contributions, with flaming cities, and even with the national humiliation of having its own capital almost at the mercy of 7,000 or 6,000 'rebels,' if there were any successes to score on the other side. But Grant has not yet won a victory. His combinations have miscarried; his battles have been defeats; his assaults disasters. The North owes it to him that it has now no army to defend its honour, and that Lee is practically nearer to Washington than the Federal troops to Richmond. Grant's three months of unlimited confidence, of entire irresponsibility, of absolute control, have achieved these results with the loss of 100,000 men. The common sense and the fears of the North may at last prove too strong even for Grant's tenacity, and compel a retrograde movement which will proclaim to the world that the war policy of Mr. Lincoln's Cabinet has utterly and ignominiously failed. But Grant's position is full of difficulties. If he maintains his present lines he exposes his army to frightful losses from malaria, and to a demoralisation more serious than repeated defeats; moreover he leaves the North open to Lee's columns, and army after army of militia an easy prey to Southern veterans. If he retires he enables Lee to throw 40,000 or 50,000 men upon Sherman's communications, annihilate his army, and secure Tennessee and Kentucky to the Confederacy. It is an embarrassing dilemma, and we are curious to see how he will escape it. For the present he counts for very little in the struggle. The game is being played out at Atlanta and on the Potomac. Whether Lee decides to reinforce Hood, or convert the raid into an invasion, is the question of the moment. We look forward with confidence to the answer a mail or two will bring. In the meantime it is satisfactory to know that Hood holds out bravely at Atlanta, and that since he took command one defeat of the Federals has followed another in quick succession. Atlanta is fortified and well provisioned; and Hood must feel himself strong, or he would not dare to attack his powerful enemy. It remains to be seen whether Sherman will have the temerity to undertake the siege of a town 130 miles away from his base of operations, and held by an army that he has not yet defeated in the field.

The Prospect of Speedy Peace.

Our readers will acquit us of having ever been unduly sanguine in our appreciations of the events of the American War. While we have never for an instant doubted the ultimate triumph of Confederate independence, and while we have seldom been deceived, even transiently, by the boastful impostures of Federal newspapers and diplomatic documents, we may modestly claim the credit of having been substantially correct in the few predictions we have ventured, and of never having encouraged false hopes of peace based upon either the exhaustion of the North, its financial collapse, its return to reason, or even the successes of Southern arms. We have consistently held to the conviction that the war, left to its own course, whatever might be its vicissitudes, must be a long one; that no influence from within, at least during the term of Mr. Lincoln's administration, would be potent enough to end it; and that the only hope of shortening this fated period lay in the wisdom and justice of European Powers, if, by recognising an incontestable political fact, they had exchanged a false for a true neutrality. Within the last two years and a half, this only hope seemed several times on the point of realisation. To-day none but a visionary will deny that the idea of recognition is practically less present to men's minds than it was twelve months ago. Whether this arises from the frequent disappointment of well-founded expectations, or from a strengthening conviction that the South now stands in less need than formerly of even such moral aid from abroad, we need not here inquire. Certain it is that the South itself has long ceased to expect, scarcely to desire, recognition; and in inverse proportion has grown the proud confidence in its own Heaven-aided ability to accomplish the great work of national salvation. Yet at this very moment, when we once more acknowledge the fallacy of the only hope upon which we had heretofore dwelled seriously, we are able to say with all calmness and soberness that the prospects of speedy peace were never so promising, so almost absolutely certain. It is our sincere belief that, unless some great disaster befals the Confederate arms before the 29th of this month, the Democratic party then assembling in convention at Chicago will nominate a peace candidate for the Presidency, and within three months thereafter there will be an armistice.

It is not because the military situation presents unprecedented features, that we stake our judgment upon so bold a prediction. Another Confederate invasion might possibly end in another Sharpsburg or Gettysburg. Another period of reciprocal inactivity might ensue, affording time for recruiting another army in Ireland and Germany. Nor is it because the financial condition so unmistakably indicates that the bottom of the nation's pocket has been reached. Federal finances have so often defied rational calculations, so many grave crises have been passed—not safely, but still passed—so buoyant and sanguine is the American temperament, that we would hesitate to deny the possibility of another miracle, and, given a drawn battle or two, or some illusory success, we are not sure but even this last crisis might be tided over, and the inevitable ruin, carefully concealed by 'shoddy' flowers from public view, might be staved off for another season. These embarrassments have become periodical ever since the battle of Bull Run, aggravating with each year. To a cool observer at a distance they seemed fatal in 1861; they were worse in 1862; still worse in 1863. It is not because they are worst in 1864 that we look for peace, but because in 1864 they coincide with embarrassments of quite another kind, with a quadrennial civic revolution which even in ordinary times puzzled and perplexed the acutest understanding of European statesmanship. The curious feature of the American federative system is its affectation of mathematical mechanism. The Federal Government is wound up, warranted to run four years. It may run as wildly fast or as tamely slow as the materials of its clock-work will admit, but at the striking of a certain hour its motive power is exhausted. At one second after twelve o'clock on March 4, the four-years' king is dead—four years' life to the new king. Alas, however, for human ingenuity, there is an interval between the winding up again and the running down, and this interval is an interregnum. The new king is elected in November, the old one dies in March. In the four months intervening, unless he happens to be his own successor for another 'term,' the courtiers desert the setting sun to worship the rising one. The Federal Government has only a nominal head. At noon on March 4 of next year Mr. Lincoln, unless reelected, loses the last semblance of power; four months and four days earlier, on the first Tuesday of November next, the entire substance. In the meanwhile the semblance and the substance remain irremediably disunited, and therefore dormant.

How slim are Mr. Lincoln's chances of reelection may be seen by the indecent alacrity with which the rats are scampering away from his ship. Already he is opposed by a candidate of his own party, one who is not only the first love of that party—its candidate when Lincoln was not yet known outside his own village—but one who represents that very section of the party which, by its rabid radicalism, leavened the rest, and in the heat of the fermentation flung Mr. Lincoln into power. Even the Convention which lately renominated Mr. Lincoln, composed as it was of his own office-holders, deemed it necessary to save the appearance of self-respect by insulting him in his Mexican policy. The most important committee of his own Congress has denounced him for the attempted usurpation of arbitrary power for the purpose of manufacturing fictitious votes from the 'rebellious' States; and the two Houses of Congress, as one body, have given practical effect to this denunciation by a legislative enactment that the votes of the 'rebellious' States shall not count in the ensuing election. In open feud with his Congress, at variance with his party, deserted by his mercenary friends, ridiculed by the press, despised by the public, his favourite generals defeated in the field, his pet schemes ending in disaster, Mr. Lincoln is not a very formidable competitor for the Presidency. Add to this that the Democratic Opposition, keenly alive to the possible turns of fortune in their favour, have adjourned the nomination of their candidate to the decision of the issue of the summer's campaign, fixing it at a date barely eight weeks prior to the November election. At that election the successful candidate requires, since the votes of one-third of the States are counted out, a numerical majority of the actual votes cast, such as no President since Washington has ever obtained.

The personal triumph or humiliation of Mr. Abraham Lincoln is, however, merely an incident—and in no sense an element—in our calculations for peace. If the war against the South is to be prosecuted, we prefer him as President of the United States to any one of the four millions of adult males in the population of Federal America. Our prognostication rests upon the fact that a new idea has entered the Northern mind, and that this idea is the only practicable bridge from war to peace. This idea scores of newspapers, which before were eagerly clamouring for a more vigorous prosecution of the war, have within the last few weeks taken up with utterance more or less distinct. It is in the minds and mouths of men of all parties, defended or denounced, but familiar to all. It is reflected in the public correspondence of the European press from America; it is sharply mapped out in nine-tenths of the private letters which fill the American mail bags. It is like the confused sound of many voices; unless a providential event hushes it, it will have swollen, ere our printed pages reach the other side of the Atlantic, into the deafening chorus of millions of men. It is an idea all the more powerful because it flatters American vanity without being altogether chimerical and impracticable. It is an idea which implies solution, and not defeat. It is an idea which gratifies vague popular longings for revenge, and which yet promises solid material advantages.

This idea, in which we recognise the mustard seed of a lasting and prosperous peace, may, when stripped of its surplusage of words and extravagancies of drapery, be succinctly described somewhat as follows. The North says to itself: 'In the event of success (and no true Northerner permits himself to doubt of eventual success), what shall we gain? The experience of over three years of war has demonstrated that the chances of success upon which we most counted either never did or certainly do not now exist. Thanks to an Administration as imbecile as it has been ferocious, there is neither "latent Union feeling" nor "negro-rising," and there will be none. If, therefore, we succeed, after incalculable further expenditures of blood and treasure, in conquering the South, we shall find ourselves chained to a corpse. We are persuading ourselves that we are fighting for the Union—that is to say, for commercial prosperity at home and power and prestige abroad. If, after years of war, we subdue the South, our prosperity at home will consist in having the productive portion of our national territory laid waste, and the industrial portion of it burdened by a debt which it is equally ruinous to repudiate or to pay. Our prestige abroad will consist in having the flower of two-thirds of our manhood employed in keeping under subjection the mutinous remaining third. The price in our own liberties which we have already paid for the mere attempt, gives the standard of what success will cost us; and if we shall be further called to strike an average of the amount of liberty suitable equally to white American freemen and emancipated black slaves, the future is sickening to contemplate. Viewing all this, three years of war have greatly changed circumstances. If we were right then, we are not now. It is the part of wisdom to make the most of circumstances as they are. The nations of Europe, by their own shortsightedness and cowardice, have let a golden opportunity pass. It presents itself to us now; let us be wiser than Europe. The South is neither conqueror nor conquered; let us have the credit of doing generously what some day we may have to do by compulsion. North and South, since the formation of the Union, have ever been recognised entities. We nominally classed both under a varying number of States, and we lived prosperously when these States numbered thirty-four. Why should we not live prosperously if the Union meant two States, instead of thirty-four? In or out of the Union, as contiguous empires who have tested each other's strength, we must live together upon some sort of terms. The South has war debts as well as we. There will, therefore, with a little concession on both sides, be no insuperable obstacle to an identical commercial policy, much as Southerners talk about 'free trade.' The South owes no favours to Europe, neither do we. There is no obstacle, therefore, to a permanently identical foreign policy. Why should not the Union become a marriage between two great States, a marriage without possible divorce, admitting a distinct individuality and independent rights in both, but representing a unit to the outside world?'

Such is the substance of the argument which, at the family fireside, in the club, at the domestic breakfast table, or at the public table d'hôte, now forms the staple of discussion—for and against—throughout the Northern States. We have transcribed it almost textually from the mass of Northern correspondence, unconnected and even antagonistic in its sources, which has reached us directly, or been submitted to us. We have awakened to its importance, through the coincidence in many essential points which forced itself on our attention in our Southern correspondence. It is not for us to pronounce on the merits of this argument. The North, being the aggressor, must initiate the terms of peace. But this much we are free to say. In the heart of the population of the Confederate States, wearied of war, though undaunted in the confidence of its issue, proposals of this sort must touch a responsive chord. The men of authority may see the inconveniences of so close an alliance with the North, but the people will see that they must choose their allies from between the Western European nations or their nearest neighbours, and neither England nor France, nor even Gallic Mexico, has done aught to interfere with the natural claims of that formidable nearest neighbour. In spite of their habitual self-restraint, Southerners are disgusted at the imbecility of the English Government of the day, and at the inconsistency, not to say treachery, of that of France. If they are forced to choose between Europe and America, they might very well choose their own hemisphere, provided the first word of every treaty of alliance was always unchallenged Confederate independence.

There is only one logical conclusion to these reflections: it is, that if any selfish hope of exhausting both American belligerents has animated the policy of Europe, that policy will have its just reward. Neither have lost the restorative energies of youth. Both have only just learned their own strength. Debt-burdened and bled as they may be, the day that they make an honourable peace, with amity and an identical foreign policy, the twin confederations will be physically and morally stronger than ever was or could have been the undivided Union, with its materialistic tendencies, and its external strength neutralised by an internal sectional balance of power.

THE BURNING OF CHAMBERSBURG.

(From the Boston Courier, August 2.)

Everybody will be struck with sorrow at the destruction of the pleasant and thriving town of Chambersburg. It enables us here in the North to appreciate better than before the realities of war, and to comprehend the devastation and suffering which it has spread over the once fair and prosperous country of the South. To read, ourselves sitting in safety, of the destruction of Southern cities, villages, and plantations; of the glorious success of the Federal armies in reducing half a State to the condition of a desert waste, was exhilarating, perhaps. 'Poor devils, why did they rebel? and what rights has a rebel, or his helpless family, which a loyal soldier is bound to respect?' But when the brand begins to reach our own towns, where reminders of fifty thousand ruined Virginia homes are left by rebel hands upon the ruins of mansions within a few miles of the national capital; when farms are laid waste, towns held to ransom, and whole counties overrun by men whose own homes have felt the torch of Northern raiders, and whose wives and little ones have been left shelterless and penniless by the hands of our own brothers and sons, we begin—at least we should begin—to reflect, and to ask ourselves 'Who is to blame for such savagery?' 'Who inaugurated these cruel methods of warfare?' 'Who first burned and sacked defenceless towns, and left their inhabitants destitute?'

These are sad, serious questions. We may think what we will of the Southern people, but there is not a man among us who can put his hand upon his heart and say he would not do, in this matter, just as they have done. We are all eager enough for retaliation when we hear of outrages by them upon prisoners, negroes, and Unionists. Are they of different flesh? 'Hath not a rebel hands, organs, dimensions, senses, affections, passions? fed with the same food, hurt with the same weapons, subject to the same diseases, healed by the same means, warmed and cooled by the same winter and summer' as we are? 'If you prick him does he not bleed? if you poison him does he not die, and if you wrong him shall he not revenge?'

The Federal Government has many times sent out raiding parties for the express purpose of destruction, and we have all read the congratulations of the press over 'vast destruction of mills, houses, villages, railroads, wheat, corn, and all that goes to sustain life in man and beast.' It is not long since the once thriving town of Alexandria, upon the Red River, was left in flames, as Chambersburg was left, by a retreating army, but that army was a Federal one. Officers boasted publicly upon the steamboats of the Mississippi, that, in Sherman's Yazoo expedition

'For thirty miles in length and twelve in breadth, not a building of any kind but had been destroyed, and everything that would sustain life; and they grew exceedingly merry over the consternation of the women and children, when they woke up in the night and found their houses in flames. "It was such fun to see them running out to the woods in their night-clothes, frightened to death!"'

And what were the reasons given by glozing newspapers for such atrocities? Just such sentences as these—

'The stake is too mighty to admit of any remissness—to allow even the voice of suffering women and children to hold us back! Hot tears may scald the cheeks of mothers, and hunger pinch thousands of needy ones, and yet the success of the Union cause is worth all that sacrifice.'

Well, if these things are military necessities for us, are they less so for the rebels? Have they such advantages as to be able to forego means of war employed by their enemies?

THE CONFEDERATE CAUSE IN FRANCE.

Paris: August 16.

The pretended successes achieved by the Federal arms before Atlanta have received full justice from the French press. The readers of the Siècle and the Opinion Nationale are the only persons sufficiently credulous to believe that Sherman has succeeded in breaking through the fortifications of Atlanta; those of the Constitutionnel, the Patrie, the Moniteur, La France, the Pays, the Nation, and the Globe are better informed in this matter; they know quite well that Sherman has neither occupied the centre, the circumference, nor, indeed, any part of the defences of Atlanta; and that he was completely defeated by General Hood on July 22.

The Confederates, says La France, have the advantage in Georgia. Not only have the Federals failed to make any impression upon Atlanta, but they are moreover not in a position to prolong the siege until the arrival of reinforcements. The Patrie, the Constitutionnel, and the Pays express themselves in nearly the same terms, and base their opinion upon extracts taken from New York journals, and upon the American correspondence of the Times.

The proceedings at Petersburg are not less correctly appreciated. The Patrie does not attach any importance to the deploy of the two main bodies sent by Grant from the other side of the Potomac, but at the same time considers that the agitation now prevalent in the West is serious; it sees in these secession projects a further proof of the discontent which pervades the Western States, and is of opinion that the partisans of the new Confederation will not meet with those obstacles which Aaron Burr encountered when, fifty years ago, he meditated the same scheme.

M. Aucaigne, the editor of the American portion of the Patrie, in a special article on the North-Western Confederation, without placing implicit faith in the statements put forth by the New York journals relative to this subject, shows that the formation of this Confederation may be regarded as probable. He writes as follows:—

After the many proofs of the discontent existing in the West which have been so frequently given during the past two years by the organs of the various parties in America—after the still more convincing proofs which the populations themselves have given in their connection with the administration of Mr. Lincoln the speedy realisation of these Confederation projects cannot be regarded as a Utopia: and even supposing that this realisation should, owing to events, be for a time delayed, the Confederation of the North-West will nevertheless one day exist. Its creation is in the nature of things; it is rendered necessary by the configuration of the soil, and especially by the prodigious development of these young States, so separated by distance from Washington, the despotic orders coming thence they would not at all times obey.

The Patrie thus calls attention to the progress of the peace party in the North, and to the strange pretensions which the New York Herald attributes to the Cabinet of Washington relative to the seamen belonging to the Alabama who were rescued by the Deerhound. It stigmatises these pretensions, and rejects altogether the idea that they would be listened to in England. Its language on this subject is very firm:—

The men belonging to the crew of the Alabama, now in England, are indebted to a fortunate circumstance, which prevented them from falling into the hands of their enemies. Whether the assistance rendered them by the Deerhound was fortuitous or contemplated, it is not the less true that in placing their feet upon the deck of a neutral vessel they have escaped from their pursuer, the Kearsarge. The English Government cannot, therefore, regard as prisoners the victims of a sea-fight who have solicited hospitality at its hands: and all the laws of humanity prevent the demand made by the Cabinet of Washington not only from being granted, but even listened to.

With respect to the movement which has taken place in the North in favour of peace, the Patrie thinks it may lead to the combination of two distinct and independent confederations, ruled, each of them, by a separate Government, but closely united in their foreign and commercial policy. In this manner, for the whole world, the American Union would remain firm and indivisible; its internal policy alone would be subject to change. Should this admirable plan be realised, I doubt if Europe and Mexico will find their interests promoted by it.

M. Eugène Chatard, who discusses American matters in the Presse, has devoted a long article to a general estimate of the present state of things in America. This estimate is not favourable to the Federals; he expresses himself severely towards the North, 'which has squandered its immense resources, both in men and in money,' for Grant, 'whose immobility before Petersburg displayed great weakness,' and for Mr. Lincoln also, whose reply to Messrs. Clay and Holcombe 'is very haughty for a Government chief who is threatened even at the very gates of his capital, and ready to embark in order to find a refuge under shelter of the invasion. If the South,' says M. Chatard, 'had been guilty of a quarter part of the faults committed by the North, its cause would have been lost long since.'

This article in the Presse is very impartial, although it contains some errors prejudicial to the South. But although M. Chatard may at times show himself somewhat unjust towards the Confederates, I am confident that he does not do so intentionally. His articles have throughout a loyal tone, and it is evident that he is neither himself deceived, nor seeks to deceive others. This good faith is all the more praiseworthy, as M. Chatard is the only writer of the liberal press who has given proof of it. I feel convinced that his opinions will gradually become rectified, and that, discovering his mistake, he will end by awarding justice to the South, which, however, has never found in him a severe judge.

Some time since the Gazette de Cologne exposed the seductive proceedings and manœuvres practised by the Federal recruiters to enlist poor Belgian and German artisans into the service of the Union. To-day a London correspondent relates to the Pays the manner in which this ignoble traffic in human flesh for cannon uses is carried on with the poor Irish, who are led to confide in the fine promises made to them by Federal sharpers. You are aware of these culpable manœuvres, you know how that these simple honest children of Erin are persuaded that they are being engaged as labourers, with the promise of excellent wages, and how when they land on the soil of the best of republics, they are at once seized and enrolled by force in the army of the glorious Union; it is therefore unnecessary to revert here to details which would not be credited were they not attested by official documents.

The Pays severely censures the proceedings of the Northerners towards Irish emigrants. 'Such,' it says, 'is this white-slave trade carried on by these false philanthropists, who make a great deal of noise about their pretended crusade against slavery.'

The Globe has published a long article, under the signature of Mr. W. Duckett, in reference to the operations of Grant before Petersburg. 'It is difficult,' says this journal, 'to understand the harmony of General Grant's plans; to-day he seems desirous to raise the siege of Petersburg—the next day he returns to it. At the commencement of the campaign he had 175,000 men. He ought to have performed wonders; but what has become of his army? It has succeeded neither in reaching Richmond, nor in taking Petersburg, nor in defending Maryland against the invasion by the Confederates. Weeks and months pass away without effecting any change for the Federals, who decree draft after draft of men, and loan upon loan. The possibility of the North succeeding in reducing the South diminishes daily, and public opinion is more than ever disposed to declare itself in favour of a compromise.'

This article by Mr. Duckett, who has already contributed several to the Globe on the American question, is written in a remarkable manner, and gives proof that its author is intimately acquainted with the subject on which he treats.

I find that I omitted, in my last review of the Parisian press, to acquaint you of an excellent article by M. H. Marie-Martin, which appeared in the Constitutionnel of Friday last. It is all the more important that this article should not be passed over in silence, as its author is one of those rare French journalists who have made American policy their special study, and who are consequently the best acquainted with the spirit of Federal institutions. M. Martin examines the situation of the North in a triple point of view—its military resources, its finances, and its moral condition. He shows that military enthusiasm has become extinguished, that the new secretary of finance finds a difficulty in effecting a loan, and that public opinion is evidently in favour of peace. This time M. Martin seems perfectly to understand on what conditions, logical and legitimate, peace may be proposed to the South. He does not hesitate to condemn severely the reply made by Mr. Lincoln to Messrs. Clay and Holcombe—a reply in which the President affects to regard the Southern States as conquered provinces.

The following are his words:—

Thus, with respect to slavery, Mr. Lincoln maintains the validity of his abolitionist decrees, whereas in all times, and by constitutional right, this question has been reserved to the sole jurisdiction of the States. To ask the Southern States to acknowledge this encroachment by the Federal Power is indeed to ask them to abdicate their political autonomy; it is also beyond the limits of the special question of slavery to make a pretension which would tend to nothing less than the substitution for the ancient Federal compact of the new system of a republic, one, indivisible, and centralising; it is, in a word, to aim at a veritable revolution. One may understand how it happened that when the people of the South were informed of these conditions of Mr. Lincoln, they replied that the generation which would accept them was not yet born.

I have directed your attention to this article not simply because it is favourable to the South, but because it shows how intimately the writer is acquainted with his subject. Besides, I may say that I have never yet met with any one well versed in the knowledge of American institutions that has ever shown himself hostile to the South.

The liberal journals have spared us a little this week. The Opinion Nationale has announced, as it is in the habit of doing, that it was all over with Atlanta, Richmond, and Lee's army; but it has made this announcement so often that it is no longer believed by any one.

The Courrier du Dimanche, an excellent journal, which we regret to count among our opponents, has commenced the publication of a series of letters from America, to which the editor directs attention. The first of these letters is well written, but displays great ignorance of American policy. For example, one reads in it, among other things, that the Democratic party is the Aristocratic party. You may judge from this substantial error how many others may be found in matters of detail. Moreover, the author of this letter seems to be opposed to everything American.

The Journal Politique de la Semaine, the last born of the three popular journals of M. Millaud, has availed itself of the assistance of M. Edouard Gaulhiac to treat the American question. M. Gaulhiac was formerly connected with the Constitutionnel, to which journal some excellent articles on America have been contributed by him. He is a partisan of the South, as devoted as he is intelligent. I am told, however, that the Journal Politique intends to defend the Federal cause, but of this I have great doubt; surely M. Gaulhiac would not undertake so ungrateful a task.

A surgeon belonging to the French navy, M. Dufour, has published, in the Archives de Médecine Navale, a curious memoir on the state of the wounded brought into the hospital at Cherbourg after the fight between the Alabama and the Kearsarge. They were fifteen in number; one only has died, and all the rest, with the exception of two who are in a dangerous state, are in a fair way of recovery. M. Dufour informs us that their wounds were caused for the most part, not by the projectiles themselves, but by the fragments and splinters of wood carried away by them. He remarks on this subject that since solid shot has been abandoned in favour of shells, which break into fragments travelling at an amazing rapidity and spreading in their flight both wounds and death, naval engagements are assuming a more murderous character. It is a mistake, says M. Dufour, to think that the wooden armour of the keel can protect the crew from the fragments thrown from a battery; although the projectiles may not bruise the iron plates, still at the place which they touch they strike off splinters of this wooden wall, which are propelled to a long distance and with great force.

CONFEDERATE CAUSE IN LANCASHIRE.

FROM OUR OWN CORRESPONDENT.

Manchester: August 17, 1864.

Last evening a large gathering of the gentry, merchants, manufacturers, public officials, and other inhabitants of Oldham was held in the principal hotel in that town, for the purpose of commemorating at a public dinner the 'glorious successes' achieved by the Confederates 'in the present most eventful and decisive campaign.' Covers were laid for 150. It is unnecessary to observe that on this, as on all similar occasions, the speeches were distinguished by all that warmth of feeling and undisguised admiration for which Oldham has long since been remarkable as the most 'Southern' town in Lancashire. The chair was taken by Robert Harrop, Esq. Among those present were Mr. Councillor Crompton, J. Whittaker, Esq., J. Holroyd, Esq., Lewis Harrop, Esq., J. Chadwick, Esq., H. Helliwell, Esq., &c., &c. Many influential gentlemen connected with the Central Association in Manchester were present by special invitation, as also were the zealous and able secretaries of that Institution, Mr. T. B. Kershaw and Mr. J. Parker.

The list of toasts was as follows:—

1. Her Most Gracious Majesty the Queen.
2. The Prince and Princess of Wales, and the rest of the Royal Family.
3. The Army, Navy, and Volunteers.
4. The Borough Members, Messrs. Cobbett and Hibbert.
5. The Mayor and Corporation.
6. The Town and Trade of Oldham.
7. President Jefferson Davis and the Confederate Cabinet—may their efforts be as triumphant as we desire, and may the success that attends them be worthy of the noblest cause in which statesmen can be engaged.
8. To the memory of the lamented and immortal General 'Stonewall' Jackson—type and mirror of the patriot, the soldier and the Christian.
9. General Lee and his illustrious companions in arms.
10. The friends of Southern Independence in England and throughout the civilised world.

Mr. J. Whittaker, in proposing the toast of the Volunteers, elicited the most enthusiastic cheering when he hoped that, if need were, they would imitate the noble volunteers of the South, who were offering themselves as an example for all time, in the spirit in which men ought to fight for home, independence, and liberty. 'We too,' he added, 'are in our way good volunteers—volunteers in wishing to-night God speed to the Confederate cause.'

The toast of 'President Davis and the Confederate Cabinet' was given from the chair in a speech marked by good sense, good taste, and the profoundest admiration and respect. In the course of his remarks, the speaker brought forward an array of facts, from which he contended that, in all essentials of internal welfare and in all the requisites for carrying on the war, the South were stronger to-day than they were twelve months ago, while their spirit of resistance would only become more indomitable the longer the struggle was forced upon them. On the other hand, the North were reaching the last stage of weakness, and they would ultimately have to give up the contest, rent and torn in their reputation as well as in their material condition.

Mr. T. B. Kershaw was called upon to speak to the same toast, and his appearance was welcomed with great cheering. He delivered an eloquent speech upon the progress of the campaign, and saw a hopeful prospect for the South in the present condition of affairs. Adverting to the news brought by the Europa, he spoke in a feeling manner of the fearful loss of life attending Grant's last attack upon Petersburg, and asked how many more hecatombs of slaughtered husbands, fathers, and sons would be required before the Powers of Europe gave way to the dictates of humanity. He contrasted the Northern and Southern armies, and the mode in which they were severally handled. To General Lee the lives of his soldiers seemed as dear as they were inexpressibly precious to those beloved ones for whose sake they were risked; while to General Grant—emphatically 'the butcher'—his hordes of hirelings and negroes were objects neither of care nor pity, but were hurled by him in masses where nothing awaited them but sure destruction, without the possibility of their slaughter yielding the slightest military advantage. In illustration of this contrast, the speaker cited many conspicuous incidents during the progress of the campaign, concluding with a picture of the terrible havoc recently committed before Petersburg. He then passed on to consider the unfair 'neutrality' practised by our Government in its dealings with both belligerents, and congratulated the people of Oldham and the other manufacturing districts upon the wholesome check which had recently been put upon 'Federal emigration' from this country, chiefly through the instrumentality of Lord Edward Howard's speech in Parliament. Copies of that address, he said, were now being issued in vast numbers, and the circulation of them would be continued by the Southern Independence Association, until the warning of Lord Howard had made itself heard in every hamlet in the north of England.

Mr. Kershaw then referred at some length to the financial difficulties of the North, their protective policy, and the advantages the world would receive by a system of free trade with the South. The end, he hoped, was not far off, and when peace was restored the people of Oldham might look back with pleasure upon the many demonstrations they had made of their sympathy with a righteous and a winning cause.

Many other speeches were made, one by a Mr. William Noble, a warehouseman, which, on account of its natural eloquence and feeling, was received with more than usual enthusiasm.

The proceedings terminated with the customary compliments to the esteemed chairman, and three ringing cheers for the speedy recognition of the Confederate States.

An article startling for its impudence, but in some respects peculiarly interesting to us just now, has been reprinted from the New York Times, in which we are gravely informed that a more highly organised system of 'Federal emigration' than that which previously prevailed is about to be practised in Lancashire. The writer contends that the introduction of the system would be superfluous in Ireland—meaning, I suppose, that Irish recruits can be obtained without it—and adds:—

The place, we presume, where the Commissioner's agents would find their enterprise most workable—where, too, they would find a superabundant population—where they would encounter a tolerably industrious class whose pledge of labour might be reckoned on being redeemed with moderate certainty, is the great manufacturing districts of West York and Lancashire in England. Everything there, for the time at least, would in a measure conspire favourably for regular subvention agencies. And General Bowen, we believe, might wisely give his system its first trial there, and feel his way carefully towards its introduction elsewhere.

Recent events in Virginia have exercised a considerable influence upon our markets. In its City article of this morning the Guardian has the following:—

We learn from not a few sellers that the cautious feeling among the buying classes is manifestly growing stronger, and that without reference to the money market. There is among them a keener sense of danger from the high range of prices, heightened by a vague apprehension, which is again creeping over them, that the American civil war may soon be ended by signal failure on the side of the North.

AN ITALIAN WITNESS.

To the Editor of The Index.

Turin: August 13, 1864.

Sir,—One of the few Italians who, seduced by the rose-coloured visions of glory and gain, left their peaceful homes to offer their swords to the Federal Government, has recently written to his friends here; and the letter, coming as it does from an impartial source, and from a man of considerable military capacity, cannot, I think, fail to interest your readers. The writer, who is from a small provincial town of Piedmont, went to the Federal States about two years ago, and through his introductions and abilities speedily obtained the command of a cavalry regiment. He fought with M'Clellan in his Virginian campaign, and was made prisoner by the Confederates in one of the bloody battles round Richmond, in which condition, owing to the cruel obstinacy of the Federal Government, he remained eighteen months. When at length exchanged, he returned to his command, and has been through the whole of Grant's frightful campaign. The letter has been published in the Vessillo Italiano of Vevielli, and I send you a literal translation of the most interesting portion of it:—

Camp near Petersburg, July 14, 1864.

Our prospects before Petersburg are not promising, and I do not believe that General Grant is the man whose sword will cut the Gordian knot. We are as far from taking Richmond now, as M'Clellan was in 1861; nay, we are even farther, for in our present position south of the James River, it is necessary to capture Petersburg before we can even commence the siege of Richmond. I think M'Clellan must soon be recalled to the supreme command. He is the only general worthy of the name in the Federal armies. Since the opening of the present campaign Grant has lost above 143,000 men. I have myself lost 700 out of 5,000, and of course, as the principal work has been in storming entrenched camps, the cavalry has been comparatively little engaged. The Confederates have great advantages over us, and their losses are far below ours. The reason is obvious. They are acting on the defensive, and we on the offensive. They are everywhere protected by breastworks, and we have to storm them. Usually we lose 60 per cent. more than they in our efforts to dislodge them from their positions; and many a time we are compelled, as at Spottsylvania, to give up the idea of storming, and have recourse to flanking operations.

Meantime the American horizon becomes more threatening every day, and Lincoln has appointed August 8 as a day of general fasting and prayer throughout the Republic. I am not aware whether we shall fast here in camp, but I know there is not one good citizen who fails to send up a fervid prayer to God every day that this horrible scourge may cease at once. It appears to me that the most meritorious work that each of us foreigners could perform, and the most acceptable to the Almighty, would be to quit the army and return to his own country. Let all the foreign element now serving under the stars and stripes abandon the contest, and no one will remain to carry on Lincoln's 'pegging away' system but a few officers and Northern niggers. . . . . L. P.

The Italian press, with few exceptions, believes that the South cannot be conquered, and that she has earned her independence from Yankee thraldom as no other people on the face of the earth ever before earned its freedom. Yours, &c. F. M.

LETTERS FROM NEW YORK.

New York: August 2, 1864.

THE ASSAULT ON PETERSBURG—THE NORTH REGARDS THE CAMPAIGN AS OVER—THE NEWS FROM SHERMAN'S ARMY—THE INVASION OF PENNSYLVANIA—THE BURNING OF CHAMBERSBURG.

This steamer will bring you glorious tidings for the Confederates. All around the horizon is bright for them, and the whole North is gloomy and despondent. Yesterday, when I was finishing another letter for you, the city journals were buoyant with glad tidings of a brilliant achievement by Grant before Petersburg. He had succeeded in deceiving General Lee by his strategy into drawing off a large part of his army from the front, had blown up a mine under the rebel works, and, pushing through the breach, was in possession of the outer lines, and sure of soon entering and seizing the conquered city. The number of days was counted with exultation, and it was fixed by infallible calculations that eight days was the extremest time to be allowed before Petersburg should be captured; and then—ho, hurrah! for Richmond. But a few hours told a different tale. The mine was sprung and the assault made, and has been repulsed—even according to Federal accounts—with terrible slaughter. The Confederates were found so strongly entrenched in inner lines, and they rained such a storm of shells on the assailing troops, that the whole ground was recovered again, and the lines are this day where they were before the grand explosion which was expected to blow Petersburg in the air. The hopes of making any impression on the Confederate defences in that quarter are given up, and Grant has gone to Fortress Monroe to hold a consultation with the President on the gloomy state of affairs.

The campaign against Richmond is now acknowledged to be a total failure. There is not the least idea that it can be renewed without a new army, and where is that to come from, and when can it possibly be ready? If Grant can maintain himself where he is, it is more than is expected by some of those who have been the most steadfast of the supporters of the Government and the most sanguine advocates of war. Indeed, under the new aspect of affairs, it is made highly probable that the army of the Potomac will be wanted for the defence of Washington City, and there is a call now among the timid in Maryland and Pennsylvania for so much protection as only this army can give. Secure in the admitted impregnability of Richmond, and knowing how terribly the army of Grant has been wasted away in his successive attempts to carry formidable entrenchments by the reckless and useless sacrifice of the lives of his soldiers, Lee is thought to be master of the position, and to be able with security to invade Pennsylvania and even attack Washington with a formidable army. The panic-struck Administration is as likely as not to order the remains of Grant's army back to the Potomac for the protection of the capital. The genius of Lee and Beauregard, and the heroism of their soldiery, have baffled finally the whole Virginian campaign of General Grant, and there is a despairing thought among the most stubborn war partisans to-day that it will be impossible to get together another army, to try another campaign, with any chance of victory over such men as guard the approaches to the Confederate capital.

The news from Atlanta is more vague, but is still cheering. All the tales of the capture of Atlanta, or any part of Atlanta, are exploded as mere inventions. Sherman received a severe check on the 22nd, and if Confederate accounts are true, and they mostly are, another on the 27th; and instead of a certain grasp on Atlanta, it is by no means clear that he is not in a position where, with the assistance Lee is able to send, and the long-expected cooperation in the rear, Hood may hold the army of Sherman at mercy before many days.

At these two great points of struggle all is well with the Confederates. Victory smiles on their banner, and along the border of Pennsylvania, and in Maryland, and about the very capital of the Federals, Confederate troops range with such audacity that the Federal authorities seem to be paralysed with the doubt whether they have only to deal with daring raiders, or must prepare for a formidable invasion in force, which the Confederate general is free to organise if it suits the policy of his Government. To-day confusion, doubt, and alarm reign all through the North. Opportunely for this state of mind, Thursday the 4th (day after to-morrow) was appointed by the President, some time ago, as a day of fasting, humiliation, and prayer. The humiliation has come already.

Your exchanges will give you all the details received of this great Petersburg disaster, with the Federal confession of losses. They are, of course, largely understated, but the record is a fearful one. We have yet to receive the Confederate accounts by which to compare and correct it. The Daily News, which is not disposed to underrate the losses of the Federal armies, being engaged daily in denouncing the useless slaughterings of this wicked war, forming its estimate of the whole loss from those which are partially reported, makes it not less than 12,000. It is certainly 10,000.

While the North is covered with shame and humiliation, the Confederates have a right to rejoice, for with these signal and fruitful victories the day of their final triumph may be counted as approaching and near. It has been openly or silently conceded among large classes in the Northern States that the campaign of Grant ought to be the closing struggle of the war. The length, and greatness, and costliness of the preparations could not well be repeated. Languor and disgust have succeeded to military zeal. The finances of the Government have been strained to the utmost capacity, and without military success bankruptcy was fearfully apprehended. Civil liberty at home was nearly destroyed in the arbitrary effort of a set of reckless and lawless functionaries to make personal and party profit out of the public calamity; and it was very widely reasoned that the war must not be permitted beyond this campaign to be the pretext for requiring unlimited submission to tyranny. The failure of the campaign brings these questions up directly to be tested in the conduct of men. A new army must be had, new campaigns organised, immense expenditures incurred, and huge debt piled up upon debt, with the doubt whether the total collapse of the national credit may not make the attempt a miserable failure. There is the beginning again of another series of the same huge warlike enterprises which have cost the nation the flower of its youth and bulk of its accumulated capital, and loaded it with burdens under which it is staggering like a blind man, and defeat and failure have quenched spirit and deadened hope. These are considerations which force themselves into every man's thoughts at this crisis, and they will strengthen immensely the peace party which is now growing up with such rapidity into power in the North.

The late Confederate raid into Pennsylvania has been marked by one novel incident. The town of Chambersburg, in Pennsylvania, was burnt by the Confederates; and a pitiful story is told of the destitution of the inhabitants of 265 houses said to have been consumed. It is a sad event, and I wish it had not been done; and I wish more that it had not had so many provocations. The line of march of Federal armies throughout the South can be tracked by the ashes of burnt towns, and the woods and swamps have been the refuge of numberless families whose rooftrees have been given to the flames by Federal wantonness. We are not made aware yet whether the burning of Chambersburg was an individual act of the commander of the party, or done under instructions from his Government. It is yet an unsettled question of policy with the Richmond authorities whether the highest sense of duty and self-protection does not require them to institute a system of specific retaliation for the destruction with which the whole territory of the South has been visited by Federal armies under the comprehensive doctrine of military right to, destroy everything in an enemy's country which can directly or indirectly contribute to the sustenance of soldiers or soldiers' families, and in the South every family is the family of some soldier. In such a system of fixed policy the destruction of Chambersburg might be included, while it is deplored, as a retaliation in kind for some one of the multitudinous burnings of Southern cities and the universal devastation of Southern homesteads. It would be a sad necessity; but for the sufferings and the horrors which might follow they are responsible to God and humanity who commenced the practice, and who reward and honour the authors. It is pitiful whining to hear these same persons denouncing the barbarity which destroyed Chambersburg, and making heroes of the vulgar ruffians who but lately left scarcely a rooftree standing in the Sherman raid upon Mississippi and the Hunter raid into Virginia.

There is a pretended interest among the Republicans now to recall General M'Clellan to command, and charge him with the defence of some important position. It is not done in kindness, or in hope that he can do any good, but to embarrass him with the conduct of affairs that are becoming desperate. They hate him with an intensity which really does him good with a large part of the public, who are predisposed to think that what they hate is therefore to be loved.

The star of Grant has gone down. His failure is so complete, his military blunderings have been so huge and disastrous, and the consequences are so alarming, that either he or the President, whose subordinate he is, will be called to severe account for the enormous means they have wasted and the countless lives they have thrown away. A struggle begins to show itself between their several parties of supporters to throw off the blame upon each other.

New York: August 1, 1864.

NEGRO RECRUITS—THE CONSCRIPTION—DEMOCRATIC DELUSIONS—THE PRESIDENTIAL ELECTION—THE VIEWS OF THE WAR DEMOCRATS — THEIR FALLACY — THE SOUTH WILL NOT COMPROMISE HER INDEPENDENCE—THE VIEWS OF THE PEACE PARTY — THE ALLEGED NORTH-WESTERN CONSPIRACY — THE WEST AND THE EAST—THE FINANCIAL DIFFICULTY.

About a year ago one of the political fanatics who preach the gospel of blood from the pulpits of this city, proclaimed that the 'despised negro' was to be, at last, the saviour of this Government. The war could be only carried on to victory by the armed help of the slave. He was answered with a howl of derision. Twenty millions of people—so they reckoned the numbers—could subdue five or six millions, disordered, divided, and destitute, without calling for aid on three or four millions of serviles. It was a libel on their manhood and patriotism to say that the spirit and intelligence of the country could not maintain the authority of a 'beneficent' Government without enlisting on their side the brute instincts of an inferior race, suddenly freed from restraint, and stimulated to think they had terrible wrongs to avenge by domestic treason. It was indignantly averred by the strongest friends of Government that the avowal of such a need was a libel on the national cause, and it was said by the Opposition party that whenever such a necessity should be admitted it would amount to a confession that the war ought to be stopped, for a cause which can only sustain itself by such agencies is treacherous to republican liberty and an outrage on humanity.

The preacher was a prophet. To-day it is the fixed policy of the Government to subdue the insurrectionary States by armies of slaves raised within their own borders, and the Northern people, without distinction of party, are bidding against each other in the competition to get these negro recruits, with which to fill up the respective State quotas in the new levy for troops, for which white men can no longer be obtained.

The conscription law passed by the late Congress repeals the commutation clause of the former Act, by which exemption from service under a draft could be purchased by paying the Government $300. The Secretary of War urged the repeal on the ground of the popular repugnance to the service. When men were allowed to escape by a payment of money, the rich bought themselves off, and communities bought off the poor, to that extent, that when the Government wanted men most it only got money. But Eastern States under the lead of Massachusetts, holding the balance in Congress between the Administration and the Opposition, would not permit the commutation to be repealed without an equivalent by which money could still buy release for their own people from bodily service, and demanded an amendment by which loyal States were permitted to raise recruits in the insurrectionary States, and have them credited by the United States to the State by whose agents they were raised. They were indulged, and the Bill was passed in that form against the votes of the Democrats. There is, therefore, authority by law for every Northern State, when called upon for troops, to relieve her own citizens by making a recruiting ground among the slaves of the South. When it was voted for, the friends of the Government called the Bill a mere precautionary measure which would never be needed, for there was Grant's magnificent army on its triumphant march to Richmond, and the rebellion was to be crushed out completely within sixty days.

Now comes a fresh call for 500,000 more men, and there is the despairing answer from the North that it is impossible to supply them. The military spirit is utterly extinct. There is not only no zeal, but there is repugnance and disgust. In the words of Governor Parker, of New Jersey, there is 'the running to and fro of nearly the whole population, to seize upon any expedient to avoid personal military service.' With all the redundancy of greenbacks there is not money enough in the country to induce one-third of the required number to go into the field. A conscription will carry off such a proportion of the surviving able-bodied men as to distress its productive capacity, break up workshops, and leave fields untilled, and produce such suffering and discontent as to alarm politicians for party ascendency, and create a terror of tumult and riot, perhaps revolution. All parties, therefore, turn to the Southern field of recruiting for relief. The negroes have become, as it was triumphantly declared by their pulpit patrons that they would be, the hope and refuge of the North. Massachusetts, which demanded the policy, was first in the field, and her agents are already in their assigned districts all over the South, buying negro substitutes for Massachusetts soldiers. The other States are following as fast as they can. The negroes are reckoned as volunteers, and get the United States bounties as such. States and districts which want to buy exemption for their own people subscribe additional sums, and Government helps the negro-trading business by appropriating $300 for each recruited slave of a 'loyal' master, of which there may be now and then found one 'loyal' enough to claim the money. Even New York and New Jersey have gone into the negro business, although Governor Seymour and Governor Parker are on record in vehement opposition to the measure, as degrading and pernicious in itself, and an outrage upon the Southern States. The terms of the law of Congress authorise the State governors to appoint these recruiting agents, but do not impose the duty. Both governors object to the exercising of such a power, but both avoid the question, and take the benefit of the measure by permitting sub-districts to appoint their own agents, and furnishing simply an executive voucher for their appointment. This is fine casuistry with which to satisfy a tender conscience. The party to which these men belong are protesting before the world that it is an infamy and an outrage to continue the war for the purpose of abolishing slavery, and that forcible interference in the domestic institutions of any State is a usurpation of constitutional powers which would justify revolution. At the same moment they lend their official aid, under feeble protest of sentimental dissent, to organise servile insurrection by arming the slaves against their masters.

I do not think so meanly of human nature as to believe that Governor Seymour and Governor Parker, and the men of their class, whose convictions are strong against the whole war policy of the Administration, do not feel profoundly humiliated at the bondage in which they find themselves in being constrained, or in supposing themselves to be constrained, to give their official and personal support to measures which they abhor. It is painful to read the extenuations with which they attempt to excuse themselves for their constrained connivance at the worst acts of Government as political necessity they could not control, and plead and promise that those are the very crimes for which they expect to drive the present Administration from power, and replace it with one which will undo them all, and reanimate the country with a war-policy of another sort. It is a pitiful delusion which scarcely imposes on themselves. There is an evident hurrying up of political events, and there are such plain developments of a deeply marked issue of opinion to be made at the coming election for President, that what is called the War Democracy will disappear from the canvass. Since the nominations at Baltimore and Cleveland, and more particularly since the late peace attempts at Niagara, it has become more and more evident, day by day, that popular disgust with the war is deepening at the North, and is so modifying the demands of leading men among the Radicals, that even they would seem to be content to compromise largely and promise largely to obtain a cessation of hostilities on any basis which secures a unity of government over the whole number of States, on terms which the South might be expected to be contented with politically.

The endorsement of the President's dogma, with which he closed the Niagara conference, by the declaration that the voluntary renunciation of slavery, with the guarantee of security from the armed authorities of the South, must precede his consent to debate any question of peace, has been but feebly supported by his own party. The peace men have profited immensely by the development of a purpose for the war which it is a usurpation of power in the President to entertain, and which makes success impossible and extinguishes the desire for success, because it would change the whole character of the Government into an intolerable despotism. The manifesto of the forty-odd members of the late Congress, which was so carefully guarded in its terms, to exclude the thought of consenting under any circumstances to a separation of the Union, is now accepted as a preliminary movement for the organising of an unconditional peace party and the demand for the nomination of a candidate for the Presidency at Chicago who will favour peace, and begins to be associated with the peremptory refusal in advance to support any candidate who by his record or his declarations is committed to the continuance of the war. Peace journals are speaking out strongly everywhere for peace candidates, and for separation in politics from all who advocate the continuance of war. Peace conventions having the same object in view are called in several States. That in New York is to be held on the 18th of this month, eleven days before the meeting of the Chicago Convention. The war Democrats will make a mighty struggle to circumvent these plans and get control of the Convention, and name candidates for a 'vigorous prosecution of the war' on constitutional principles, and their candidate is General M'Clellan.

His supporters believe, or affect to believe, and want others to believe, that with a new President who repudiates the constitutional heresies of Mr. Lincoln's party—who will recall emancipation proclamations, concede the indestructible existence of State sovereignties with full power over all their domestic institutions and concerns, slavery included—who will disband negro troops and rebuke and punish such lawless wretches as Butler, and Sherman, and Hunter—who will sternly discountenance the policy of proscription, confiscation, and vindictive punishment, and set the whole power of the Federal Government against eastern fanaticism and misrule—the Southern States would be contented to resume the same places in the Union which they have quitted, and trust themselves to the virtues of the Constitution and the magnanimity of the North, as they have known them before and have felt them since. If the South is impenetrable to these inducements, it is the M'Clellan theory that force must continue to be used, and will prove successful, for the South will be divided, and the North so strong and zealous that conscriptions will not be required to raise any amount of fighting men.

The basis of this M'Clellan theory is that the South is humbled to the point of seeking an excuse for submission, and will be glad to take shelter in his promises. The plea put forth to reconcile the North to the apparent surrender of its exactions is that with reunion the South is powerless for ever, except as an appendage to some Northern interest. The leading organ of M'Clellan in this city, the World, avows that the South has been so 'terribly chastised' for its attempt to get out of the Union, that if once got into the fold again it will never have the power to offer resistance to the will of the North. The South is approached with the seductive assurance that if these States will only come back they will be able to help the Democracy to a perpetual ascendency in the Government, and divide the gains of the dominion. It is not recalled that there used to be just such a combination; that when the time to test friendship came, the Northern poor Belgian and German artisan enough to go over to the enemy and [illegible]. To-day a London and that, in the final trial, the most fero[illegible] manner in which Northern party for subjugation and extermina[illegible]on uses is were but lately the chiefs of the Democracy, pledged as deeply as human honour could be pledged to the Southern views of constitutional rights under and before the Constitution.

These are the calculations of the War Democracy which offers M'Clellan to the Chicago Convention as the constitutional candidate for a restored Union, with a tender to the South, 'Take these terms, or expect war till you are thoroughly subjugated,' and the promise to the North, 'These will surely bring peace.' They are a series of fallacies or frauds, and will surely bring defeat and disappointment.

There is no evidence anywhere that the Southern States or any of them, or any body of Southern men, are willing to return to the Union, on any terms or under any circumstances. All the proof from their declarations and acts everywhere is the other way. The late attempts by Southern men at Niagara to open negotiations have been quoted by various factions to show that a desire for peace on terms of reunion emanated indirectly from the Confederate Government, and at least reflected its ideas; but there is nothing in the published correspondence, or the character of the men, or the ascertained inclinations of their Government, to support such a theory. It was the wild conjecture of Northern men, that, as their own Government has obstinately refused to listen to any peace overtures from the South except on terms of immediate submission to the authority of the Union, an offer of the South to debate terms must include the contemplation of such submission. But there are multitudes of reasons against that possibility—not the least of which, and quite sufficient, is the declaration of President Davis to a Federal agent but a few days previous, and by him repeated on his return north, that the South is not fighting for slavery, but for 'the right of self-government.' 'We are fighting for independence, and that or extermination we will have,' are the precise words which, I doubt not, represent the unanimous Southern resolve.

The Southern doctrine of self-government includes as the appointed means the positive sovereignty of the States antecedent to that of the United States and supreme in all powers not granted. When a Southern statesman talks of consenting to a conference for peace, on the basis of State sovereignty, in a possible convention of States, it must always be understood as referring to the original conditions of separate sovereignty among the deliberating States, with the independent right to accept or reject the final conclusions of the Convention as in the first Convention which made the present Constitution. This presumes, in fact, a dissolution of the present compact by consent, either as among all the States or as between the dissenting sections. This, too, is the virtual understanding of the genuine Peace men of the Northern States. When they propose an armistice and a Convention to deliberate on the terms of peace, they cannot mean that the Southern States are expected to disarm themselves in advance, and then go into a Convention where they are sure to be outvoted and held to submit to the hardest terms their enemies may impose.

The notion that the Southern people desire to take refuge in the Union under the Constitution again is simply preposterous. They had fixed ideas of the true construction of that Constitution, and were fatally overruled. They withdrew en masse, and expected to be permitted to go in peace, when they found the Constitution converted into an instrument for oppressing and degrading them, and put into the hands of faithless and rapacious men pledged to overthrow their most sacred rights. The war which followed exposed and expanded into gigantic proportions the lurking capacity for tyranny which they had discovered and sought to escape from; and nearly four years of cruel invasion has shown them, in the lurid glare of blazing cities and blasted fields, to what barbarous extremities of wrath and revenge the lust for dominion and plunder can carry the passions of an exasperated majority when they become mad enough to discard constitutional restraints. To consent to go back into political fraternity with the same generation of men, with no better security than the unauthorised undertakings of an accidental majority, which, by its surrender of its own civil liberties at the footstool of usurped power, has shown itself impotent for manly persistence in the right against the frowns of a tyrant or the acclamations of a mob, would be a baseness of cowardice of which such a people as they of the South have proved themselves to be ought to be taken, without protestation or enquiry, to be utterly incapable. The partisans of General M'Clellan weave a rope of sand when they count on the possible willingness of the Southern people to come back 'terribly chastised' to a contented dwelling under the black shadow of that triumphant despotism from which they sought to shelter themselves under State sovereignty, and against which they have been defending themselves amidst dreadful sufferings and with heroic endurance through so many glorious campaigns.

The great bulk of the Peace party in the North are not the dupes of such illusions, nor do I think they will consent to be made partners in the guilt of any connivance at the possible risk of carrying on this horrible war on such pretences, or on any pretences. The preponderating wish is for peace—peace without any condition—peace, if it be possible, with the new creation by consenting parties of States to a common government with the old Constitution if it can be purged of the heresies which, in the prosecution of this horrible war, have been fastened on it to destroy what was most valuable for the maintenance of a federal system of united republics; but peace, at all events, so that the great question may remain unprejudiced by further embittering conflicts, for other generations to reconstruct, with mighty throes, the fabric of Union which this has wantonly destroyed. I will not fill your columns with the ominous signs in public journals, the sayings of public men, and the spontaneous action of the people at public meetings, of the reaction which is going on against the war and of the struggles in the popular mind and will to break through all the trammels of party obligation and official dictation to get at the means for closing the war as soon as possible. They are many and convincing. How they will be worked up into combined and successful action is a problem which depends for solution upon events, some great event of the war, or some sudden collapse in the public finances, both of which are apparently very near. The overwhelming public disaster is the best hope for the breakdown of the men and the system which have, in the short space of three years, brought a great and prosperous nation to ruin.

The Administration has been trying to get up a diversion of public feeling in its favour by the pretended discovery of a great conspiracy in the North-west for breaking up the Union and erecting a North-western Confederacy on its ruins. The Provost-Marshal-General in Missouri is reported to have been engaged for months in search of the proofs of the plot, and, having suc-

two who are in a dangerous st[illegible] recovery. M. Dufour inform[illegible]mber of Western citizens of caused for the most [illegible] detailed description to be published selves, but by the [illegible]vered. It is charged that a combination away by [illegible] through the whole North and West, for the separation of the West from the East. The name of the association is 'Order of American Knights.' The number of sworn members, organised in sub-circles in various States, is put at 500,000 men, of whom 150,000 are organised and armed for military purposes. It is in concert with a similar Order in the South. General Sterling Price is the Grand Commander in the South, and C. C. Vallandigham of Ohio Grand Commander of the North. Vallandigham is a member of the Chicago Convention, and the grand émeute was to be organised there by declaring the existing Administration a usurpation to be overthrown by force. This 'tale of a tub' is carried out into the minute details of the organisation, with the names of the chief conspirators in various parts of the United States. It is, of course, a ridiculous exaggeration in all of it that is true, and a monstrous lie in every part which has the pretended consistency of a plot. It is shrewdly said by discreet friends of the Administration, that if there be any substance in the story if there be so many men, or half so many men, in the Northern States, affiliated together through so many States for the overthrow of the Union by violence from such a deep-seated enmity to the East on the part of the West it is time to give up the war on the South and prepare for civil war or further dissolution at the North. Disunion has become a chronic disease of the whole system, and it is better to give up the struggle now than to go on maintaining it hopelessly. There is, doubtless, thus much of truth in the story, that there is deep feeling throughout the North-west, deepening every day with the experience of the war and perception of its true character and consequences, against the sordid public men and selfish public policy of New England. This feeling takes the expression sometimes of a bitter determination to resist, at all costs, the domination which New England has contrived to establish over the general Government through the means of a war, which her aggressive intolerance created, and through which, while all the rest of the country languishes in pain and is impoverished, she grows rich. It is, doubtless, often said, that if the war closes with the loss of the Southern States, the natural customers and friends of the West, the people of the West may no longer feel themselves bound to a Union in which New England has a predominance so vastly greater than her territory or her population would entitle her to in a redistribution of power, and the West would find it expedient to cut loose from that connection. Possibly there may be societies organised, and perhaps affiliated with each other, of which the bond of union is a common repugnance to New England, and a concerted effort to cut down her power or throw her off altogether, if, in consequence of her machinations, the West loses its old support in the South. This feeling, this purpose, and these possible associations are among the elements which the adversaries of the Administration count upon for success in overthrowing the New England policy, which has dominated for three years over the country at such cost. They will operate through the legitimate channels of an election, if a lawful election is permitted by the men in power; if otherwise, the Western people will, in all probability, take another course by which to right themselves. If this makes the 'plot,' the Administration has good cause for alarm; but to repress it by such absurd canards about organised revolution is a piece of foolishness of which it will be ashamed as soon as it discovers how ridiculous they make it.

The new Secretary of the Treasury has done nothing to reinstate the public finances, and has abandoned the idea of having any fixed policy until military affairs look better. When he came to the city, shortly after his appointment, to raise a loan, he told the banks very frankly, at a conference that he had with the bank officers, 'that if Richmond were in our possession, and the military situation such that we could see our way clear, it would not be so difficult to provide for the future; but in view of the present condition of military affairs, it became necessary to depend greatly upon makeshifts and temporary expedients. He frankly admitted that he had at present no settled policy.' It is very seriously agitated among business men and dealers of all kinds whether the disorders of the currency do not require that contracts and sales should all be made in gold prices, and greenbacks be received in payment only at a price estimated in gold. This will be very difficult in the face of the legal tender law, but not so difficult that expedients cannot be devised to carry it into effect with great relief to trade. Conversations on the subject are frequent; but there is a hanging back from making a public agreement, from apprehensions of the fulminations of the political press against the 'disloyalty' of estimating the Government currency like that of broken banks.

EMIGRATION TO THE UNITED STATES.—The following notice was lately issued by order of the Government Emigration Commissioners:—'Information for emigrants to the United States. . . . Do not trust to strangers, whose object in offering you assistance is probably either to entrap you into enlisting, or to gain your confidence for the purpose of defrauding you out of your money. Do not accept invitations from strangers to drink, and be especially careful not to get drunk, or in any way to lose the control over your own actions. Be very cautious as to the engagements you enter into for work. Remember that an American dollar is nominally equal to 4*s.* 2*d.* English money, and a cent is one halfpenny, but that under the present circumstances of the country they will not buy more than one-third as much of the necessaries of life as they would formerly buy.'

THE YANKEE SLAVE TRADE.—In almost every one of the recruiting and substitute brokers' offices, such conversation as the following is of daily occurrence:—'Gent.—What is the price of a likely young negro to-day? Broker.—From $550 to $600, according to the demand. Gent.—Could you furnish me with three or four sound negroes at any less price? Broker.—No, sir; there is a demand for all we have in Massachusetts, where we send those who can't pass examination, and where we get larger prices. Gent.—How soon could you fill an order for twenty or thirty negroes to fill the quota of our town at, say, $550 each? Broker.—We can't take orders ahead. The price is going up every day. We expect another carload to-morrow, or next day, and we will sell at the market price.' This talk savours of the slave mart; but it is repeated in Buffalo every day. White men bring, in some instances, from $50 to $100 more than negroes. One man paid $675 for a sound Canadian yesterday. The market is fluctuating, but the tendency is upwards.—Buffalo Daily Courier.

AFFAIRS FINANCIAL AND COMMERCIAL.

WEDNESDAY EVENING.

MONEY AND DISCOUNT MARKET.

THE money market has gradually become easier the last two or three days. Instead of expecting a rise in the rate, the question now asked is, Will the directors of the Bank shortly lower their terms of accommodation? It is, however, scarcely believed that either event will for the present take place. No advance is just now probable, but at the same time it is not imagined that the weekly accounts have so improved as to stimulate the directors to return to 7 per cent. Large supplies of capital have recently found their way into the market, and have tended to cheapen the ordinary facilities; still we are not sufficiently strong in our bullion and note reserve to encourage a renewal of a drain. The Bank directors will act wisely if they keep the minimum at 8 per cent for the present, since they have a season of adversity to pass through, when the pressure will be greater than any yet experienced. New financial transactions are still talked of—one for Egypt and one for Spain, but the difficulty will be to get the money paid in any shape if they are deferred till a late period in the year. Next month and the month afterwards funds will have to be sent forward to Alexandria and India to pay for cotton and other produce. This will necessitate an abstraction of capital, but whether the arrivals from America and Australia will be adequate to supply the required amount cannot as yet be estimated. We are in the midst of critical times, but a little vigilance may enable us to pass through without any very extensive mischief. The discount establishments, if they are not hoarding, have so completely provided themselves that they are not likely to want resources, and they are also checking as much as they can any general extension of business. The lowest rates for first-class paper range from 7½ to 7¾, with a full supply. On the Stock Exchange the terms for short loans are 5 to 5½ per cent.

BULLION AND SPECIE MOVEMENTS.

There has been a considerable improvement in the state of the bullion market within the last few days. The late advance in the rate of discount has for the time completely put a stop to the drain of gold, and instead of there having been any withdrawals, specie is again finding its way into the Bank, the amount sent in during the week being 134,000*l.*; and it is anticipated that other large sums will follow, from the arrivals which may be shortly expected. The amount to hand this week has been 662,743*l.*, of which 42,635*l.* was from New York, 517,000*l.* from the West Indies, and 103,108*l.* from Australia. The bar silver brought by the last West Indian steamer has been sold at 61¼*d.* per oz., showing no alteration from previous rates. The market is, however, now slightly firmer. There is no change to notice in Mexican dollars, but the supply continues limited. The gold ships from Australia at present known to be on their way to this country are the Wellesley, with 23,734 oz., valued at 94,936*l.*; the Norfolk, with 7,825 oz., valued at 31,300*l.*; and the Garrawalt, with 28,153 oz., valued at 112,612*l.*—making a total of 238,848*l.*

HOME AND FOREIGN SECURITIES.

A better tone has pervaded all the stock and share markets since it was announced on Thursday last, by the directors of the Bank of England, that there would not for the present be any further advance in the rate of discount. Although the improvement in prices in the English funds has not been to any great extent, the dealings have considerably increased, and the brokers are operating with much greater freedom than for some time past; but towards the close of business to-day there was a little weakness exhibited. Consols left off at 89¼ for money and 89⅝ for the account, which is an advance, as compared with last week, of ⅛ to ¼ per cent. Exchequer bills remain without alteration at 25*s.* to 15*s.* dis. There has been more buoyancy also in the Foreign Stock Market, but the dealers have been chiefly occupied with the arrangement of the account. Spanish stocks appear to have commanded most attention, and the advance has been about 1 per cent. Greek is up ⅜ per cent.; Turkish has also improved from ½ to ¾ per cent., but Mexican is unchanged. The closing quotations this evening were—Greek, 23½ to 24; Mexican, 28¾ to 29; Spanish Passives, 30½ to 30¾; ditto Certificates, 12¾ to 13; Turkish Six per Cents. of 1854, 90 to 91; and those of 1862, 69¾ to 70¼.

CONFEDERATE COTTON LOAN.

Under continued good accounts from the States, the value of this security improves to-day. The nearest value is 78½ to 79. As will be seen from our advertising columns, the payment of the coupons, due September 1, and the half-yearly drawing of an amount equal to 2½ per cent. of the amount unredeemed by cotton, to be held on the same date, are announced by the agents to the contractors.

AMERICAN SECURITIES.

The market for American Government and railway securities continues not only very depressed, but almost entirely neglected, and the latest advices from America are little calculated either to stimulate business or enhance prices. The only transactions officially recorded during the week have been—Virginia State 6 per Cents. at 29; Atlantic and Great Western Railway, Pennsylvania section, 73; do. do., 2nd mortgage, 83; Erie, $100 shares, 40 and 39½; Illinois Central, $100 shares, $90 paid, 45, 44, and 45 dis.; and do. do., all paid, 52½.

LIVERPOOL, Wednesday, August 17.—In the early part of the week our cotton market was still unfavourably affected by the unsettled state of the money market; but subsequently a much quieter tone has prevailed, and a portion of the decline in prices has been regained. To-day there has again been a better business transacted, the advantage, if anything, being in favour of sellers. The sales this week have been 53,000 bales, of which 19,500 have been taken on speculation and for export. By the arrival of the China mail, we learn that a good demand for cotton had sprung up at Hong Kong, and a rise of $1·50 to $2 had been established. Japan staple was much enquired for, and the sales of the fortnight had been 10,000 bags China and 5,000 bags Japan. Four ships were loading, two for London and two for Liverpool. At Canton the sales for the fortnight had been 4,000 bags Shanghai, 2,500 Ningpo, and 1,500 Japan. At the same time the market was slightly advancing. At Shanghai some few transactions have taken place at slightly advanced rates. The total export from June 1, 1863, to May 31, 1864, was 88,595,480 lbs. At Yokohama the advices from England had caused a great demand, and rates tended upwards.

The Manchester markets within the last day or two have shown a slight improvement, in consequence of the easier state of the money market and the nature of the advices from India and China. For shipping yarns there has been more activity, and the buyers for all the markets have shown more disposition to operate, except those for India, and in some instances an advance of ½*d.* per lb. in prices has been established. In home-trade yarns there is also more doing, and prices have regained the position they held previous to the recent depression, the only signs of weakness being in yarns made from the commonest qualities of [illegible] cotton. The cloth market does not exhibit quite so much activity, and manufacturers show little disposition to anticipate their wants; nevertheless, there is a more cheerful feeling prevalent, and buyers are endeavouring more than of late to test prices, but manufacturers hold firmly to previous quotations. The only cases in which any weakness has been manifested is where stocks have begun to accumulate inconveniently. In such instances there have not been any transactions at actually lower prices, but if offers were made there is no doubt that rather lower rates would be accepted. The best prices are still obtained for shirtings and printers of good qualities, whilst long cloths, T cloths, and [illegible], not meeting with a demand at all proportionate to the present increased supply, are rather weaker. The last quotations were: 7/8 Grey Printers, from 8*s.* 9*d.* to 15*s.* 9*d.*, according to quality; 7/8 Grey Madapollams, 7*s.* 10½*d.* to 10*s.* 4½*d.*; 9/8 Grey Printers, 12*s.* 1½*d.* to 18*s.* 6*d.*; 9/8 Grey Shirtings, 15*s.* 3*d.* to 27*s.* 6*d.*; Water Twist, No. 20, 2*s.* 3*d.* to 2*s.* 10½*d.*; No. 30, 2*s.* 8*d.* to 3*s.* 2*d.*; No. 40, 3*s.* 1*d.* to 3*s.* 7*d.*; Mule Twist, No. 20, 1*s.* 11*d.* to 2*s.* 9*d.*; No. 30, 2*s.* 4*d.* to 2*s.* 11*d.*; No. 40, 2*s.* 6½*d.* to 3*s.* 4*d.*; No. 50, 2*s.* 11*d.* to 3*s.* 6*d.*; No. 60, 3*s.* to 3*s.* 8*d.*; No. 70, 3*s.* 2*d.* to 3*s.* 10*d.*; No. 80, 3*s.* 6*d.* to 4*s.*; No. 90, 3*s.* 8*d.* to 4*s.* 2*d.*; and No. 100, 3*s.* 11*d.* to 4*s.* 9*d.*

A NOTE FOR PROFESSOR GOLDWIN SMITH'S SCRAP-BOOK.—We commend the subjoined to the zealous though not very discreet champion of the Federal cause who compares Yankee humanity and morals through the columns of the Daily News. The military assassination of ten men by order of the Federal General M'Neil, in retaliation for the supposed murder of a man who afterwards turned up alive, must be fresh in the recollection of our readers. The execution of the victims was intrusted to Colonel William S. Strachan, as Provost-Marshal-General of Missouri. Subsequent revelations disclosed a fact in this horrible tragedy, which heightened, if possible, its infamous character. The particulars were briefly stated in our columns on October 15, 186[illegible], page 385, upon Federal testimony. Quite recently this Strachan was tried before a court-martial, and among the many charges of which he was guilty is the following:—'Charge Tenth. Prostituting his official power and position to the accomplishment of base and grossly immoral ends.—Specification: In this, that he, William R. Strachan, while acting as Provost-Marshal-General of the Northern District of Missouri, at his office, in the city of Palmyra, Missouri, on or about October 20, A.D. 1862, did demand of Mary S. Humphrey, a resident of Lewis County, Mo., who was then and there present for the transaction of official business with him, the said Strachan, that she, the said Mary S. Humphrey, should have sexual intercourse with him, the said Strachan, and threatening and declaring, in the presence of her, the said Mary S. Humphrey, that in case she then and there refused to submit her chastity to his lust, that he, the said William R. Strachan, by virtue of his power and authority as Provost-Marshal, would cause her husband, William T. Humphrey, who was then a prisoner in the custody and control of said Strachan, at Palmyra, Missouri, to be killed and sent home to her a corpse, thereby and by reason of such threats, and by the scandalous, false, and wrongful use of his powers as Provost-Marshal, overcoming the will of the said Mary S. Humphrey, and then and there having adulterous and carnal knowledge of her, the said Mary S. Humphrey. This at Palmyra, Missouri, in the month of October, 1862.' The court-martial declared that he was guilty of this horrible crime, as well as others, yet General Rosecrans disapproved of the sentence, and ordered his release in these words:—'Proceedings, finding, and sentence disapproved. The Commission having acquitted the accused of the second charge, could not substitute another of a different class. The testimony in this case does not establish any malfeasance of the accused in the discharge of his official duties, or warrant any of the findings against him; it is in evidence, however, that he discharged with great energy and efficiency the duties of his office, at a time when those duties were laborious, difficult, and ill-defined. To the General commanding, the whole case presents rather the aspect of an attempt, on the part of personal and disloyal enemies, to crush an efficient officer, than of a desire to bring the guilty to punishment. The accused will be honourably released from arrest, under the direction of the Provost-Marshal-General.—By command of Major General Rosecrans.—O. D. Greene, Assistant Adjutant-General.'

A PRUDENT FORECAST.—If after this war there remain but two North American nations there will still be a danger of their consenting to bury their animosities in the prosecution of ambitious purposes, which may be highly inconvenient to us, and may involve the whole world in the wars of the American continent. That this apprehension is not altogether chimerical has been shown by what has transpired of certain negotiations a few weeks since, at Niagara. The self-constituted diplomatists, who would have arranged terms of peace and separation between the American nations, discussed a programme, which was put forward, we trust, without any authority from their respective Governments. A frontier line was to be drawn between North and South, but measures were to be at once taken with the view of swelling the territory of each section to dimensions equal to those of the old Union. The plan was simple. The armies of North and South being united, a million of men were to march northward and conquer Canada for the North. The victorious army would then move southward, and annex Mexico to the dominion of the cotton planters. The programme was unscrupulous and wicked, but who shall say that it was not feasible? If we have misrepresented the views of these precious negotiators, we shall be glad to be corrected. There is too much reason to believe that such propositions were seriously debated between Messrs. Clay and Greeley. As we are ill prepared to make head against a million of men on the American lakes; and as even the Emperor Napoleon will recoil from the thought of having to defend his newly-crowned brother against such a horde, the ventilation of this nefarious plot can have but one result in England and France. It makes us desire the utter ruin of the North. We rejoice to hear that Mr. Lincoln is becoming every day more unpopular; that a committee of Congress has denounced him; that governors of States and mayors of cities openly controvert his authority; that powerful secret societies are agitating against him; that discord is growing up between the States, New England being at variance with New York, New York with Pennsylvania, Pennsylvania with Illinois. We trust that the principle of secession, having taken root, will bear seed and multiply. With a dozen jealous principalities on the English frontier, the loyal Canadians will have no cause to fear American aggression. Mexico will be safe, and Europe will not be dragged into war.—Morning Herald, 17th inst.

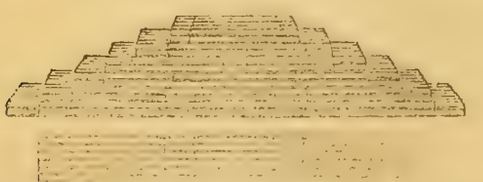
TERMS, CASH!

DUNCAN'S PATENT RATAN CANE SPLINTS.



THESE Splints are introduced and recommended to the Faculty for the great advantages which they possess above others,—viz., their comfort, coolness, and durability, as well as the facility with which they may be applied to the fractured limb.

As cleanliness is an important consideration, these Splints possess that quality pre-eminently, as they may be readily washed without the slightest fear of injury.

They are especially adapted to the constant usage of the General Hospital, and the movements of an Army on Service, as they cannot easily be injured. For Colonial practice they are recommended for the same reason.

They have been submitted to, and have received the approbation of, the Principal Medical Officers of the Army Medical Department.

The Splints cannot be injured by moisture; and are manufactured either with or without pads.

THERE are at this time many thousands of Confederate prisoners of war confined in the various forts and camps of the Northern States. A large proportion of them are wounded or sick, and all are in a state of destitution, the accounts of which, as given in private letters and in the newspapers, present a picture of human suffering, which has scarcely a parallel in modern times. The merest necessaries of life are wanting, and frequently the wounded prisoner has no raiment save that which is stark and stiffened with his clotted blood. Horrible as war is in all its features, assuredly it has no greater horrors than the long agony of the poor captive who, when the feverish excitement of the contest is over, is left to the bitter charity of strangers and foes, without one friendly hand to soothe the pains of body or friendly voice to whisper hope and comfort to his despairing mind. These men, cut off from the assistance of their kindred or the protection of their Government, have peculiar claims on the patriotism of their countrymen in Europe, and upon Christian benevolence everywhere. They did not recklessly or from choice embrace the profession of arms, but in exchanging the comforts, and often the luxuries, of home for the toils and hardships of a soldier's life, they obeyed a stern sense of duty and the call of their country in its extremest need. An unusual proportion, also, of those that fill the ranks of the Confederate armies belong to the higher walks of life, upon whom privations, such as are endured by prisoners in the hands of the North, fall with increased severity.

The Southern Prisoners' Relief Fund is intended to mitigate some of these sufferings which cannot altogether be relieved. Within little more than a twelvemonth, nearly £3,000 have been collected and expended in relief. The managers of the Fund are assisted in their efforts by self-devoted ladies in the principal Northern cities, who visit the sufferers and give them such aid as the means at their disposal render possible. Of late the Federal Government has granted permission that this Samaritan work may be done openly. It is earnestly hoped that all Southerners residing in Europe will support the Fund to the extent of their ability, and its objects may recommend themselves to all, irrespective of country or political convictions, who sympathise with the sufferings of their fellow-men.

Contributions will be received by J. H. ASHBRIDGE, Treasurer, Walmer Buildings, Water Street, Liverpool; or in London, by HENRY HOLTZ, Esq., 17 Savile Row, W.; in Paris, by H. O. BREWER, Esq., 6 Rue Circulaire; and DANIEL HUBBARD, Esq., 24 Rue Lord Byron.

ADDITIONAL REGULATIONS TO CARRY INTO EFFECT THE ACT ENTITLED AN ACT TO IMPOSE REGULATIONS UPON THE FOREIGN COMMERCE OF THE CONFEDERATE STATES, TO PROVIDE FOR THE PUBLIC DEFENCE, APPROVED FEBRUARY 6, 1864.

II. Overland Commerce with Mexico.

1. The owner of any wagon, cart or vehicle, or of any boat or other vessel, and of any horses, mules, or other animals employed in transporting cotton, tobacco or naval stores from the Confederacy to Mexico, shall, before receiving any article for transportation, require of the owner thereof the collector's permit for its exportation, as hereinafter set forth; and shall, before loading any article for transportation, present to the military commander of the department, or officer assigned by him to that duty, a declaration setting forth a full description of all the vehicles, vessels, and animals to be used by him, and their value in Confederate currency, and the names and value of the slaves, if any, employed as teamsters, or otherwise, in his business of transportation; and the names and such other particulars as may be required, of the free persons so employed, and the point of departure, the route to be pursued, and the place of destination; and the commander or other officer as aforesaid shall, if satisfied of the loyalty and fidelity of the applicant, and that the application may be safely granted, endorse thereon his consent and approval, and grant a license to the applicant as a public carrier of exports to Mexico for the single trip, or for any length of time, not exceeding one year, that may be deemed proper.

2. Any person desiring to export to Mexico, overland, any cotton, tobacco, or naval stores, shall, before placing the same on any wagon, cart, or other vehicle, or pack mule, or other animal, or on board any boat or vessel, present to the military commander of the department whence the merchandise is to be exported, or to the officer assigned by him as aforesaid, a declaration stating the quantity, and value in Confederate currency, of the articles he proposes to export, the name of the licensed carrier to be employed by him, the point of departure, the route to be pursued, the name of the consignee and the place of destination in the neutral country; and if the officer to whom the application is made shall be satisfied of the loyalty and fidelity of the applicant, and that the permission may be safely granted, he shall endorse on the application his approval.

3. The applicant shall, before loading the merchandise which he intends to export, file with the collector of the district, whence the exportation is to be made, his application endorsed as aforesaid, and shall execute and deliver to him a bond to the Confederate States, with security deemed adequate by the collector, in an amount double the value in Confederate money, of the merchandise embraced in his application, with condition that at least one-half the net proceeds of said merchandise at the place of destination shall be invested in goods and merchandise not prohibited by law, and that said goods and merchandise shall be brought into the Confederate States within sixty days after the delivery of the exported articles at their place of destination in Mexico; and the collector shall thereupon deliver to the applicant a permit to lead the articles embraced in said application.

4. No licensed carrier shall depart on the trip for which permits have been granted, until he shall have delivered to the collector of the customs a manifest verified by his oath, setting forth the names of all owners of the cotton or other articles which he is about to carry, and the quantity received from each owner, and shall have obtained from the collector a clearance authorising his departure.

5. The military commander of any department from which exports are conveyed to Mexico, shall establish, by general orders to be published by him, as many convenient points as may be necessary for the assemblage and departure of all vehicles or means of transportation [illegible] and detail officers for the [illegible] [illegible] in the letter and the spirit of the law which they are intended to enforce.

6. All [illegible] animals, slaves or other means of transportation, and all cotton or other articles that may be [illegible] in violation of any [illegible] regulations [illegible] conveyed and delivered to the nearest marshal or deputy marshal of the Confederate States, and a detailed receipt taken from him, setting forth a description of the property [illegible] delivered to him for safe custody. And it shall be the duty of said marshal or deputy marshal to keep the property so surrendered in safe custody until the further order of the judge or a commissioner of a district court of the Confederate States [illegible] and the said marshal or deputy marshal [illegible] of the property seized, [illegible] to the district attorney, or to both, if [illegible] in relation to the seizure of the property, and its delivery to him for safe keeping.

7. No military authority [illegible], under any circumstances, to seize property [illegible] carried under the provisions of the law, and of these regulations, for any other cause than a violation of said provisions, but in case of seizure, to dispose of the property seized in any other manner than that prescribed in the foregoing regulations. But in every where there is great risk of the property falling into the hands of the enemy, it shall be competent for the proper military authorities to require the licensed carrier to suspend his trip till the danger be passed, or to pursue a different route from that originally designated, or even, in cases of imminent danger, to abandon the trip.

8. The bonds to be taken under these regulations shall be subject to the provisions of the twelfth regulation relative to exportations by sea, and the bonds may be taken up on the production to the collector of satisfactory evidence that the party has complied with the conditions of the bond as far as practicable.

From this is to be deducted the amount of repayments of old currency by disbursing officers, and also the amount of notes received for four per cent. certificates, which are in the Treasury awaiting cancellation	$292,000,000 00

The balances of appropriations not drawn on April 1, 1864, were:

War Department	$502,329,110 21
Navy Department	33,046,775 79
Civil and miscellaneous, including customs	72,865,683 39
Total	$608,241,569 39

The estimates submitted by the various Departments for the support of the Government to the end of the calendar year, say December 31, 1864, are as follows:

Legislative	$245,625 00
Executive, salary of President, &c.	37,350 00
Treasury Department	22,508,462 50
War Department	483,131,598 00
Navy Department	10,059,923 78
State Department	44,914 00
Department of Justice	347,991 58
Post Office Department	165,583 40
Total	$516.541,448 26

The foregoing statements show that the estimates in December last for the six months ending July 1, 1864, are greatly beyond the requirements of the Government. It appears from them that the whole expenditure for all branches of the Government for the six months ending April 1, 1864, amounted to $255,563,722, and that the unexpended balance then standing to the credit of appropriations was $608,241,569. The anticipated tax upon the currency, which was to accrue on April 1, doubtless kept back requisitions for debts accruing since February 17, when the Tax Act was passed. It would be proper, therefore, to add, for this item, about $75,000,000 to the expenditure. The total expenditure for the six months would then be about $330,000,000, and the balance to the credit of undrawn appropriations would be about $523,000,000.

These figures establish the conclusion that the money appropriated for the six months ending July 1, 1864, will not be required, and that the excess may be applied to diminish the appropriations required for the six months ensuing July 1, 1864. It appears that the monthly expenditures, at the outside, average about $54,000,000, and consequently for the three months to ensue from April 1 to July 1, 1864, the proper expenditure of those three months would be $162,000,000

But to this must be added the item already explained of amount of debts suspended on account of the anticipated tax on the currency, say	75,000,000
This aggregate	$237,000,000
Deducted from the total balance of undrawn appropriations	608.241,569
Leaves this balance	$371,241,569 available for expenditures for six months beyond July 1, 1864.

It should further be observed that the estimates submitted by the Departments are made with relation to the present rate of prices. If that rate can be reduced, a corresponding reduction could be made in themselves.

The first and most important enquiry, therefore, is as to the probability of a reduction of prices. All the financial measures proposed to and adopted by the last Congress looked to this result. The scheme offered by the Secretary of the Treasury and that adopted by Congress both sought by different means to effect the same object. Which of the two would have proved most successful, it would serve no useful purpose to consider. It is the plain duty of the Government to execute the scheme adopted by Congress, and every effort has been directed to its successful prosecution. It is yet too early to perceive all the results which it will effect; but it is quite clear already that the reduction of the currency which it will produce is great and decided.

On April 1, when the reduction was to commence, the whole issue of general currency (represented by the treasury notes bearing no interest) amounted to about $800,000,000. Of this amount, $50,000,000 were probably at the credit of the different disbursing officers throughout the Confederacy, leaving $750,000,000 as the actual circulation. Of this amount, about $250,000,000 have been funded east of the Mississippi; and it may fairly be presumed that $50,000,000 more will be funded west of the Mississippi; thus leaving in circulation $450,000,000. The depositaries were directed to discriminate in their reports between the notes of $100 and those under $100 which have been funded. Only a few of them have made reports in which this direction has been complied with, most probably from want of time to separate notes. But those few are in the cities where the $100 notes would be likely to accumulate. They disclose the remarkable fact that less than one-half, in some cases not more than one-third, of the notes funded are $100 notes. It may be assumed, therefore, that not more than one-half of the whole amount funded consists of $100 notes. By the terms of the Currency Act, these notes are thrown out of circulation after April 1, and are taxed ten per cent. per month until extinguished. It is important, therefore, to ascertain the amount of those now outstanding.

The whole amount of $100 notes, issued to April 1, 1864, was $318,000,000. It is probable that of the $50,000,000 remaining at that date to the credit of disbursing officers, a large proportion is represented by these notes, say $40,000,000, thus leaving $278,000,000 in circulation. Deduct from this sum one-half the total amount funded, which as already stated consists of $100 notes, to wit $150,000,000, and there are left unfunded $128,000,000 of these notes. This sum, therefore, constitutes that remainder whose amount we have been seeking, and is to be deducted from the $450,000,000 left as the entire circulation after the funding. The result is that the whole currency would then stand at $322,000,000. Deduct from this balance the tax of one-third which is imposed by the Currency Act, and the actual currency left in circulation is $214,000,000 and a fraction.

It is only necessary for the public mind to apprehend fully this state of things, and it would seem impossible to avoid a great and sudden fall of prices. This fall has been checked by the unfortunate feature of leaving the $5 notes current. Sellers, particularly of necessary articles, have had the excuse of demanding an indemnity for the future tax on these notes; but the time is at hand when they will share the fate of other notes, and the entire old currency must disappear. Another reason, which has checked the reduction of prices of articles of prime necessity, is the exoneration of the planting and farming classes from taxes. They have thereby been enabled to retain their products. But when the whole scheme of Congress shall go into full operation, say July 1, the reduction of currency will be so great that it is scarcely possible that prices can be maintained at existing rates.

The conclusion, then, seems fair, that if the currency can be restrained within the limits to which it has been reduced, the estimates called for by the Departments may be greatly reduced. This result will depend upon the extent to which the new issue of treasury notes is carried. The law directs the issue of $2 of new notes for every $3 held in private hands, with the exception of $100 notes and notes under $5. It also authorises the Secretary of the Treasury to issue in the same manner $2 for every $3 received at the Treasury under the provisions of the Currency Act. Assuming the figures above stated as probable estimates of the result of funding, the amount of new currency to be issued for exchanges with private parties will be $214,000,000; and the issues authorised to be made for the use of the Government would amount to two-thirds of $300,000,000, or $200,000,000. The aggregate of these two would carry up the currency again to $414,000,000. This amount is more than twice the sum which in previous reports I have shown to be requisite for the entire circulation. With such an expansion prices could not be expected to fall to the proper standard, and the conclusion seems inevitable, that one or other of these sources of expansion must be restrained. The Currency Act has distinctly guaranteed to the holders of currency the right to receive new issues upon the abatement of one-third from the old, and this right cannot justly be impaired. It should only be dealt with, therefore, by offering to the holders of these notes a security which they might prefer to the new issues. Possibly, this might be done by giving them an option to exchange their notes for four per cent. bonds free from taxation. This freedom from taxation would be an equivalent for the reduction of one-third, to which their notes had been subjected, and if this plan were accepted, equality between these holders and those who had already funded their notes in four per cents. might be restored, by granting them the privilege of exchanging their four per cent. taxable bonds for untaxable, at a reduction of one-third. The compensation to the Treasury would be found in the amount which would thereby be paid in money, instead of four per cent. bonds, for the taxes of the present year.

This arrangement, however, with individuals, if left as it should be, to their choice, would be beyond the control of the Government, The other source of issue, namely, that by the Government, is the one which is under its complete control. It is the restraint of this alone which will enable it to prevent a new redundancy of circulating medium. It therefore becomes an enquiry of vital importance, to ascertain how far this restraint can be carried. Obviously, it depends upon the extent and availability of the other means furnished by Congress for supplying the demands of the Government.

The means which have been already provided by Congress (over and above the issue of new treasury notes) are three, namely, the sale of $500,000,000 of six per cent. bonds, certificates of indebtedness, and taxes.

1. The six per cent. bonds authorised by Congress offer so desirable a security, that it may reasonably be expected that they will be taken up to the full extent of the available capital of the country. The mechanical arrangements required for the issue of bonds with so many coupons will delay their issue until the month of May. In the meantime, to support the Government during the month of April, and to pay off the accumulation of public indebtedness, which arose from the indisposition to accept payments in old currency, since the passage of the Currency Act, it became necessary to exercise the authority to issue new treasury notes. At the date of this report, $38,000,000 have been issued, and $10,000,000 in $500 notes are prepared for issue, and this issue must be continued until the bonds can be sold. They have already been advertised, and will be offered for sale early in May, and it is hoped that the proceeds of their sale will supply means for supporting the Government, without resorting to the authority to issue treasury notes.

2. The next means of supply provided by Congress is through certificates of indebtedness. These certificates offer another desirable security, and would seem to be peculiarly available for making purchases. They are payable in specie two years after peace, and bear six per cent. interest. It is of the utmost importance that the various purchasing officers of the Government should use these certificates, instead of calling upon the Treasury for new issues of notes. It is so much easier, however, for both buyer and seller to deal in notes, that the temptation to call for them is invincible, and can only be restrained by an absolute refusal to furnish them. The experience of this Department has shown that an authority given to it to issue treasury notes as an alternative of bonds, results in compelling it to furnish the notes, whatever may be its own opinion as to the inexpediency of the issue. It is in this way that the late redundancy of the currency was produced. As far back as May, 1861, when the first issue of bonds and treasury notes jointly was authorised, the Secretary used every effort in his power to induce the various purchasing officers to make use of bonds instead of treasury notes. This effort was continued, under the Act of August 1861, and he even ventured upon the compulsory method of holding back his warrants on requisitions, unless bonds would be accepted instead of treasury notes. The pressure, however, for the notes became so great that he was unable to resist it. In these circumstances, he distinctly represented to Congress the evils which must follow the expansion thus produced, and, during the session of September 1862, urged upon them to take immediate measures to absorb the redundant currency. Embarrassed, as Congress then was, with supposed constitutional difficulties in the way of levying a tax, a large forced loan was the only alternative which could be offered. This alternative was rejected; and it was not until April 24, 1863, that a tax adequate to the wants of the country could be imposed, and this tax was so complex and intricate that its collection could not be fairly set in action until the following October. The only tax laid before this was the war tax of August 1861, of one-half of one per cent. on property; and small as this was, all the States except three intervened, and paid the amount due by their respective citizens by the issue of their own securities. Even under this pressure, the Government succeeded in effecting a foreign loan of $15,000,000, at a time when the Northern Government, with all its resources, and with a commerce open to the whole world, was unable to effect one. If the Treasury Department had been permitted to apply this money to the support of the currency, its excessive issue and consequent depreciation would have been postponed, if not prevented. But the pressing demands of the Government for munitions of war, and for expenditures abroad for the army and navy, consumed the entire proceeds of the loan. An effort was then made to combine the credit of the individual States with that of the Government, with a view to procure further means to call in the circulation. That effort failed to receive the support of some of the States, and before that support could be propitiated by further efforts, military reverses put an end to all hope of present relief from foreign loans. In the meantime, many of the States entered upon the same field of credit, issued large amounts of bonds and treasury notes, and the result was that expansion which has just been remedied, and which ought not to be permitted to recur.

The financial measures adopted at the last session of Congress have given the country a new starting-point. The currency is once more brought within bounds, and it is most earnestly urged upon Congress so to fence around those bounds that they cannot be passed. This can only be done by a careful revision of every appropriation, and by admitting only such as are absolutely necessary, by a steady refusal to increase the volume of the currency, and by providing sufficient other means to meet the appropriations which shall be made.

3. This brings us to the consideration of the remaining means of supply which have been provided by Congress, namely, taxes. This source of supply is, in fact, the foundation of all the others; without it they cannot be sustained. Two kinds of taxes have been provided, those in money and those in kind. The money taxes to be paid during the current year have been devoted by Congress almost entirely to the support of the currency. The tax-payers are allowed to pay their taxes with the four per cent. bonds and certificates, in which the currency has been funded. It is presumed that every taxable party has supplied himself with bonds to the estimated amount of his tax; and if there be cases of deficient provision, doubtless they will be supplied from surplus amounts funded by others, and offered for sale in the market. It is probable, therefore, that no material aid will be derived by the Treasury during the present year from any taxes but those in kind.

This seems to be an unfortunate feature in the Tax Act. Payment into the Treasury of treasury notes is a necessary instrument to their proper circulation. Without the aid of such an instrument, the currency of the notes depends entirely upon consent. They are deprived of one of the essential elements of value, namely: general demand. The new notes, not being required to pay taxes until next January, lose this valuable incident during all that interval, and must obtain currency entirely from the good will of the community. Another equally serious difficulty arises from the same cause. The planting interest, whenever it is beyond the reach of the enemy, is prosperous, and can contribute to the public wants as largely as any other. The tax law requires from it a tax in kind of 10 per cent. on its annual produce, and of 5 per cent. on capital; but it allows the tax on the produce to be set off against the tax in money, and it insures the extinguishment of the money tax by valuing the produce at its present price, while the capital is valued at prices of 1861. It follows that the planters are relieved from any necessity to provide themselves with treasury notes, and may withhold from the market their produce at pleasure. It follows also that the prosperous are favoured with a discount, while the unfortunate, whose farms have been desolated, are required to pay upon the value of their capital without any relief from crops. It would seem more just to reverse such a rule, and to require a larger contribution from those whose property has been protected at the expense of the others.

Proceeding on the same general grounds, the Tax Act further exonerates from the income tax of the present year all property upon which a capital tax shall be paid; but it makes no such discrimination in assessing the capital as is made in favour of agricultural property. All property and income, not agricultural, is assessed at present rates. In another connection, I will invite your attention to the injustice of these inequalities. My object now is to induce a reconsideration of this portion of the Tax Act.

It has already been shown [that, as the Act now stands, no pecuniary aid is afforded to the Treasury during the present year, and that, unless sufficient supplies shall be derived from sales of bonds and from certificates of indebtedness, there will be nothing left but a resort to new issues of treasury notes. It is therefore of the utmost importance to call into requisition every possible means of preventing such a calamity. The taxes offer the most appropriate and efficient means, and can be made to contribute largely by simply repealing so much of the Tax Act as allows income taxes, whether in kind or in money, to exonerate from the tax on capital. The tax of 10 per cent. on the planter's income leaves him an abundant surplus for his support, and, if justly considered, is greatly less than the tax which other interests are required to pay on capital. Let the two be compared, and this will at once be manifest. As a general rule, the interest of money represents the usual income of capital. A tax of 10 per cent., then, on the income of $100 would amount to 60 cents, while a tax of 5 per cent. on the capital would be $5. It will be said, however, that the tax in kind, being upon gross products, must be rated at more than the nett income or interest on other property. Let this be admitted, and assume that the tax on gross income is double the amount of a tax on nett, and we still have the inequality of $5 against $1 20 cents. But when to this inequality is added that produced by assessment, at the two rates already explained, the inequality amounts to injustice. The proper remedy for the whole is to be found in an equal tax upon all capital and upon all income at the same basis of assessment. The present system of taxation is so cumbrous and intricate, that delay and disappointment will be its inevitable results; and whenever another tax bill is framed, I would renew my former recommendation, and urge that it be a simple tax upon property and incomes. At present I will limit my recommendation to the repeal of the following provisions of the last Act:—

1. That which allows the value of the tax in kind to be deducted from the tax of 5 per cent. on agricultural property.

2. That which repeals the income tax for the present year on incomes derived from property taxed as capital.

3. That which discriminates as to the date to which assessments are to have reference.

The taxes in kind, levied by the last Tax Act, appeared to me to embrace (and with much propriety) another subject-matter, namely: gold and silver in the form of coin, gold dust, or bullion. Some embarrassment in reaching this conclusion was experienced from apparently conflicting provisions of the Tax and Assessment Acts. The latter directed coin to be assessed at its value in Confederate treasury notes, unless otherwise provided in the law imposing the tax. The former Act placed in one and the same class, coin, gold dust, and bullion, and imposed a tax of 5 per cent. upon the 'amount.' The word 'amount' as to coin was susceptible of two meanings, namely, the sum stamped thereon, and the actual quantity of metal. The other members of the class were free from this ambiguity and could only be rated by quantity. It seemed to follow that the same meaning must attach to all the members of the same class. This conclusion was strengthened by the direction to rate sterling exchange (which is usually treated as a correlative of coin) at its value in treasury notes, and by the further direction, already noticed in the Assessment Act, to assess coin in the same way. It was obvious that the holder of coin would suffer no injury by contributing such portion of his coin in kind, as under any circumstances he was bound to furnish sufficient treasury notes to purchase. It was thought probable that the tax in coin was intended by Congress to relieve the Government from the obnoxious duty of depreciating its own currency. The tax levied in this form is also more beneficial, as it will secure to the Government a portion of those large amounts of coin which have fled from the plundering hand of the enemy and have found its protection; and further as it will enable the Government to meet such demands for coin as occasionally arise.

There is another portion of the Tax Act to which I would respectfully direct the attention of Congress. A tax is imposed upon the capital stocks of all banks and other corporations, and another is laid upon all solvent credits.

The effect of these two enactments is to tax the capital of any corporation as stock, and then again to tax the securities in which the capital is invested. Banks of issue would be taxed even beyond this. Their issues, like their capital, are invested in securities. If these issues should be extended to twice the capital (as many of them are permitted by their charters to do), the bank would have to pay a tax of 5 per cent. on its capital, and then of 5 per cent. more on the total amount of credits in which its issues have been invested, amounting together to 15 per cent. on its capital. This result is so manifestly unjust that I concluded that Congress could not have intended it. It probably was supposed that banks came under the exception in favour of any registered business. But this exception does not include banks of issue. I have, therefore, directed the assessors to make assessments in such form as will enable Congress to remedy the difficulty before the tax becomes payable. Several of the banks have applied for relief, and I respectfully commend to your attention a memorial which they have presented to this department, a copy of which is herewith submitted.

Another embarrassment in administering the Tax Act has been encountered in that portion which directs the tax in kind of farmers to be deducted from the tax of 5 per cent. on their capital. If the deduction intended was of the tax in kind of last year, then the planting interest will be entirely relieved from the taxes of last year whilst all other interests have duly contributed. If the reference is to the tax in kind of the current year, then, as the money tax is payable in June, and the tax in kind cannot be realised until later in the year, it is impossible to deduct the latter from the former. Some explanatory Act is respectfully asked.

I cannot leave this subject without specially invoking your attention to the inequality made by the Tax Bill in the assessment of agricultural and other property. While the latter is assessed at its value in treasury notes, which are acknowledged to be depreciated at least to one-third their face, the former is assessed at values which prevailed when treasury notes were nearly at par with specie. This inequality creates discontent in the public mind, and cannot be maintained as just and equal. In all public as well as private transactions it is dangerous to depart from the great principles of justice with a view to effect present expediency. Doubtless it was supposed that legislation of this kind would reach the speculator and extortioner. But it will be found that most of these classes have escaped the tax by taking refuge in agricultural investments, while thousands of widows and orphans and loyal citizens, who have invested their all in stocks and securities, are deprived of their means of support. I would respectfully recommend a revision of this section, and the establishment of a uniform rate of assessment.

The report of the Commissioner of Taxes will present the results of the collection of taxes, as far as progress has been made. The amount collected is $82,262,349 83. The difficulties which are encountered in the collection can only be estimated by any one who will inspect the mass of papers which are required for each return, and the enquiries necessary to be made of each individual tax-payer. The results of the tax will probably confirm the recommendation already made of a resort to a more simple system of taxation. The frauds and evasions, which cannot be discovered under the present system, are a perpetual drain upon the tax, which is necessarily increased by the number of officers who must be employed in its collection. And after all is done by the Government which is possible, the result is, that the most cunning in devices will escape, whilst only the honest and conscientious pay the full and just demands of the law.

In the process of collection, various amendments to the law have been found necessary, which will be brought to your attention in the report of the Commissioner of Taxes, to which I respectfully invite your attention.

The Act imposing restrictions on the export of cotton, tobacco, and naval stores, and that prohibiting the importation of articles of luxury, have received the attention which they demanded. Under the first Act certain regulations, issued by the President, of which a copy is herewith submitted, will fully exhibit what has been done; and under the second this department has executed the duty imposed upon it as to the limitation within which importations shall be made of articles to be used for wearing apparel. A copy of the instructions issued to the collectors of customs on this subject is herewith submitted.

The customary estimates in detail are hereunto appended.

Respectfully submitted,

C. G. MEMMINGER,
Secretary of Treasury.

GRANT'S CAMPAIGN.—The New York correspondent of the Morning Herald, who is a very able and exceedingly well-informed writer, says:—'The campaign, since the crossing of the Rapidan by Grant in May, has been one pitiless slaughter. The Federal lieutenant-general has earned for himself the title of the Suwarrow of America. He has not managed to win the affections of his army, and has been so careless and lavish of the lives of his men that he is now distinguished, both in and out of the ranks of his soldiers, by the sobriquet of "the Illinois butcher." The number of men in the unfortunate army of the Potomac killed, wounded, and captured, since its crossing of the Rapidan, is not less than 125,000, of which nearly one-fourth have been killed outright. Grant's manner of conducting a campaign is, to use a mild term, very curious, and well worthy a description. Owing to the enormous size of the Northern army, and the frightful character, in a military point of view, of the country in which it has been compelled to operate, it has been impossible for the Federal commander-in-chief to know anything about the position of the enemy or the relation of our troops to his principal works. Hence that knowledge of a foe's strength, whereabouts, and fortifications which in more cultivated countries and by more able generals is obtained by the employment of strategy, was gained here only through a tremendous loss of life. As soon as Grant had executed one of his famous flank movements, ever to discover in his front somewhere that mysterious, inevitable, but indomitable enemy, he would send word to his corps commanders in front to "feel the enemy's works." This simple matter never cost less than 1,000 men. After the "feeling" operation had been concluded, the next order would be "Press the enemy's works." This movement would dispose of 3,000 or 4,000 more. Then came the last order, more terrible than all its predecessors, "Storm the enemy's works!" And the storming operation never came to an end without an additional Federal loss of 17,000 or 18,000 men. It was simple butchery. There was no attempt at a display of tactical science; indeed, such would be almost useless with that vast army and in the terrible woods and ravines in which it was always compelled to fight. This fearful mode of warfare was continued for more than a month, until the men under Grant became, as was inevitable, utterly disheartened and demoralised.'

THE YANKEE SLAVE TRADE.—The special commissioner of the Daily Telegraph, under date 'Niagara Falls, August 2,' writes:—'Of all the wicked and impudent delusions which the advocates of the North are trying to propagate in Europe, there is none more wicked and more insolent than the one by which it is sought to persuade the European public that this civil war is in any way carried on for the benefit or will result in the amelioration of the condition of the African. The radical abolitionists—the "soul saviours" of New England—are now buying up negroes right and left in the Southern States, and cramming them into the Federal armies. There was a Southern senator once from Georgia, called Toombs, who boasted that he would one day read the muster-roll of his slaves from the foot of Bunker-hill monument; but the Governor of Massachusetts will very soon be able to read a similar roll of the negroes his agents have bought in North Carolina, or "run off," i.e., stolen, in Kentucky. There was picked up the other day at the Fifth-avenue Hotel, in New York, a telegram addressed to an influential gentleman in that city, in which the sender expressed his regret that he was run out of niggers, but wished to know if his correspondent would buy a few hundreds Indian half-breeds. Would Mrs. Harriet Beecher Stowe be good enough to add these little facts to her next edition of "Uncle Tom's Cabin?"'

THE EXHAUSTION OF THE WAR.—The New York World says:—'It is evident that if we continue the horrible work of self-destruction at the rate of the past three years, a very few months will suffice to exhaust our entire arms-bearing male population.'

Notes on Events of the Week.

AMERICA.

On the 1st of August the Federal fleet off Mobile, under Admiral Farragut, commenced an attack on the Confederate defences, and succeeded in passing the outer forts, but not without resistance. The letter of our New Orleans Correspondent, dated the 2nd, gives some details that enable the reader to understand the subsequent movements as reported from Washington. On the 5th the Federal fleet passed the outer batteries. The Tecumseh, a monitor armed with two guns, was sunk by Fort Morgan. We have at present no report of the casualties suffered by the Federals, or of the damage done to other vessels; but as the engagement is described as desperate, we may conclude that the sinking of the Tecumseh was not the only loss sustained by them. The Confederate ram Tennessee, after a gallant contest, surrendered, and we regret to add that Admiral Buchanan lost a leg and was among the prisoners. The Selma was captured, and the Gaines was beached. General Maury reports that the Morgan is safe.

This naval success of the Federals does not endanger Mobile, which cannot be taken without the cooperation of a large land force. Nor is the position of Admiral Farragut very secure. The following, which has been already published, gives an accurate view of the situation:—

Forts Morgan and Gaines are situated about 33 miles from the city of Mobile, and command from opposite sides the entrance to the bay of the same name. This entrance is about 24 miles wide. Fort Powell commands another entrance, or rather narrow artificial pass—called Grant's Pass—into the same bay from the Mississippi Sound. The true harbour of Mobile—locally called the Anchorage—is a few miles above these forts, under the lee of Dauphin Island, and about 25 miles from Mobile. Only vessels of small draught can come to the wharves of the city, which is approached by a narrow and tortuous channel, averaging 9 feet of water, never exceeding 11. The most difficult portion of this channel is at a point called Choctau Pass, about 5 miles distant from the city. It is not believed that the city is in any danger of capture from a naval attack. A successful land attack would require at least 15,000 men, and the approaches in that case would not be from Dauphin Island but from Paseagoula. The object of Admiral Farragut's operations is therefore, probably, first to destroy the Confederate fleet in the bay; and, secondly, to more effectually close a port which, from its large cotton exportations, had recently become of considerable importance to blockade-runners. These objects attained, the situation will not be very dissimilar to that at Charleston, except that the distance between the outer and inner lines of harbour defences is greater.

The Correspondent of the New York Herald says the movement was not designed for the capture of the city, but to insure a more effectual blockade of the harbour.

After again terrifying the people of Pennsylvania the Confederates have retired from the North, though it is by no means certain that their entire force has recrossed the Potomac. It is hardly necessary for us to add that under these circumstances the Federal General Averill claims a victory. Having retreated with hot haste at the advance of the Confederates, and leaving the country entirely at their mercy, Averill mustered courage to follow the Confederates, but at a most respectful distance, when they retired laden with booty. But Averill says, or his friends say for him, that he came up with the Confederates and defeated them, capturing 500 prisoners and four guns. This is, of course, untrue, but it is probable that Averill's command encountered a small detachment of the enemy. The semi-official Washington account of the affair would do credit to the comic powers of Mr. Lincoln. We are told 'General Averill pursued the scattered remnant of the rebel force for twenty-four miles, capturing many of the fugitives. His entire loss in killed was seven men. The pursuit was only abandoned when General Averill's heroes were too exhausted to follow the rebels into the mountains.' We can only say General Averill's heroes are very easily exhausted.

On August 5 the Confederates had a skirmish with a part of the Federal line before Petersburg. It is said that a mine was sprung by the Confederates, and that the object of it was to damage a mine which they suspected was being dug in front of the 18th Federal Corps. The firing lasted for two hours. The imagination of the Northern correspondents magnifies this skirmish into 'an assault by the enemy, which was repulsed with great slaughter.'

The Federal associated press says that the regiment blown up by the explosion of the mine in front of Petersburg was the First North Carolina Regiment, formerly of Jenkins's brigade. At the time of the explosion 250 men were in the fort.

General Grant has visited Washington and Maryland. General Sheridan has superseded General Hunter, his command embracing the department of Washington, the Susquehanna, Maryland, and Western Virginia. General Hooker is said to have the immediate command of all the forces at Washington.

The following official despatches have been published respecting the recent operations before Atlanta and the defeat of General Stoneman:—

Hon. J. A. Seddon.

The enemy commenced extending his right about eight o'clock this morning. Lieutenant-Generals Stewart and Lee were directed to hold the Lick Skillett road for the day with portions of their commands. About half-past 1 P.M. a sharp engagement ensued, with no decided advantage on either side. We still occupy the Lick Skillet road.

I regret to say that Lieutenant-General Stewart and Major-General Loring were wounded.

In my despatch of yesterday I should have mentioned that Brigadier-General Rector was wounded that day.

J. B. Hood, General.

Atlanta, August 1, 1864.

Hon. J. A. Seddon.

The following despatch is just received from Brigadier-General Iverson, through Major-General Cobb, at Macon, concerning the party of raiders who struck the Macon and Savannah road:—

'General Stoneman, after having his force routed yesterday, surrendered with 500 men. The rest of his command are scattered and flying towards Eatonton. Many have been already captured. I shall be in Macon to-night, and with rations for my men and prisoners. A. Iverson.

J. B. Hood, General.

Official despatch from General Howell Cobb.

Macon, Georgia, August 1, 1864.

S. Cooper, Adjutant and Inspector-General.

General Stoneman, with a cavalry force estimated at 2,800, with artillery, was met two miles from the city by our forces, composed of Georgia reserves—local companies—and the militia which Governor Brown is organising here. The enemy's assault was repulsed, and his force held in check along our entire line all day. Retiring towards Clinton, he was attacked the next morning by General Iverson, who, having routed the main body, captured General Stoneman and 500 of his command. General Iverson's men are still capturing stragglers.

Howell Cobb, Major-General.

A despatch, dated Macon, August 2, says:—'The militia who are pouring in, are being sent rapidly to Atlanta.'

The detailed accounts of the battle before Atlanta on July 28 describe the contest as very severe, and the losses as being very heavy on both sides. The Federals, though at first claiming a victory, now admit that it was a drawn battle. The correspondent of the New York Times with Sherman's army writes on August 1 that the Confederate fortifications are so extensive and strong that there is not the least chance of carrying them by assault.

The New York Herald and Times assert that Mr. Stanton has resigned, and that Mr. Lincoln has accepted his resignation.

August 13 was the 400th day of the siege of Charleston. On the 12th eleven shells were sent into the city, and a negro boy was wounded, this being the first casualty for several days. On the 13th there was a suspension of hostilities for the exchange of prisoners. We elsewhere give the names of the Confederate officers who were exchanged.

The Hon. George A. Trenholm has been appointed Confederate Secretary of the Treasury in the place of the Hon. C. G. Memminger, who has resigned. Mr. Trenholm is a native of Charleston, and the senior partner of the firm of John Fraser & Co. of that city. Messrs. Fraser & Co., in connection with the Liverpool branch (Messrs. Fraser, Trenholm, & Co.), have been extensively engaged in blockade-running since the beginning of the war. The Montgomery Advertiser says: 'Mr. Trenholm's firm has been, and is, engaged more largely than any other in blockade-running, and by a judicious selection of the cargoes, importing only such stores as would be useful to the Government, he has greatly aided us in carrying on the war, and especially has he contributed no little to the defence of Charleston.'

The New York World takes a gloomy view of the Federal military situation. Grant, it says, after his fearful losses, 'lies to-day foiled and panting before the unbroken front of Beauregard, at Petersburg.' In no other part of Virginia has the North made any progress for the last two years. 'The heart of the Old Dominion beats fierce and defiant beyond our reach, and armies such as no man three years ago believed the whole South could so much as equip with scythes and shot-guns, stand embattled from the James to the Blue Ridge, where, for three years, they have stood in all the panoply of modern and efficient war.' In North Carolina the foothold won in the first year of the war has been lost. The same thing has happened in Florida. 'In South Carolina and in Georgia, we hold a few paltry islands, won by a gallant naval coup-de-main three years ago; while our sailors and our soldiers are beating their proud hearts out in vain upon the impregnable bulwark of Charleston, after a year of steady and fruitless bombardment, and the loss of thousands of gallant lives.' The magnificent resources of Texas are wholly within the control of the Confederates. In the fourth year of the war the Confederates make Maryland their highway to insult Washington. New Orleans is only retained by the aid of the fleet. The blockade has not prevented Southern cotton reaching the European markets. The Mississippi is closed to commerce. In Missouri and Kentucky 'the very bonds of society are broken up.' The World adds: 'These are bitter facts; and the recital of them is a bitter duty to be forced upon us after all these years of patience and endurance and magnanimous effort. But facts they are, and this it is that Varus has done with the legions of the republic!'

General Buell, who succeeded Generals Grant and Sherman in the command of the Federal Army of the West, addressed a letter, dated July 10, to a friend, in which he sets forth the reasons for the resignation of his commission in the army. He recites the attempts made to degrade him by placing him under his juniors in the service, and adds: 'The impulses of most men would approve my course in this matter, if it even rested on no other ground than a determination not to acquiesce in any measure that would degrade me; but I had a higher motive than that. I believed that the policy and means with which the war was being prosecuted were discreditable to the nation, and a stain upon civilisation; and that they would not only fail to restore the Union, if, indeed, they had not already rendered its restoration impossible, but that their tendency was to subvert the institutions under which the country had realised unexampled prosperity and happiness; and to such a work I could not lend my hand.'

In the matter of General Dix and his officers, charged with violating the law in seizing the offices of the World and Journal of Commerce newspapers, Judge Russell has decided that the case is to go before the Grand Jury. Judge Russell thus commented on the Act of Indemnity passed by the Federal Congress on March 4, 1863, and which he regards as constitutional, and therefore not binding. He said: 'The defendants, through their counsel, placed themselves under the protection of section 4 of the Act of Congress March 4, 1863, entitled, "An Act relating to habeas corpus, and regulating judicial proceedings in certain cases." If that provision is constitutional, it assimilates the President of the United States, during the existence of the present rebellion, to an absolute monarch, clothes him with all the imaginary perfection of that monarch, and makes him incapable of doing any wrong. This is a very novel and startling doctrine to advance under a Republican form of Government. . . . . If the Act of Congress in question is constitutional in the particular contended for by the defence, it does look as though it imparted to the President powers raising him above the instrument which creates his office, and giving him the right, in his discretion, to obey that instrument or not. . . . . In this State the civil power is, and has always been, in the ascendant. Our citizens are supposed to enjoy the blessings of the Federal Constitution, and repose under the benign operations of their own immediate legislation. . . . . If the President can direct anything to be done in this State that he pleases, and his order is a perfect shield to those who obey his commands, he becomes a despot, and is no longer the chief magistrate of a free people.

The Yankees, not content with doing a brisk trade in negro slaves, are doing a little business in white slaves. We noticed last week that General Sherman sent 400 women out of Georgia, because they were engaged in a factory in which clothing was made for the Confederate army. The Louisville papers announce that 249 of these unfortunates had reached that city, and that at Nashville there were 1,500 banished women and children in a destitute condition. The same papers say that when the women arrived at Louisville they were advertised to be hired as servants, 'to take the place of the large number of negroes who have been liberated by the military authorities, and are now gathered in large camps throughout Kentucky, where they are fed and supported in idleness and viciousness at the expense of the loyal taxpayers.' The following notice was published by authority:—'Notice.—Families residing in the city or country, wishing seamstresses or servants, can be suited by applying at the refugee quarters, on Broadway, between Ninth and Tenth. This is sanctioned by Captain Jones, Provost-Marshal.' Commenting on these facts, the Boston Courier says: 'Thus, while the negro women are rioting and luxuriating in the Federal camps on the bounty of the Government, the white women and children of the South are arrested at their homes and sent off as prisoners to a distant country, to be sold in bondage.'

On July 18, General Hunter issued an order directing the Commanding Officer at Frederic, Maryland, 'to arrest at once all persons who are supposed to be "disloyal" and to send them, with their families, to Harper's Ferry, under suitable guard, that the males may be sent to the military prison at Wheeling, West Virginia, and their families beyond our lines, South. You will seize their houses, to be used for hospitals, Government offices, and storehouses, and for Government purposes generally. Their furniture you will have sold at public auction for the benefit of Union citizens of the town who are known to have suffered loss of property from information given by these persons.' This order was a little too outspoken, and it was revoked by Mr. Lincoln. It is, however, a fair indication of the spirit in which the Federal generals wage war not only in the South, but even in a State which they say is loyal.

Judge Duvall, of the Appellate Court, Kentucky, was recently a candidate for a State office in Kentucky. As he was a Democrat, the following order was issued by Mr. Lincoln's General:—

Headquarters District of Kentucky,
First Division, Twenty-seventh Army Corps,
Lexington, Kentucky, July 29, 1864.

To the Sheriff of Kenton County, Independence, Kentucky.—You will not allow the name of Alvin Duvall to appear upon the poll-books as a candidate for office at the coming election.

By order of Major-General Burbridge.
J. Bates Dickson, Captain and A. A. G.

This arbitrary proceeding did not completely succeed. Although the people could not vote for Mr. Duvall, they elected a Democrat in preference to Mr. Lincoln's candidate.

According to the report of the Federal Secretary of War, the number of negro troops in the United States service, on October 31, 1863, was 38,707. The New York World says that the number does not exceed 50,000 at the present time. As the demand is active for negro recruits, and as the negroes fetch a high price, we dare say the number will be speedily increased.

The Northern press discusses at length the reported movement of the 'Order of American Knights' to form a North-western Confederacy. The Democrats declare the conspiracy is a mare's nest, a kind of meal-tub plot invented by the Administration, in order to justify harsh proceedings against Democratic leaders. It is not, however, denied that there is widespread discontent in the West.

Governor Seymour wrote on August 3 to Mr. Stanton complaining of the excessive and injurious quotas assigned to New York under the late call. The average demand made upon the Congressional districts of New York and Brooklyn is 3,867 men each, while in Massachusetts the average is 2,167 men. 'While in these cities (New York and Brooklyn) 26 per cent. of the population is enrolled, in Boston only 12½ per cent., or less than one-half that ratio, are made liable to be drafted. There is no difference in the character of the population of the States to account for these differences.'

The fast day on the 4th was, according to the reports of the Northern press, observed as a day of pleasure. The New York World remarks that the excursions were numerous, and that the churches were nearly empty, and thinks that the people are tired of hearing ministers preach war sermons. The New York Herald of the 5th says: 'Yesterday was a very fast day. The people celebrated it by excursions on fast steamers and drives behind fast horses. But there was very little fasting, except among those too poor to eat; and very little praying, except in the churches, where the parsons are paid so much a year for that business.'

A Peace Convention lately met at Peoria, Illinois, which, after passing resolutions against the continuance of the war, adjourned to meet at Springfield on the 18th inst. A letter was read from the Hon. T. H. Seymour, in which he says: 'An armistice would be worth more to the entire country than a thousand battle-fields. This I take to be the splendid mission of the Democracy at the present time, to secure an armistice and make peace! If this is not its mission, then I have mistaken the character of the Democracy, and you may strike my name from the roll. The first step, I repeat, of a triumph in the right direction should be to stop the war. Pardon me for saying, if we blink this question, everything else for which we are contending must come to the ground. Once ended, and peace may be secured on honourable terms. If prolonged, untold calamities must befall us.'

The New York World charged the Federal Government with a regular system of post-office espionage, and stated that the letters of prominent Democrats were regularly opened, and that even the official correspondence of Governor Seymour was tampered with. Mr. Blair has written to the New York Postmaster, and says: 'We do not, as you know, permit any tampering with the mails now more than at any period.' This is equivalent to an admission that there is some tampering with the mails. The World, in reply to this letter, reiterates its charges, and says that Postmaster Blair has, at all events, submitted to Mr. Seward and Mr. Stanton having letters opened at the post-office.

The Springfield Republican of August 9 reports: 'Mr. Fessenden says he does not intend to hold the Secretaryship of the Treasury as a permanency; but, as soon as he can do it with safety, he shall resign, as his health is not adequate to the engrossing duties of the office.'

On the 10th instant gold was quoted in New York at 254½.

ENGLAND.

One useful measure received the royal assent last session. The statute was entitled an 'Act to amend the Penal Servitude Acts.' In transmitting this statute to the judges Sir George Grey took occasion to explain the manner in which convicts under sentence of penal servitude will be treated for the future. The circular containing this information is well worthy the attention of the public. We hope that the line of conduct which it traces out will be steadily and firmly pursued. It was quite time that something should be done. Transportation, for many reasons an objectionable mode of punishment, has for some years past virtually ceased, there being no place to which convicts can now be sent to undergo their sentence. We are glad that Government seem to have yielded in this matter to the wishes of the Australian colonies. Western Australia could receive at the very most a fourth part only of the criminals annually sentenced in England, and she stipulated that the batches of transports should be made up only of the milder offenders. The other colonies object strongly to the continuance of this mode of punishment even in the mitigated form proposed, so far at least as any part of their continent is concerned. Such a system of transportation would afford but little relief to society in England, and even this would be merely temporary. It could only be her necessities that would induce Western Australia to receive our criminals; as soon as she found those necessities relieved by their labour, her willingness to receive them would pass away. There is no other colony to which they can be sent. The system of penal settlements is one that cannot be too strongly reprobated, and has been long since abandoned. Sooner or later, therefore, a question must have arisen as to the best method of punishing our convicts at home. It has, fortunately, received attention before the necessity for its settlement became too urgent to admit of time for consideration. As Sir George Grey points out, the principal change in the law effected by this statute is the abolition of sentences of three and four years' penal servitude; five years being now the shortest term for which such a sentence can be passed; while for persons previously convicted of felony the shortest term of punishment to be endured for the future is fixed at seven years. But the most important alterations contemplated in dealing with criminals are those which restrict the granting of tickets-of-leave. No ticket-of-leave will in future be given to any prisoner sentenced to penal servitude for life, while the amount of remission which may be obtained by those undergoing sentences for any shorter term has been considerably reduced. Tickets-of-leave, also, are to be obtained for the future only in consideration of a certain amount of labour actually performed, instead of by means of that negative sort of behaviour called good conduct; while the maximum amount of the gratuities to be obtained by prison labour has been greatly reduced, thus obviating the difficulty that existed under the former scale, that the most guilty offenders left prison with the largest amount of gratuities. The prison dietary, about which so great an outcry has been raised, was found on enquiry to be very little in excess of what is necessary, and therefore a slight reduction only has been made in it. The Government has acted wisely in abandoning, before it was too late to escape serious misunderstandings with our Australian colonies, an effete system of punishment, which, while it exposed the colonists to great social and moral hazards, pressed most unequally upon the convicts, meting out to some undue severity, while others enjoyed ill-merited leniency. Prison discipline at one time was threatened with destruction, and crime received an impetus through the sentimental doctrines of morbid philanthropists, who too often had the opportunity of reducing to practice their well-meant but mistaken theories. A more healthy tone now pervades the public mind, and the hands of those in authority are correspondingly strengthened. Penal servitude will now be a real punishment, calculated to inspire offenders with terror, as not even the small measure of remission now allowed can be gained without stern unflinching labour, steadily performed during a considerable period. It is not too much to hope that habits of industry will be thus acquired, which, aided by the terrible reminiscences of a long term of laborious imprisonment rigorously exacted, will not be laid aside as soon as the prison doors have been opened, and that increased severity of punishment will, while it affords protection to the public and satisfies the just vengeance of the law, work a real reform in those subjected to its influence.

Mr. Roebuck attended at the 'little feast' given by the retiring Master Cutler at Sheffield, which assumed this year the proportions of the great festival of September; it fell to the lot of the hon. gentleman to return thanks for the toast of the Borough Members. He observed that the present Parliament had been styled a do-nothing Parliament, and certainly the last session was, par excellence, a do-nothing session; it did not follow, however, that it had not performed well the work it had to do. Some thirty-two years ago Parliament had been reformed, and close upon that reformation followed the reforming of many abuses and the introduction of free-trade, the result of which was this: while thrones have been tumbled down and empires destroyed around us, and even the great Republic has been rent in twain, England stands serene in her greatness. When a painter commences a great picture, he advances rapidly with his work, all can perceive the progress made; but when the finishing of the picture arrives the process is slow, and the gradual advances towards completion cannot be detected by the uninitiated. That which takes place in the picture is strictly analogous to that which has taken place in Parliament. The picture commenced some thirty years ago is now being perfected, and no rash act should be committed which would tend to mar so grand a work. In three things the Government and Parliament of England acted in a manner which he disapproved, and yet he was about to defend them. When the great secession took place in America, he would at once have recognised the Confederate States with whom nineteen out of every twenty men he met were sympathisers, but the sympathy of England stopped short of risking war for the Confederate States. Lord Palmerston perceived, and acted in accordance with, the sentiment of the people; a bold politician would have acted differently, but Lord Palmerston's conduct was at all events prudent. When Denmark was oppressed by the bandit powers of Germany he would have sent the English fleet to her rescue; the English people sympathised with Denmark, but would not risk the dangers of war on her behalf. Lord Palmerston followed with true instinct the national wishes, and Denmark was deserted by England, and left a prey to the spoiler. Then as to reform, Parliament did not wish to reform itself, the people of England are not sufficiently interested in the matter to compel it to do so; Lord Palmerston, again sagaciously detecting the wishes of the people, refused to force into notice the unwelcome question. To determine not to go to war is as active a proceeding as determining to go to war; the people of England are as secure, as prosperous, and happy as they can possibly be made; his only fear was lest some misfortune should follow so much prosperity, as of old men imagined that uninterrupted happiness produced envy in the breast of the gods, and thus became the forerunner of unequalled misery. In the presence of prosperity so unbounded, and of happiness so unrivalled, it behoved the people of England to be very careful lest, by calling upon Parliament to act, that action should result in misfortune.

The disgraceful riots which during the last fortnight have been raging at Belfast, are, it is hoped, at an end. Since Friday last there has been no outbreak, the persuasions of the clergy and other influential persons in some measure allayed the fury of the populace; and the presence of the military, now that the riots have subsided, is likely to check all attempts, if any be made, at a fresh outburst. The town, however, is in a deplorable state in many parts, presenting the appearance of having undergone a siege. The prices of provisions are fearfully high, owing to the scarcity which has arisen in consequence of the fear entertained by farmers and others of sending in their goods, and of the standstill to which business was reduced in the town during the disturbances. Some apprehension was entertained lest the funerals of persons slain in the riots would be the signal for the outburst of fresh disorder; but, thanks to the wise precautions taken by the authorities, they were performed without any breach of the peace. Acts of violence are no longer perpetrated, but the hatred engendered by the last few days will not soon subside. It is to be hoped that Government have learnt the lesson to be deduced from the terrible experience of the last fortnight—that, in the midst of so excitable a population, and in the presence of two such fierce and vindictive factions, no processions or party demonstrations of any kind should on any pretext be permitted.

A lady, somewhat advanced in years, but possessed still, it would seem, of some remaining charms, has during her life had the mournful satisfaction of burying two husbands, from each of whom she received, as some slight compensation for their loss, substantial increase of her pecuniary means; her income is now estimated at about 700*l.* a year. The lady's name is Wray, and she dwells at Leeds; she has not attained, so far as can be ascertained, to a greater age than seventy, and under all the circumstances it is not surprising that suitors for her hand have till lately continued to address her. Mr. Lister, a retired corn-dealer, also of Leeds, who, on the admission of his own counsel, is now on the shady side of fifty, succeeded in possessing himself of her affections. Thus far at least, that a marriage contract was entered into between them, settlements drawn, the license obtained, the ring, trousseau, and breakfast provided, and a parson retained. All was in readiness to make Mr. Lister the happiest man in the world; but on the destined morning Mrs. Wray determined to convince the unhappy lover that among her other possessions she still retained that of woman's dearest privilege, the right to change her mind, which right she proceeded to exercise: she refused to meet him at the altar, and could not be induced to change her mind again. Under these distressing circumstances Mr. Lister had of course but one alternative, and brought his wrongs before a jury, who, however, notwithstanding the eloquence of his learned counsel, Mr. Digby Seymour, estimated the damage he had sustained at the hands of the venerable jilt at one farthing.

Inspector Tanner has safely arrived in New York, with Serjeant Clark and the two witnesses against Müller, and has received from the authorities every assistance they could render. Inspector Kerrissey has also arrived with the second warrant, and the most complete arrangements have been made to secure the capture of the supposed assassin, a special steamer being engaged and kept always ready to meet the Victoria when she appears in sight.

The inquest on Mr. Briggs was resumed on Monday last. Several witnesses were examined, but nothing of any importance transpired; and the inquest was adjourned till September 8, by which time it is expected that Müller will have returned to England.

Lord Palmerston, after an absence of several years from his constituents, has at last been able to pay them a visit. He was received in a most cordial manner and conducted to his hotel by an enthusiastic crowd. In the evening a banquet was given to the noble Lord, at which the Mayor of Tiverton presided. After the usual loyal toasts, the chairman proposed the health of Lord Palmerston. The noble Lord, in returning thanks, expressed the pleasure he felt in the apparent satisfaction of all parties at the ecclesiastical appointments made by him. He said that in selecting persons to fill places of authority in the church, two things had to be borne in mind, the promotion of the moral and religious training of the country, and the appointment of men who would endeavour to heal the acerbities occasioned by differences of opinion in religious matters, and who would set an example of charity to those under their care. The importance of the heads of the Church being actuated by that spirit was illustrated by the recent miserable exhibition of the results of yielding to religious rancour at Belfast, though there this evil was aggravated by the presence of old established political animosity in addition to the religious element. The noble Lord passed rapidly in review the attitude of England during the last five years. It had fallen to the lot of his Administration to preserve to this country the blessings of peace, although on several occasions the avoidance of war had been difficult. He did not belong to the peace-at-all-price party, if indeed such a party could be said to exist; differences of opinion might prevail as to what amounted to a sufficient provocation to justify war, but he believed there were no Englishmen who would shrink from war when necessary to maintain the honour and interests of the country. We might have embarked for war in aid of the Poles; we deplored their unfortunate lot. We endeavoured to enlist the sympathy and support of Europe on their behalf; the efforts we made were hearty but unsuccessful; to have made war would have been a great error. The advice of some would have involved us in war on the American continent, on behalf of one or other of the belligerents; we have wisely abstained from interfering. 'We may hope that time and reflection and recent advices from America, show some favourable symptoms—we may hope that time and reflection and the fact of the immense losses which have been sustained, and the slight hopes of success which appear on the part of the North may have their due weight—we may hope that many months will not elapse before some progress will be made towards healing that tremendous breach which now exists.' He was convinced that any effort at mediation on our part before matters had become ripe for adjustment would have been useless, and would have raised up a bitter spirit towards this country, and therefore that our neutrality was wise. As to the Danish question we all sympathised with the Danes, and condemned the injustice and lawless aggression of the German Powers, but the time of year was unfavourable for sending out a fleet, and our available land force was not sufficient in numbers to cope successfully with the multitudes of Germany. We are sufficiently strong to resist attack from whatever quarter it may come, having in round numbers 300,000 militia and volunteers, in addition to the regular army, but our policy is not an aggressive one. It is the duty of Government to preserve peace, it is the duty of the people to promote trade and increase the resources of the country, and both duties have, in the noble Lord's opinion, been most satisfactorily performed.

A great fire raged during the larger portion of last week in Woolmer Forest, which is believed to have been the work of incendiaries. A tract of land about 6 miles long by 3 broad has been ravaged by the flames. Great assistance was rendered by the troops at Aldershott in putting an end to the conflagration, more than 1,000 persons being incessantly occupied at the task for upwards of three days.

INDIA.

The report of the complete victory gained by the Ameer of Cabool over his brother Afyul Khan is confirmed. The Ameer is once more in Cabool busily engaged in strengthening his resources. The Bhooteas still threaten to give trouble, and all communication between the British authorities in Assam and Bhootan is interrupted. Rumours also are rife with regard to the hostile intentions of the King of Burmah. A minute has been recorded by the Governor-General restricting the financial member of his council (Sir Charles Trevelyan) from sanctioning the expenditure of any sum exceeding 60*l.* a month. Sir Hugh Rose is not expected to leave for England till the spring.

NEW ZEALAND.

A despatch from Sir Duncan Cameron, K.C.B., who is in command of Her Majesty's forces in New Zealand, has recently arrived; it contains advices up to June 7, and is dated from Auckland, to which place the General has transferred his headquarters from Tauranga, where Colonel Greer of the 68th was left in command. It also contains a report from Colonel Warre in command of the troops in Taranaki. The accounts are more satisfactory than those received for some time past. The Maories were utterly defeated at New Plymouth with only one casualty on our side. This is the only place at which there has been any collision since his last despatch. The health and spirits of the troops are excellent; but no further active operations can be undertaken for the next three months in any part of New Zealand, and the troops have, for the most part, hutted themselves for the winter.

THE CONTINENT.

THE DANISH QUESTION.

We have now wellnigh bid adieu to the Dano-German quarrel; all thought of further war has died out on both sides; the prisoners are being restored to their native countries; the Danes are reducing their forces; the Commissioners have met at Vienna to discuss the preliminaries of peace; the Danish representatives have at last received their final instructions on that subject. In every good old comedy there were two plots; one between the hero and heroine, the other between the hero's valet and the heroine's maid: the latter always made its appearance during a lull in the action of the principal personages, and created an agreeable variety in the performance. Somewhat on the analogy of this double plot is the present European difficulty framed. The principal performers are the two great Powers, Austria and Prussia, on the one hand, and Denmark on the other. The valet and lady's maid are represented by the same Austria and Prussia in their capacities as members of the German Bund for the one, and the Confederation for the other. There is a pause in the action between the principals; and the minor plot has come forward to the public view with some energy. The case is of the simplest description. The two belligerent powers assert their right to deal with the Duchies as conquerors, while the Diet claims to have the disposal of them as the only arbiter on matters of purely German policy. Russia thought fit to press her view of the question on her opponents by the seizure of Rendsburg. Baron von Beust retorted by ordering General Haake to move the Hanoverian troops into Lauenberg; and that there might be no possibility of mistaking his motives, he further gave notice that he intended to ask the representatives of Austria and Prussia in the Federal Diet to give assurances with respect to their intentions regarding the Duchies. A pledge of any such description would be most inconvenient to Prussia. She had, therefore, parried the attack by demanding of Hanover on what ground her troops were moved into Lauenburg. The answer was ready; the Hanoverian Government knew nothing about it, and were excessively annoyed with Herr von Beust for presuming to meddle with them. The consequence will probably be that Hanover will withdraw her contingent from the Federal army of execution. The demand for a pledge in the Federal Diet was disposed of in another manner. First Saxony was given to understand that the two great German Powers did not intend to allow her satellites to dictate to her; and that, therefore, the Saxon motion in the Diet would be negatived by a large majority. In the next place every Government organ in Prussia lifted up its voice in indignation at the conduct of a statesman, who, after refusing to fight, now came forward to divide the spoil; they exhausted the whole vocabulary of German expletives upon Saxony, and spoke with menace of the coming day when that kingdom shall become a province of Prussia. The effect of this outcry has been that the intended motion of Saxony in the Diet has been withdrawn, 'in consequence of urgent entreaties,' says the Saxon Government. The Austro-Prussian forces have now strengthened their hold on the disputed countries; orders have been received to advance the troops thither, and General Gablentz is already at Altona, making the requisite preparations; a Prussian fleet is cruising off the shores of Slesvig, and the harbour of Kiel is shortly to be occupied by two Prussian corvettes and a division of gunboats.

What the real intentions of Austria and Prussia are with regard to the future of the Duchies it is impossible to divine: we do not even know whether there is a perfect agreement between the two Powers on the provisional government to be established in the Duchies, much less on their ultimate destiny. It is scarcely to be believed that Austria will allow Prussia to make a territorial extension in that direction. Yet some affirm that even this has been contemplated; that the Prussian Government is desirous of placing the administration of the Duchies for the present in the hands of a Prussian prince; and only if this be found impracticable to divide the administration with Austria. The most moderate proposal which is expected to be made is that the territories should be governed by three commissioners, one of whom should represent the Diet.

The King of Prussia went to Vienna on the 20th inst., and remained there for perhaps a week; opinions are divided whether this portends an entente cordiale or the birth of fresh difficulties between the two countries; probably the former idea is correct. One fault in the present constitution of the Duchies is, according to Herr von Bismarck, that their constitution has been since 1848 so horribly republican: this blemish he promises through his official organs to remove as speedily as possible.

Only two fresh claims to the possession of these poor little Duchies this week! One is very moderate in its demands: it is only the little duchy of Lauenburg which is claimed by Hanover. The substance of the claim is that Lauenburg belonged to the Elector of Hanover from 1689 to 1815; that in 1815 it was ceded to Prussia, and exchanged by that country with Denmark for a portion of Pomerania and the island of Rügen: the rights of Denmark being now destroyed by the late war, the right of the original possessor revives. The King of Hanover has, therefore, applied to the Prussian Government to restore this sovereign duchy of 52,000 inhabitants to him, its lord and master. The other demand is as large as that of Hanover is moderate—nothing less than the crown of Denmark and Lauenburg will satisfy Prince Frederick William of Hesse. His memorial addressed to the Federal Diet states that it was with the greatest reluctance that in 1852 he allowed his mother, a princess of Denmark, to relinquish her reversion of the crown of Denmark to its present possessor in 1852; that even then he made the stipulations that the rights should be revived if the conditions of that treaty were not adhered to; that he has waited for the moment when these conditions should be officially declared null and void, as they now are by the negotiations between the two belligerent parties; that he now declares, according to the terms of his stipulations, that his rights are revived, and that the reversion of the crown of Denmark, with all its dependencies, is his upon the decease of the present King; and he prays finally that, Lauenburg being now separated from the kingdom of Denmark, he may at once be admitted into possession of that duchy, and his representative be received into the Federal Diet. This memorial has been referred, along with the multitude of others on the same subject, to that mysterious committee whose existence, to judge from the results which it produces, must be one of perpetual adjournment.

Of all the amusing and audacious demands which have been so profusely made by the German press during the past year, none has surpassed that of a journal of Saxe-Weimar, which we would gladly reproduce in extenso, so cogent are the arguments, and so miraculous the conclusion. 'Germany,' says this article, 'counts her flock, and lo! a valuable member responds not to the call. Heligoland is at this moment in the unnatural, illegitimate possession of a naval Power which persistently derides, abuses, and persecutes Germany. What guarantees have we against England at any moment blockading our principal rivers, the Weser and the Elbe, and prostrating our commerce? We repeat, no permanent peace can be thought of so long as Heligoland is not restored to its mother country, Slesvig-Holstein. Denmark must give up the whole of the North Sea Islands to Slesvig-Holstein; Heligoland belongs to the latter quite as much as Sylt and Fohr. If it suited Denmark in 1814 to put up Heligoland for sale in the English market, it is her business now to cancel that transaction if she wants peace with Germany. It must be borne in mind that the two great Powers are the conquerors, Denmark the conquered, and that Heligoland in the hands of a foreign Government is an insult and absurdity which Denmark must be compelled to remedy.'

It is reported that M. Drouyn de Lhuys has addressed a private circular to the French diplomatic agents in foreign countries, stating that France will take no more part in the proposed pacification than she took in the war preceding it. She will only stipulate with regard to the future government of the Duchies that it shall be acquiesced in by their inhabitants. The Slesvig-Holsteiners themselves, those at least of them who are neither in Prussian pay nor under Prussian influence, have made a new and energetic demand that the wishes of the people should be consulted with regard to the change of masters.

DENMARK.

As we have already stated, the Danish army is being rapidly reduced; it is supposed that it will for the future consist of only 15,000 men. This reduction unfortunately throws a great number of deserving officers out of employ, particularly in respect of those regiments which were mainly recruited from the Duchies. The Danish officers may be easily absorbed into the army even in its reduced state, as it has always been under-officered; but the natives of Slesvig-Holstein who have remained faithful to their colours will find themselves now in a cruel position—incapable of employment in Denmark as foreigners, and looked upon with suspicion by the new masters of their native country. The Danish fleet is also being laid up in ordinary; the Rolf Krake, in particular, is now lying dismantled in dock; how she has done her work we shall know when another Napier writes a history of the Dano-German war, and not till then.

We mentioned last week a report that the Danish Government were about to withdraw their representative from England; it is said that the same step will be taken with regard to Russia, for the same motives of economy.

The visit of the Prince and Princess of Wales to Copenhagen is expected to take place early in October.

The Crown Prince Humbert of Italy is now travelling incognito, but with a numerous suite, in the north of Europe. On Monday last he passed through Lubeck to Copenhagen. He is travelling under the name of Count Monza.

FRANCE.

August 15—the Fête Napoléon of the Frenchman, the Feast of the Assumption of the Roman Catholic—was celebrated with all human and divine honours in Paris. The usual magnificence of this holiday has been this year utterly surpassed and thrown into the shade by the splendour of the welcome given by the Emperor to the King of Spain. When the great day arrived, Paris was crowded with visitors; provincials and foreigners—English in particular—swarmed into the metropolis. The weather was as favourable to the holiday as could be desired—a clear sky, and a heat somewhat less intense than on the previous days. The rejoicings began with a salute of 101 guns from the esplanade at the Invalides. Next came the distribution of loaves to the poor; then an official Te Deum at Notre Dame, and a reception of the Corps Diplomatique at the Tuileries. All through the day went on the usual amusements in the square in front of the Invalides—the greasy pole, the tilting matches on the river, the balloon, and the inevitable open-air theatres, where French troops perform prodigies of valour against a vast force of Cochin Chinese, and fire away blank cartridges enough to take another Mexico. The illuminations of the evening were as brilliant as usual—the Tuileries, the Place de la Concorde, and the Champs Elysées were adorned with myriads of lamps, and the Champs Elysées was in a continued blaze of varying red, white, or blue lights. The Emperor and Empress walked up the avenue in the evening and mingled freely with the crowd. Hundreds of the visitors were unable to find beds, and bivouacked under the stars on the Boulevards or in the Champs Elysées. One remarkable feature of the fête was the starting of a new cry, 'As tu vu Lambert?' supposed to have arisen from the anxious inquiries of some provincial spouse who had lost her better half in the crowd.

The King of Spain arrived in Paris on Monday evening, and was received with a magnificence such as has never yet been equalled. On Wednesday, the 17th, a grand dinner was given in his honour at St. Cloud; on the 18th he held a reception at the Spanish Embassy, at which the most noticeable circumstance was the absence of the Italian ambassador, whose Government has not yet been recognised by Spain; indeed, the Spanish Government have only lately sent a new minister to the court of Francis II. of Naples. On the evening of the 18th was given a state performance at the Opera. The public was rigidly excluded from this, and no one was admitted save by special invitation. The consequence was a sight such as has rarely been witnessed by mortal eyes: the gorgeous uniforms of the men, and the magnificent toilettes and jewellery of the ladies under the innumerable wax-lights with which the theatre was illuminated, combined to make up a most superb spectacle. On the 19th a review was held on the Champ de Mars, comprising troops to the number of about 70,000, of whom 10,000 were cavalry, with 20 batteries of artillery and 120 guns. This was unfortunately marred by a steady downfal of rain, which was decidedly damping to the enthusiasm of all but the English visitors, who were accustomed to it. On the evening of the 20th inst. Versailles revived the glories of the Grand Monarque, in a fête such as even he could vainly hope to equal. The Galerie des Glaces, that splendid but dreary room, which carries the visitor back irresistibly to the days of Madame de Pompadour and the Dubarry, was lighted up in full splendour. The theatre of the palace also was disinterred from the memories of the last century to see once more a performance of Molière's comedy of 'Psyche.' The grounds were all thrown open to the public, who assembled there in tens of thousands; never did the unscrupulous hotel-keepers of Versailles reap such a harvest. Unfortunately, the rain came on again in the evening, and put out the illumination at its birth. It ceased, however, in an hour, and the public were compensated for their disappointment by some splendid fireworks, and by the electric light playing upon the fountains of the Bassin de Neptune. On Sunday the King of Spain left Paris and returned to his own country. He was seen in Paris on several occasions, and is described as a pale gentlemanly-looking man.

One of the most disastrous fires that has yet occurred in France broke out on the evening of the 15th instant, at Limoges. The news was instantly telegraphed to the Emperor, and his first impulse was to proceed at once to the spot, but he was then awaiting the arrival of the King of Spain, and was consequently obliged to entrust the care of the business to his aide-de-camp, Count Reille. What was the origin of the fire has not been ascertained; probably it was connected with the preparation of fireworks for the evening fête. The dryness of the air and the scarcity of water were such that the fire soon gained the upper hand; it raged on without intermission into the next day; nothing but the strenuous exertions of a few individuals saved the town from utter destruction. The street in which it first broke out was old and narrow, as were also all those adjoining; the fire, therefore, spread on unheeded until it reached the Boulevards of the town; here it was at length arrested, but not before it had destroyed 108 houses, and 120,000*l.* worth of property. The Emperor and Empress immediately sent for the relief of the destitute the sum of 15,000 francs, to which the King of Spain added 5,000 more. Subscriptions have everywhere been opened for their help. We are told that at 9 P.M. on the 15th, when the fire was at its height, the Bishop of the diocese, followed by his clergy, carried in solemn procession round the burning houses the relics of St. Aurelian and St. Martial.

RUSSIA.

By letters from St. Petersburg we learn that the Czar has ordered a reduction of the army, granting an immediate and unlimited discharge to those soldiers of the guards, artillery, engineers, and the interior guard whose service expires on January 1 next.

Fresh condemnations have taken place in Poland, in consequence of the discovery of an alleged conspiracy against the life of General Berg. One man, Krazinski by name, was condemned to death, two more were reprieved, when at the very foot of the gallows, and their sentence commuted to twenty years' imprisonment; several others have been condemned to fifteen and twelve years' hard labour in the mines.

ITALY.

The mania for duelling has risen to such a height in Italy, that S. Pisanelli, the Minister of Grace and Justice, has thought it his duty to send a circular to the various prefects and magistrates of the kingdom, inveighing against the practice, and complaining that the authorities are not sufficiently active in their exertions to prevent a breach of the peace. Had he been less delicate, and accused them openly of shutting their eyes to every flagrant instance of law-breaking which occurs in this shape, he would have done them no injustice; it is notorious that not the smallest endeavour is made to stop an affair even when notice is given of it. It is, perhaps, an open question how far the hot blood of Italy will stand these restraints which we of a colder climate can bear without complaint; but there can be no question that as long as the law exists, it is the duty of the magistrates to enforce it. Most unluckily it happened that shortly after the publication of this circular, a duel took place between two well-known men, one of them a subordinate member of the Government, on a quarrel which took its rise from politics. It was impossible for the Ministry to take notice of it without doing themselves injury; it was therefore allowed to pass by; and the duellists of Italy have plucked up fresh courage when they see the Government make a dead letter of their own circular.

The mysterious affair with brigands which occurred but a little way outside Florence has not yet been cleared up. Some sceptics declare that the whole story was the offspring of the imagination of Mr. Digby Beste, the gentleman whose son was carried off by the bandits. It is alleged that the country is so well populated that it would be impossible for a band of twenty men to live in it without the knowledge of any one. It is suggested that Mr. Beste has perhaps a reason for wishing to believe in the existence of banditti in other places besides the Papal States. However, this is only the defence, and at present requires more certain confirmation. If it be true that the attack took place, the outer world may well ask whether the King of Italy had not better set his house in order at home before he thinks of attacking Venice. The mere existence of crime does not necessarily condemn the police of a country as inefficient; but the presence of an armed band waging private war against travellers shows that the miscreants themselves have but little belief in the power of the police.

We mentioned last week a case of abduction at Rome, in which the authorities had taken a Jewish boy of the name of Cohen out of the hands of his parents for the purpose of proselytising him. The Nazione of Florence states from Rome that the mother of the boy Cohen, having a few days ago gone to the Asylum of the Catecumeni to claim her son, and having used some strong language on the occasion, was immediately arrested and sent to prison.

SPAIN.

It is confidently reported that even Spain is at last to taste of the blessings of free trade. A reform of the tariff is shortly expected, to be followed by a new commercial treaty with France. Not less than this was to be looked for from the new Northern Spanish railway, which the King of Spain inaugurated at San Sebastian on the 22nd inst. on his return from Paris.

Good accounts are received from Santo Domingo. It is said that the insurgents are desirous of capitulating.

MEXICO.

Official dispatches, received here from Mexico, announce that several unimportant engagements had taken place between some bands and the troops. The sanitary condition of the army was satisfactory.

The Emperor Maximilian has granted an amnesty for all political offences.

BELGIUM.

The Brussels journals state that some disturbance took place in that capital three days back as soon as the general results of the elections became known. A tumultuous crowd assembled in the Rue des Ursulines, in front of the Jesuits' establishment, and remained there, shouting 'Down with the Jesuits!' When the police attempted to disperse the assemblage, stones were thrown, one of which struck Police Commissary Daxbeck on the head, and inflicted a rather severe wound. Fifteen of the most turbulent rioters were arrested and lodged in prison.

GREECE.

Advices received from Athens announce that the Cephalonian members have brought forward a motion in the National Assembly proposing that the Government should declare it to be the wish of the nation that Candia, Thessaly, and Epirus should be peacefully annexed to Greece by means of treaties.

ALGERIA.

The vague rumours of fresh disturbances having taken place in the province of Oran are confirmed.

Si-Mohammed has raised the tribes of Larbas and several other districts of Boghar. They have committed acts of incendiarism and assassination, cut the telegraph wires, and pillaged several caravanseries. The other districts of Oran and the province of Constantine are tranquil.

The troops have established a military cordon, confining the insurrection, and preventing any reinforcements reaching it.

FEDERAL ATROCITIES.

Our files of Confederate papers are full of accounts of the atrocities committed by the Federals and by the negro soldiers under their command. We append a few extracts from the Richmond Enquirer.

'On July 10 Butler issued an order that a portion of the country should be devastated for the purpose of feeding the troops and prisoners at Point Lookout. In pursuance of this order 700 negro infantry, under the command of Colonel Draper, and 100 white cavalry, were started for the Northern Neck; and 400 negro infantry, accompanied by 50 white cavalry, were sent into Westmoreland County. The Correspondent of the Enquirer says: 'Mr. Ben. English, after having been robbed, was stripped, tied up, and given thirty-nine lashes with the cowhide. And more horrible, but only too true, twenty-five or thirty ladies were violated by this party of negroes. Neither age nor colour was spared by these demons, who were encouraged by their white officers.'

'The rest of the regiment, 300 strong, with 50 white cavalry, under the immediate command of Colonel Draper, marched to Richmond County. On the route six negroes violated the person of Mrs. G. eleven times, she being the wife of a brave soldier of the Ninth Virginia Cavalry, being also sick at the time, with an infant six months old at her breast. This is only one instance out of twenty others of a like outrage.'

Another correspondent writes:—'Without writing narratives of specific acts, it is sufficient to record that they forcibly carried off negroes who were strongly attached to their homes and their owners, and who declared their unwillingness to go and pleaded not to be taken. They carried off or destroyed horses, cattle, stock of every kind, grain and farm implements, declaring that the country should be wasted and desolated, that crops should not be made. They destroyed the libraries of professional men, the medicines in the offices of physicians, and the tools of mechanics in their shops. They carried off or destroyed household furniture and utensils, beds, bedding, and clothes, so that many families are left destitute, individuals with only a single suit—that worn at the time; in some instances clothing was torn from the person of the wearer. Men and women have been stripped, tied up, and whipped. Wives and daughters have been shamelessly and publicly violated.'

'The negroes of Mr. Clayton, of Charles City, were compelled to tie their master to a tree and lacerate his naked body.'

'A party of United States troops lately landed in the Northern Neck counties, committed ten rapes upon the persons of respectable women. From Hunter's column, in the Valley, outrage after outrage is being perpetrated; the burning of the Lexington Institute was least among their crimes. The private residence of ex-Governor Letcher, with all the clothing of his family, was burnt. There, again, the wailing cry of outraged women was heard, and the wretches who perpetrated these crimes may soon be 'prisoners of war.' It is sickening to record the catalogue of dishonour that has been heaped upon the women of Virginia.'

'Sheridan's thieves exceeded any that have visited this section. If as many of the inmates of perdition had been poured upon us, they could not have been more vile and merciless. What they could not carry off, they would destroy. They carried off corn, meat, horses, cattle, carriages, negroes, even forced negro children from their parents; broke up furniture, china; stole male, female, and infants' clothing; tore open beds, tore up bed clothing, in short destroyed as they went; drew pistols upon ladies and cursed them, publicly ravished the negro women and robbed the negroes of clothing and eatables. Many were left without a mouthful to feed their hungry crying children.'

We might multiply these extracts, but no further proof is needed of the abominable way in which Mr. Lincoln's officers wage war in the South.

(From the Morning Herald, August 25.)

Yesterday there was posted at Lloyd's a copy of a letter which had been sent for the information of the under-writers by the Peninsular and Oriental Steam Navigation Company, reporting the capture of the Georgia steamer, formerly a Confederate cruiser, but recently disposed of at Liverpool for 16,000*l.*, to Mr. Bates, the shipowner of that port.

'Ellora, screw-steamer, Gibraltar,
'August 16, 1864.

'Gentlemen,—I beg to report the arrival of this ship at the above port, all well, at nine P.M. this day. Fine weather has been experienced throughout the passage. On the 15th inst., at two P.M., Great Burlings bearing NE. eight to nine miles distant, we passed close to two screw steam vessels, both under steam, but hove to with their heads in shore. The larger of these was evidently an American-built frigate, and was flying the Federal flag. The smaller was an English-built vessel of about 700 to 800 tons, without any flag flying, and was deeply laden. On her stern was written in white letters (apparently quite recently done) 'Georgia, Liverpool.' She was brig-rigged, with bowsprit and jib-boom, and had a black funnel, placed rather farther forward than it is in the generality of merchant steamers. Heavily-laden boats were passing frequently from the smaller to the larger vessel; and I observed in one that was in transit at the time of our passing under the stern of the frigate a quantity of seamen's chests and bedding. The frigate had tackles at both of her lower yard-arms, and she hoisted her pinnace out soon after we passed her. Preparations also appeared to be going on for hoisting in heavy weights. On the poop of the smaller vessel were several officers in American naval uniform, and a number of men, evidently belonging to the frigate, all fully armed. The larger ship appeared to be upwards of 3,000 tons, full rigged, with two black funnels, with white band six feet from the top; she had a large gilded eagle on her stern; and altogether appeared very like the American screw steam frigate Niagara. Boats were passing between the ships as long as we could discern them. The sea was very smooth, and the weather very fine.

'I am, &c.,
'George C. Sparkes,
'Commander Ellora, screw steamer.'

Towards the afternoon a telegram was also posted from Liverpool that the Federal war steam frigate Niagara had arrived off Dover, and had landed the captain and 33 seamen, the crew of the Georgia. No mention is made as to what had become of the Georgia, but it was surmised a prize crew had been put on board of her, and she had been sent to New York.

LETTER FROM NEW ORLEANS.

New Orleans, Louisiana: August 2, 1864.

THE DEFENCES OF MOBILE—THE CONFEDERATE FLEET—THE FEDERAL FLEET—THE CONFEDERATE NAVAL OFFICERS—THE ENQUIRY INTO THE CORRUPTION OF BANKS'S ADMINISTRATION—THE EXCHANGE OF PRISONERS—THE FEDERALS NOT ANXIOUS TO EXCHANGE THOSE WHOSE TERM OF SERVICE HAS EXPIRED—HOW THE YANKEES TREAT THEIR PRISONERS—MR. LINCOLN'S 'STATE CONVENTION'—BANKS OVERRULED—MESSRS. WADE AND DAVIS ON MR. LINCOLN'S 'RECONSTITUTION'—GENERAL CANBY'S CALL FOR MILITIA—THE NEGROES BEING PRESSED—THEY SHRINK FROM MILITARY SERVICE.

We learn that Admiral Farragut began his attack upon the water defences of Mobile yesterday. What progress he has made, or how the engagement terminated, has not yet transpired. His fleet is a powerful one, mounting over two hundred guns, and fears are entertained by the Confederates of this city that the Admiral will force the passage of the forts (Gaines and Morgan) at the entrance of the bay. When he has done so, however, the same parties contend that he will have but just entered upon his task. Fort Morgan, a casemated work mounting some fifty guns, is situated upon the tongue of a peninsula called Mobile Point, on the east side of the entrance. On the opposite side stands Fort Gaines, upon Dauphine Island, the eastern extremity of which is about three miles from Mobile Point, their situation thus allowing the two forts to pour an enfilading fire upon an enemy's squadron attempting the entrance. The probability is that Farragut will attempt to repeat his trick of running past them during the night, as he did in the case of Forts Jackson and St. Philippe. From Dauphine Island to Grant's Pass, which connects the Mississippi Sound with the lower harbour of Mobile, are a series of works which command the channel for some five miles. The Pass is defended by Fort Powell, which Farragut attempted to reduce last February. It is a sand battery, similar in construction to Fort M'Allister on the Ogeechee River, and Fort Wagner on Morris Island. These successively resisted the attacks of the ironclads. The water defences of the city proper extend down both sides of the bay about five miles, and consist of formidable earthworks, redoubts, and, it is said, ironclad forts. A short distance from the city is the Marsh Battery, so called from being built upon a marshy tract which has been made solid by means of piles and earth. This battery mounts ten guns—three 100-pounder rifles, four 9-inch Dahlgren's, and three long 32-pounders. Most of these works command the land approaches as well as the bay. The several channels are obstructed, or can be obstructed at a moment's warning, and a line of intricate and formidable obstructions extends nearly across the bay about three miles from the city. From this it will be seen that though the Union squadron should run the gauntlet of Forts Morgan and Gaines, the fall of the city would not necessarily follow immediately if at all. The enemy's squadron once within the harbour, the surrender of Morgan and Gaines would, I suppose, be but a question of time; though I know that the Confederates, foreseeing the possibility of these strongholds being cut off from the city, garrisoned and provisioned them for a protracted siege.

The garrison of Fort Morgan might effect its escape round the peninsula, but the troops on Dauphine Island would have but little chance of escape. On the land side the city is enveloped with formidable earthworks, situated just within the entrenchments which extend a distance of about fifteen miles, covering it on the west, north, and east. Besides all these defensive works there is also a formidable little fleet under command of Admiral Buchanan. We may be sure that the hero of the Merrimac will give his late brother in arms a good fight. Admiral Buchanan's squadron is said to number in all twelve vessels, mounting fifty guns. They are the ironclads Tennessee (ram), Nashville, Morgan, and Baltic; the cottonclads Selma, Gaines, Hornsent, and five small gunboats. Against this mosquito fleet Admiral Farragut brings the most formidable naval force yet in action in this war. He has 9 screw sloops, mounting 133 guns; 8 monitors and ironclads, 22 guns; 4 double-enders, 37 guns; 6 gunboats, 29 guns; and 4 tugs, carrying 8 guns. The following is a list of the Confederate naval officers:—

It is somewhat of an official confession of malfeasance that General Canby has found it necessary to appoint an officer to examine into the manner in which General Banks's appointees have discharged their official duties. The public were fully aware of the corruption prevailing in all the departments of Banks's command. As the long-suffering victims of a legalised system of extortion and plunder, the unhappy people had in a measure got used to it, and began to accept the thing as a matter of course, to cease only with the expulsion of the enemy. The appointment of General Canby has, however, put a period to this and many other abuses. An officer, styled Inspector, has recently been appointed by General Canby to ferret out all the abuses of office on the part of Banks's officers. In accordance with instructions from General Canby, he has through the public prints made the following requisition:—'All persons who have paid sums of money to any officer of the Government, or to any party purporting to represent the Government, for "Rent," "Fines," "Assessments," "Passports," "Privileges," "Black Mail, or release from any required duty," or any other, without consideration, will please hand to the undersigned, at his office, a concise statement of—"Date of Payment," "Property Represented," "Time for which Payment was made," "Amount," "To whom paid," and any other information necessary to establish the amounts collected in this city, and in the Department of the Gulf.' Even his enemies must pity General Banks in his fallen fortunes.

About one thousand Union prisoners, recently exchanged, arrived here some days ago from Tyler, Texas. Their uniforms were in a most dilapidated condition, but the wearers for the most part looked 'hearty and healthy,' as is confessed by one of the city press, though a contemporary makes the imprisonment of these men a theme for the old but exploded charge of 'rebel barbarity' to prisoners of war. None know better than the utterers of such calumnies that they are wholly groundless; still we expect to hear the changes rung upon this 'rebel barbarity' until the close of the war, for the Union press have an object in it. It tends to keep alive the war feeling, and is expected to make the men fight a little more obstinately rather than become the victims of 'rebel barbarity.' Not unfrequently, however, they run a little sooner to escape the same imaginary fate. But really if these men have languished and suffered in prison, they have only their own Government to blame. If many of the men died at the prison camp at Tyler simply for the want of medicines—as is alleged—who, pray, made medicine contraband of war? But all the alleged hardships could have been escaped by an exchange of prisoners; the Confederate authorities west, as well as east, of the Mississippi being ready at any time to renew the cartel. This the Federal Government declined doing, as the term of service of most of the prisoners had expired. One regiment, the 42nd Massachusetts—nine-months men—lay in captivity since January 1863, double the term of enlistment. These and all others whose term of service had expired, might have remained in prison till after the war, but for the great loss of the Federals in prisoners in the late Red River campaign. This compelled them to reopen negotiations, and General Canby sought to bring about a general exchange soon after his arrival. As the General is an educated soldier and strictly honourable, he will find no difficulty in treating with the Confederates. If General Canby is now ready for a general exchange, he can have it, but the Confederates will not consent to an exchange, of such bodies of Federal troops as may have a year or more yet to serve, while regiments whose terms have expired—like the 42nd Massachusetts—are left in their hands.

Apropos of cruelty to prisoners, let me quote you the subjoined extract from a letter written by a lady in Maryland to a friend in this city. The writer has peculiar facilities for becoming acquainted with the treatment of Confederate prisoners. 'Ah! it would make your heart bleed to know of the cruelties practised upon our poor soldiers in all the Yankee dungeons. On Johnson's Island, as well as in all the other prisons, a deposition has been drawn up secretly and signed by all the officers, making a simple statement of facts regarding the cruelties and indignities inflicted upon them. Think of our brave men at Fort Delaware being suspended by the thumbs to a beam for some fancied offence, and kept in that situation until their limbs were dislocated, and the victims were taken down only to die. I heard of an instance the other day, of one of the men being found hanging in this manner by a more humane Yankee surgeon, who ordered him to be taken down. The guard refused, as he was obeying the orders of the General, when the doctor himself cut him down, and, upon being asked by the General why he had done so, he replied that the man would have died in half an hour if he had not relieved him. Thereupon the General said it was 'a pity he did not leave him hang,' and forbade his interference in any other cases which might occur. To think of their committing these devilish atrocities so secretly, for they will not permit anything to pass out from the prisoners without inspection. We get our information contraband and from escaped captives. And to hear them howling over the misery of their Yankees in Dixie because they do not get all the delicacies of life, is too abominable.'

That creature of the military power, the State Convention, has adjourned. It may be regarded as extinct, though it adjourned subject to the call of the (its) President. The Constitution which it adopted is to be submitted to the 'qualified voters' (Northern residents, soldiers, and such like) for approval or rejection on the first Monday in September next, and the Federal Lieutenant-Governor has issued a proclamation ordering a ballot to be had on this question at the appointed time. The character of this body and the means to which it owes its being have been fully exposed in previous letters. Therefore I shall add here but little, if anything, further from myself regarding this Convention. Lest, however, some reader may suppose that 'rebel sympathies' had jaundiced my judgment, let me give the following, from undoubted 'loyal' sources, in support of what I have previously advanced. The Times of this city, owned and controlled by the United States Sub-Treasurer, and of course a 'loyal Union' paper, thus speaks of the proceedings on the day previous to the adjournment:—

> 'Yea, though I die, the scandal will survive,
> And be an eye-sore in my golden coat.

'It has been our fortune in our day to witness many an amusing scene, many a most ludicrous occurrence, but the events of yesterday in the Constitutional State Convention exceeded anything for downright legitimate fun we can remember. The President in the chair, in a reclining posture, evidently much overcome by the heat and an excessive degree of good spirits. Questions were put, motions were made, and decisions rendered. Some of these decisions appeared to most of the members as entirely unparliamentary—that is, without sense, reason, or precedent. Murmurs of discontent grew audible, increased, and finally got vent in boisterous and uncomplimentary expressions, such as "the like was never heard," "he is drunk," "he is a d——d fool," &c. Amid all this confusion some member made a motion to adjourn. The motion was put and declared carried, and the President gracefully (?) retired from the chair and the hall into a committee room. Members insisted the motion for adjournment was not carried. One of the members, a gentleman, was declared elected temporary President. He stepped forward to the chair and declared an adjournment in a sober manner. The uproar did not, however, subside. Indignation generally prevailed, for there were men in that Convention who looked upon the whole proceeding with unutterable disgust. During the excitement railings were leaped over, and the most ridiculous scenes enacted that it is possible to conceive of. One man struck another with a chair, still another received a black eye, and yet another had the toe of a boot applied to his posterior extremities. The Convention, we understand, is to adjourn to-morrow, and this would seem a fitting finale to a legislative body which has shown a total disregard for the State, the people, and the public Treasury. Up to last Saturday, we are assured, the warrants upon the Treasury for expenses of this Convention had amounted to over a quarter of a million of dollars, and will reach, it is said, fully three hundred thousand dollars. The contingent expenses alone, which enumerated whisky as the most important item by far, had swelled to the prodigious sum of over forty thousand dollars. These proceedings will "pass into history"—in French and English at $1 per square and $5 per page in book form! Reader, we pause. This detail, although in seeming levity made, sickens and disgusts us.'

The 'assembled wisdom,' deeming itself grossly vilified by the Times, ordered the arrest of Mr. May, or rather requested Banks to have it done, and also to suppress his paper. He readily complied. But the order had hardly been issued when Banks was summoned to General Canby's headquarters. On his entrance, as I am informed, General Canby said, 'General Banks, write an order for Mr. May's release. General Banks: 'Let us argue the question.' General Canby: 'No, sir, the order must be given.' Accordingly, the order was written on the spot, and Mr. May was instantly released. It is said that General Canby gave General Banks clearly to understand that his edicts were no longer absolute in the department. And yet General Banks ranks him—at least he is his senior by nearly three years, Canby not having been appointed to the rank of Major-General until his late assignment to this command. Still Banks clutches at the shadow of his former power, and will not resign though thus disgraced.

The one other testimony which I would quote regarding the Louisiana Convention is the following extract from the 'counter-blast' of Representative Davis, of Maryland, and Senator Wade, of Ohio, to the President's proclamation of July 8, 1864. These gentlemen were the chairmen of the 'Committees on the rebellious States,' in their respective Houses, from which emanated the Bill 'to guarantee to certain States whose Government has been usurped, a Republican form of Government,' and which Bill the President refused to sign, as set forth in the proclamation referred to above. Messrs. Wade and Davis declare that 'the President persists in recognising those shadows of Governments in Arkansas and Louisiana, which Congress formally declared should not be recognised—whose representatives and senators were repelled by formal votes of both Houses of Congress—which it was declared formally should have no electoral vote for President and Vice-President. They are the mere creatures of his will. They cannot live a day without his support. They are mere oligarchies, imposed on the people by military orders under the forms of election, at which generals, provost-marshals, soldiers, and camp-followers were the chief actors, assisted by a handful of resident citizens, and urged on to premature action by private letters from the President. In neither Louisiana nor Arkansas before Banks's defeat, did the United States control half the territory or half the population. In Louisiana, General Banks's proclamation candidly declared: "The fundamental law of the State is martial law." On that foundation of freedom he erected what the President calls "the free Constitution and Government of Louisiana." But of this State, whose fundamental law was martial law, only sixteen parishes out of forty-eight parishes were held by the United States, and in five of the sixteen we held only our camps. The eleven parishes we substantially held had 233,185 inhabitants; the residue of the State not held by us, 575,617. At the farce called an election, the officers of General Banks returned that 11,346 ballots were cast; but whether any, or by whom, the people of the United States have no legal assurance; but it is probable that 4,000 were cast by soldiers or employés of the United States military or municipal, but none according to any law, State or national, and 7,000 ballots represent the State of Louisiana. Such is the free Constitution and Government of Louisiana; and like it is that of Arkansas. Nothing but the failure of a military expedition deprived us of a like one in the swamps of Florida; and before the Presidential election, like ones may be organised in every rebel State where the United States have a camp.'

This Convention cost the people of Louisiana about half a million of dollars, nearly one-half this amount being appropriated to a corps of unscrupulous eulogists of the press.

General Canby has ordered that all able-bodied males between the ages of eighteen and forty-five, within the lines of occupation in the Departments of Arkansas and the Gulf, and the districts east of the Mississippi River, will immediately be enrolled for service in the militia. Neutral foreigners, not being subject to compulsory military service, will be enrolled as a separate class, to be employed whenever necessary, as a local police or constabulary force. Paragraph 2 declares that the plea of alienage will not be admitted, if the claimant has, at any time, exercised the rights of citizenship, under any general, State, or municipal law, or has, at any time, been in the service of the rebel Government, or in that of any one of the States in rebellion. When any person, enrolled in the militia, has established his alienage, his name will be transferred to the enrolment for police purposes. Any person who may be found physically disqualified for field service, but fit for garrison duty, will be transferred to the battalions to be organised for local service, and no exemptions will be made except in cases of absolute disability. 'Deserters from the enemy will not be enlisted or employed in the army'—they cannot be relied upon, I suppose—nor hereafter will any person 'who is subject to the rebel conscription laws be sent or allowed to go within the rebel lines.' If they make themselves obnoxious, 'they will be tried for their offences, held as prisoners of war, or sent beyond the limits of this command.' Families of persons in the Confederate service will no longer be permitted to return to the city, though their homes may be there. They must remain in Dixie, but 'refugees in good faith will be received and kindly treated.' This is a very important order, one that cannot fail to entail much hardship upon the several classes referred to. Whether the foreigners are obliged to submit to this arbitrary enactment of military law remains to be seen.

But the privilege of fighting for the stars and stripes is not to be left exclusively to the white man. The emancipated slave is also to have his share of the fighting and the glory, and if he do not fully appreciate the honour, it is no fault of his new masters. I suppose it is owing to the fact that he does not fully appreciate the privilege of 'dying for his country' that we are now having what is termed a raid upon the negro. General Canby has ordered that four regiments of the Corps d'Afrique 'be broken up and the enlisted men distributed among the remaining regiments of that organisation,' and that measures be taken immediately 'to fill up the retained regiments by coloured labourers from the plantations in this department.' And so military pressgangs are busy in the city, as well as in the plantations, hunting up the fugitive darkies, who are seeking like terror-stricken children to escape their persecutors. A similar raid was witnessed here last spring, and the incidents thereof were painful and ludicrous in the extreme. This time the incidents are nearly all of a distressing character. The negro seems to have acquired, more particularly of late, a perfect terror of the battle-field, even at the prospect of going into the army. It is said that they have been made aware of the great slaughter of negro troops wherever they were engaged. No doubt these stories of 'terrific slaughter' have had their influence upon these ignorant but imaginative children of nature. But other influences have also been at work. I shall not, however, pursue this subject any further until my next letter. The negro as a soldier under Federal rule is an interesting theme.

THE SOUTH CANNOT BE STARVED INTO SUBMISSION.

(From the New York World, August 9.)

The Southern States is the most unlikely territory in the world to perish by inanition. Everything grows prolific there, and, withal, the country is supplied with a system of labour, as yet substantially unbroken, which, had it not been engaged hitherto in producing commercial crops, such as cotton, rice, sugar, and tobacco, might have grown the food of the whole world. Of the great cereal of the continent, Indian corn, the latest returns show that of the 836,000,000 bushels raised in the United States, the slave States produced more than half, and the States now in active rebellion more than one-third. The rebel States harvested in 1859 about 40,000,000 bushels of wheat, nearly or quite sufficient to supply a population equal to that of those States. It was, in fact, more than sufficient, since Indian corn furnishes the greatest portion of the bread consumed in the South. Counting two bushels of Indian corn equal to one of wheat, and allowing a consumption of breadstuffs equal to ten bushels (of wheat) to each man, woman, and child, there would still remain of the yield of Indian corn, upon the figures of 1860, more than 200,000,000 bushels for animals. Of domestic animals, whether bred for work or food, the rebel States raised vast numbers. For instance, it appears by the returns of 1860 there were in the State of Texas, in addition to

Asses and mules	63,000
Milch cows	598,086
Working oxen	172,243
Sheep	783,618
Swine	1,368,378

—in addition to these, no less than 2,733,267 head of animals classed under the head of 'other cattle,' indicating in this case the vast herds of cattle which pasture at large in that fertile State, reclaimed by their owners at will, when needed for the yoke, the dairy, or the shambles. In the matter of swine, Texas was outnumbered by three Northern States only, to wit:—

Ohio, which had in 1859	2,175,623
Indiana	2,498,528
Illinois	2,279,722

The slave States were among the largest breeders of swine. Georgia had, by the returns of 1860, more than two million head; Alabama had 1,736,959; Arkansas, 1,155,379; Mississippi, 1,534,097; Tennessee, 2,343,948; North Carolina, 1,883,214; and Virginia, 1,589,519. Of the border States, Kentucky raised 2,330,595 head, and Missouri 2,354,425.

The swine held by the State in rebellion (with deductions for those portions occupied by our troops) amounted to over fourteen million head, enough to allow of an annual yield of pork equal to 156 pounds to each of the 9,000,000 of inhabitants of those States. It is true that in the years before the rebellion there was an increasing draft upon the West by the South for pork and Indian corn—as was evidenced by the course of trade in this market, when the proceeds of large amounts of bills drawn against Southern products exported were held to meet drafts drawn in favour of the West for these provisions sent South by the railroads and river for consumption in the cotton and sugar States. The total product of Southern cereals was also drawn upon by the considerable amount of Virginia flour exported. These currents of trade dried up at once, however, upon the breaking out of the war. In their place a largely-increased production of breadstuffs has ensued in the rebel States. Notwithstanding the occupation of considerable portions of its territory by the opposing forces, Virginia has nearly held its own in the production of wheat; while Texas, for instance, which, in 1860, raised 1,464,273 bushels of wheat, has raised, it is estimated, above sixteen million bushels in a single year since the outbreak of the rebellion. . . The general strategy which assails the Confederacy and its capital from the South-west is doubtless correct enough, but it can scarcely prevail to the extent of 'starving out' the South, its armies, or its capital. There must needs be, in the six hundred and seventy thousand square miles of Confederate territory, many patches and intervals between the spots of our occupation where corn and pork will grow, and all the industries which pertain to the sustenance of the population be carried on.

Southern-born Northerners.—It is a curious fact not generally known, that General Grant, like President Lincoln (who, however, emigrated to Illinois in early youth), is a native of Kentucky. This is not an isolated case, a majority of the officers who have gained distinction in the Northern army and navy being born in the slave-holding States. Thus, General Thomas, who saved the Federal army from utter destruction in the disaster of Chichamanga, is a Virginian by birth; Admiral Farragut, who has just won the victory off Mobile, is a native of New Orleans; Captain Winslow, of the Kearsage, a native of North Carolina, and his first lieutenant of Virginia. These instances could be considerably increased, and if collected together would give a curious total result. The only counterpart in the Southern armies is to be found in the cases of General Pemberton, a native of Pennsylvania, and General Lovel, appointed from New York (but born in Maryland), and by a strange fatality of coincidence these two names are identified with the two greatest reverses of the Confederate arms, the fall of Vicksburg and of New Orleans.

Aggravated Assaults on Women.—According to an official document lately printed, there were last year 13,147 assaults on women committed in England and Wales for which the parties were charged before the magistrates.

TO OUR FRIENDS AND SUBSCRIBERS.

THE INDEX was established in May 1862, in the darkest hour of Confederate fortunes, by earnest friends of Southern Independence, with the distinctly expressed object of being the representative, in English journalism, of a gallant and struggling people appealing to the world not only for political, but still more for moral recognition. Since accepting this great trust, THE INDEX has unceasingly laboured, by the combined aid of English and of Southern writers, to enlarge and extend the common ground upon which two nations may cordially meet, which need only to understand each other in order to cherish the warmest mutual appreciation and lasting friendship. The chief and almost the sole difficulty has been, and is still, the callous indifference of the British Government on the one hand, and, on the other, the perplexity, to the European mind, of the unsolved and unprecedented problems involved in the management and education of four millions of the African race, intermingled with a population of the highest Caucasian type. This difficulty could be met only by a liberal fairness to every shade of honest opinion, by an inflexible adherence to truth under all circumstances, and by a bold avowal of convictions, even though ill received. THE INDEX does not claim to be neutral, but it claims to be independent in the highest sense of that word. It is because it must reflect and appeal to, at one and the same time, the public opinion of two countries as yet only imperfectly acquainted, that this somewhat unusual self-description is called for.

Thanks to arrangements now in successful operation, by which the Letters of regular Correspondents and Newspapers from all parts of the Confederate States are received within from twenty-five to thirty days from their date, THE INDEX is always enabled to present the very Latest Direct News from the South, as well as a faithful reflex of the tone and spirit of the Southern Press.

All communications intended for publication should invariably be addressed to 'the Editor of THE INDEX, 13 Bouverie Street, E.C.,' and unless authenticated by a responsible name, can receive no attention.

THE INDEX.

THURSDAY, AUGUST 25, 1864.

Mr. Memminger's Report.

THE important change just announced in President DAVIS's Cabinet, by which Mr. GEORGE A. TRENHOLM takes the place of Mr. C. G. MEMMINGER, as Secretary of the Confederate Treasury, gives additional interest to the document published elsewhere in our columns. The official report of the retiring Minister is the most complete statement of the condition of Confederate Finances yet laid before the public, and, though dated several months back, was evidently prepared with a view to his contemplated retirement. No exhibit so frank and comprehensive has ever been ventured upon by the late Federal Secretary of the Treasury, and in this, as in their past policy, and even in the manner of their almost simultaneous withdrawal from office, the contrast between Mr. MEMMINGER and Mr. CHASE is sufficiently characteristic of their respective countries. Mr. CHASE was a financier of wild schemes and desperate expedients; Mr. MEMMINGER was conscientious and prudent almost to a fault, laborious in detail, and—if we had to criticise his administration, we might add—almost too much wedded to the safe maxims and sober routine of peaceful and prosperous times for the financier of a great revolution. Had he had a little of Mr. CHASE's excessive recklessness, and had he initiated, at an earlier stage of the war, some such bold financial policy as that which the public emergency and popular pressure at last forced upon him, and which he has since loyally carried into execution, it is probable that even in failure he would have won worldwide reputation and prestige. As it is, he is held, rather unjustly, responsible for failures of which he ought not to bear the undivided blame, and his loss of popularity having extended to the Halls of Congress, his retirement, some time since decided on, takes place at the very moment when those failures bid fair to be retrieved, and a new era in Confederate finances has opened.

Mr. TRENHOLM's acceptance of the post vacated by Mr. MEMMINGER is, we believe, his first entrance into a political career, but it takes place under the most favourable auspices. His popularity far exceeds that ever enjoyed by his predecessor, and the people and press throughout the Confederacy accept him with an almost unbounded confidence in his ability and administrative talent. The head of one of the oldest and wealthiest merchant firms in Charleston, he is, so to speak, the embodiment of that magnificent idea of direct trade with Europe, which has been one of the chief causes of the war. His firm, in connection with its European branch, may fairly claim the credit of having been the first to organise on a grand scale that trade which now sets the utmost efforts of the Federal blockade at defiance, and by their enterprise, the bold and skilful use of vast resources, subservient to a lofty sense of patriotic duty, they have undoubtedly rendered invaluable services to the country at a time when it most needed them. Such success as theirs brings of course its pecuniary reward, and the firm has immensely added to its wealth as well as to its prestige. But Mr. TRENHOLM, with the impulse and nice perceptions of a large-minded man, has understood that wealth acquired, however honourably and patriotically, amidst and through the necessities of a suffering nation, is, even more than all other wealth, a trust-fund, and he has freely given his tithe, and perhaps more than his tithe, to the poor, the wounded, the soldiers, and the many unfortunate victims of the war. The popular disfavour with which fortunes accumulated during a national struggle are generally viewed, has therefore never attached to Mr. TRENHOLM, and his mercantile triumphs were invested with the dignity of public enterprises.

We have, on former occasions, entered so much at length into the investigation of the permanent productive resources of the South, that we need not here caution our readers against being unduly alarmed by the magnitude of Mr. MEMMINGER's figures. A country whose annual exports exceeded before the war 40,000,000*l.* sterling, and whose products are in such urgent request, that their chief staple sells readily since the war at five times its former price, is in no danger of being crushed by debt. It mortgages its future, it is true, but then the mortgage is upon untold wealth. The North has no such mortgage to offer. Its wealth in the past consisted in its profits on the trade of the South. Agricultural exports of its own it has none, except the precarious one of food in seasons of scarcity elsewhere. The public lands are valuable only to be given away—at a nominal price, just sufficient to defray the expense of surveying and the salary of the officer who sells it—as a bait with which to entice population into an untaxed wilderness. Intrinsic taxable or even saleable value these lands have not. The North counts upon a conquered South to pay the whole cost of this war. We have, therefore, an enemy's testimony that an independent South is amply able to pay its own share of that cost.

The Attack upon Mobile.

WITHIN the last week two startling Federal victories have been announced with all due parade and circumstance. General SHERIDAN claims for General AVERILL a decisive triumph over a portion of the Confederate forces who have lately been levying contributions in Maryland. Admiral FARRAGUT is reported to have done everything but take Mobile; the authority for the latter report being the commander at Mobile, General MAURY. Now, it is quite possible that both events have come off; but we find it difficult to believe that they have taken place exactly as they are described in the New York and Washington papers. Take the victory at Moorfield, Virginia, first. If we can credit the Federal account, this was one of the most brilliant exploits of the war. General AVERILL, at the head of a small body of cavalry, which has traversed an incredible number of miles within an extraordinarily brief space of time, attacks two Confederate columns under Generals BRADLEY JOHNSON and M'CAUSLAND, and not only defeats them, but kills a large number, captures 500 or 600 prisoners, and all their artillery and wagons. One general escapes; the other is taken, but subsequently gets off. The remnant of the beaten army has taken to the mountains. Never was defeat so decisive, and yet all was accomplished with the loss to the Federals of 7 killed and 27 wounded. We are consoled for the magnitude of the disaster by the fact that the whole story rests on the evidence of a Federal scout. Turning next to the alleged Confederate disaster at Mobile, we find that it rests on a dispatch from General MAURY of the 8th inst., which appeared in the Richmond Sentinel of the same date, and that this paper by some unusually rapid process reached General BUTLER at Bermuda Hundred also on the same day. The action is described as having taken place thirty miles from Mobile. It is telegraphed to Richmond. So eager are the authorities there to communicate bad news, that they hurry it off at once to the Richmond Sentinel; and so delighted is the editor of the Sentinel, that he despatches a paper to General BUTLER, who, not to be behind-hand, immediately telegraphs the good news to Washington. The action is fought at the entrance of Mobile Bay in the morning, and the result known in the Northern capital in the afternoon. The rapidity is mysterious; but the news may be true. It had been known in New Orleans for some weeks that FARRAGUT had orders to attack the defences of Mobile, and it was reported in that city on the 2nd inst. that operations had commenced. It is by no means impossible, nor even improbable, that by the 5th FARRAGUT's flotilla had succeeded in running the gauntlet of the guns of Forts Morgan and Gaines, and in engaging and defeating the far inferior naval force under Admiral BUCHANAN. But the city of Mobile itself is for the present in very little danger. All that FARRAGUT has done, supposing the account furnished by the Richmond Sentinel to be correct, is to have passed the outer defences. These consist of the two forts Morgan and Gaines, commanding the entrance into Mobile Bay. The sea at this point is three miles wide, and the ship channel is exposed to the fire of both forts. Higher up the bay was moored the Confederate flotilla, which appears to have taken quite its share in resisting the passage. After a severe action the Federals are said to have passed the forts with the loss of one monitor, and were immediately assailed by the Confederate ironclads. The two forces were greatly disproportioned, and it is not surprising that the small defensive squadron was overcome. But the real work of the Federal commander was to come. It is a tolerably easy thing to run past forts at 1,800 yards, where the channel is unobstructed, but higher up the defences of Mobile have been constructed on a most formidable scale. They line the shores of the bay at every available point, and they are described as being the most formidable series of defences in the Confederacy. In conjunction with them are natural obstacles, such as the bar at the mouth of the Dog River, where are only eight feet of water, and where FARRAGUT must leave all his vessels of moderate draught, as well as artificial obstacles caused by the sinking of ships, torpedoes, &c. Nothing but the presence of a large military force operating from Paseagoula could endanger the city itself, and as yet we have no indication of any considerable number of troops being engaged in the expedition. Indeed we venture to think, that although there has been an effort to create a diversion in the rear of Atlanta, there is no serious attempt to capture Mobile, and that the great object was to give relief to the blockading squadron constantly threatened by the Confederate ironclads, and if possible to obtain a base for future operations against the town by the reduction of Forts Morgan and Gaines. Whether the measures of FARRAGUT will have the desired effect we know not. Mobile is 300 miles from Atlanta, and has a garrison quite able to protect her against any force the Federals can for the present bring against her. It is difficult to see how the operations of the Federal fleet in Mobile harbour can affect HOOD's position at Atlanta, or any useful diversion can be made except by a powerful land force acting in cooperation with the navy. At this moment the Federals have too much work on hand with their main armies to be able to spare men for the attack on Mobile.

In Virginia and Georgia matters have altered but little within the last week or two. GRANT was at the latest dates still before Petersburg, although four army corps were reported to have reached Washington for the protection of the Northern frontier. Rumours were current of a new movement on his part, but we attach very little importance to them. All that is known is that GRANT is clinging to his enchantments with his usual tenacity, with every reasonable hope of triumph completely vanished. Whether his division of his forces will not give LEE the opportunity he has so long desired, of striking a blow with something like an equality of force, or whether LEE's spare divisions have been despatched to the relief of Atlanta, the next mail may inform us. In the meantime it is clear that SHERMAN's progress is stayed, if not permanently checked. After fighting three or four great battles he is unable to invest the city, or make any impression on the Confederate lines. His cavalry after suffering repeated disaster has been almost destroyed by the Confederates, and its leader, STONEMAN, a dashing and experienced officer, made prisoner. The communications of Atlanta with the South are still open, and there is a circuitous but perfectly safe route by which troops can be transported from Richmond to Atlanta. It is hinted in the columns of the Northern press that the ostensible gathering of Confederates on the borders of Maryland is to cover the march of large reinforcements to General HOOD, and we are inclined to believe in some such project. Twenty thousand of LEE's veterans despatched to reinforce HOOD would render SHERMAN's hold upon Georgia, Tennessee, and even Kentucky a matter of very great doubt. If LEE can hold Petersburg with BEAUREGARD's corps, and at the same time keep the whole North in alarm, he can surely spare a few regiments to save Atlanta. A decisive Confederate victory in Georgia would probably seal the fate of Mr. LINCOLN's Administration, and perhaps pave the way to substantial peace negotiations.

Confederate Financial Prospects and Plans.

IN the brilliant administration which we predict for the new Confederate Secretary of the Treasury, it is only justice to Mr. MEMMINGER to remember that the most dangerous crisis in the financial situation was actually passed when the reins of office were transferred, and that the measures to which the Confederacy looks hopefully for relief, were already in successful operation. These measures, forming in the aggregate a system of unprecedented comprehensiveness, may be classed under two heads. Those by which, under the double action of compulsory funding and rigid taxation, the redundant currency is reduced within manageable dimensions, had already, at the date of the late Secretary's report, commenced to exert their salutary effect, as is proved by the enormous excess of the appropriations under previous estimates over the actual expenditures of the different departments of the Government. The other class of measures, by which the foreign commerce of the country is made an arm of the national defence, have worked with even more rapid efficacy, as is proved by the vigorous importation of Confederate cotton into Liverpool and the present quotations of the Confederate foreign loan, which even the news of a naval defeat off Mobile cannot depress below double the merchantable value of corresponding Federal securities. The principle which underlies these measures is that the precious stores of cotton which the world outside is eager to buy at even five times its price inside the blockade are so much sap and life-blood in the body politic, not only not to be squandered, but to be rendered most efficiently available for the public good. The Legislature reasoned that blockade-running was theoretically and practically a military operation, and should be subject to the same laws. No one dreams of supplying a camp or an army upon abstract theories of political economy, and the Confederate country is only a vast camp, and the Confederate people a vast army. It was a long time before the statesmen of the South, all educated in a sect militant of uncompromising free trade, could bring themselves to acknowledge that there might be exceptions to their favourite rule, and that while poison would always remain poison, it might at times be a necessary and even the only remedy of a morbid frame. The interval of hesitation did much mischief. It bled the Confederacy for the advantage of adventurers who, while pocketing their spoils, claimed to be public benefactors. It placed the credit of the Government into the hands of men without credit, and at the mercy of firms of straw. There is in the throes of every national crisis a brief period during which the contractor or fournisseur is a patriotic hero, quickly followed by a reaction which denounces him with equal vehemence as a robber. A people which entered upon a war of self-defence with the determination that every man's life and every woman's jewels should be the public property, if necessary, was not likely to labour long under such a fatal delusion. Where every one's devotion was exposed to so crucial a test, sham pretensions to patriotism and disinterestedness could not long endure. At the same time the genius of the Southern people is so little prone to centralisation that they were saved the error of falling into an opposite extreme, and despising the genuine aid which private enterprise, and skill, and experience could alone afford. A middle ground was therefore occupied and firmly held. The discovery had been made, and was acted upon, that if private enterprise could profitably run the blockade, a great Government with a Treasury Department to manage the financial transactions, with a War Department to superintend transportation and storage, with a Navy Department to select vessels and crews, with an astonishingly solid credit abroad, could at least do the same. But while this discovery was acted upon, private capital and private enterprise were not discouraged from the competition, provided only that a reasonable guarantee was given that for every bale of cotton privately exported there should be returned an equivalent of practical utility. The result has been that the Confederate armies were never better supplied, that the agents of the Government buy at the lowest cash prices in European markets what previously was paid at fabulous rates, that the small foreign loan has been largely diminished by redemption, and, it is no secret to add, that a considerable balance is actually accumulating abroad to the credit of the Confederate Treasury. Never has the financial condition of a belligerent country outside its own boundaries been so soundly prosperous; and to those who know this condition the rumours, periodically propagated by the enemy, of another Confederate foreign war-loan appears simply ridiculous. The only time that such a loan was even thought of, when actually offered, was that to which Mr. Memminger refers in his last report, when he says that military reverses had rendered it impracticable, for a reason he does not state, viz., that the three million loan was then at a quotation at which the Confederate Government was unwilling to discount its credit.

These principles of commercial legislation, under anomalous circumstances, supported as they are by complete success, are now, we believe, cordially approved by all classes and parties in the Confederacy. The only difference of opinion, still giving rise to disputes, is whether the State Government should or should not be placed on the same footing in regard to trade as the Confederate Government. There is much to be said on either side of this discussion. Against the proposed equality there occur to us two formidable objections. One, in theory, is that it would give to the States with seaports of their own and large stores of cotton, like Georgia, the two Carolinas, and Alabama, an advantage over others not so circumstanced, and especially over those which are wholly or in part overrun by the enemy, like Tennessee and Louisiana, and such an advantage is incompatible with that solidarity of interests which makes all the States a unit against the invader. The other objection is a practical one; and it is, that greedy adventurers and speculators upon the public necessity would have the chances in favour of a lax application of the law increased in proportion as they had to deal with eleven Governments instead of only one. Perhaps the best way to reconcile justice and expediency with the principles of the Confederate partnership of States, would consist in the Confederate Government becoming the factor and agent for the individual States in such importations and exportations as they might reasonably require on their separate accounts. This is what, we believe, is substantially the present practice.

The prohibition of luxuries is a necessary corollary of the system. Sumptuary laws, such as virtually are the regulations which we publish in our advertising columns, read oddly in this nineteenth century, and it will be said shock the liberal spirit of the age. But so it shocks, or ought to shock, the liberal spirit of the age, that a nation of professed Republicans vows to subjugate and exterminate, by fire and sword, another materially weaker nation of Republicans, in the name of constitutional liberty and self-government. These prohibitions, during the struggle, mean nothing more than that every bale of cotton which goes to pay for something the nation does not actually need, is wasted, and that every ton of ship-room filled with needless cargo excludes the same weight or size of articles which cannot be done without. The nation's needs are those of a workshop; when with peace the amenities of civilised life shall return, it will be time enough again to buy fine linen, and costly silks, and elegant furniture, and richly-flavoured wines. There is a moral justice, too, in this, that a few giddy and foolish persons should not, by an untimely ostentation, mock and insult the stoic temper of a whole people.

We must not conclude without briefly referring to a subject in connection with Southern finances, which cannot however be treated here as its importance deserves. A passage in the Report of the Secretary of War which we published last week, gives us hope that the Confederate Government has it now under deliberation to apply to its internal economy the same principle which has worked so well abroad. This principle is to substitute cotton, of which there is plenty, as a standard of values for gold, of which there is none. There is now in the Confederacy a stock of cotton of at least three million bales, of which probably not less than one-third is in a condition fit for immediate exportation. Of a large proportion of this the Government is the direct owner. If instead of this property the Government had the value, even at only sixpence a pound, in gold, who can doubt that the Confederate currency would never have lost a specie basis? Why should not a cotton basis, equally available for present purposes, be adopted? Grant that the precious metals are abstractly immeasurably superior to a perishable commodity as a standard of values. But if one cannot have what one wishes, why not make use of what one has? Suppose the Government, in its future disbursements at home as well as abroad, should give promises to pay cotton, instead of promises to pay gold? It is under any conceivable circumstances better able to keep the former than the latter. An order on the Government store-keeper for £100 of cotton at peace prices would therefore at worst be more intrinsically valuable than an order for gold on the Treasury to the same amount. If the experiment succeeded, the cotton promises might be gradually exchanged for the gold promises already issued. To give these cotton promises a saleable value abroad, it would only be necessary to exempt the holders from certain restrictions, whether present or prospective, on the exportation. Already the Government has undertaken to pay the interest on one description of its domestic funded debt in cotton; why not extend this expedient to the principal of its future unfunded debt? The plan would be condemned by a certain class of shallow political economists, who, when they have learned the formulas of the science by rote, fancy they know every possible application of its laws. But must it be necessarily condemned, because of being exceptional and anomalous, by the practical statesmen of a country in which everything is at present anomalous and exceptional?

A Merican Policy.

The daily fluctuations in the value of public securities, although they may not always be predicated upon a substantial foundation, are after all the most trustworthy indications of public sentiment. When stocks go up, it may be regarded as an indubitable fact that confidence is gaining ground, and, when they have a downward tendency or even are stationary, the reverse of this conclusion may be regarded as the deliberate decision of the public mind. Such display of confidence or the absence of it is all the more entitled to consideration from the fact, that it does not proceed from the heart, but from the brain; not from sentiment, or prejudice, or partiality, but from the simple consideration that money is to be lost or gained by the operation. Regarded from this point of view, the striking difference which is observable in the quotations of the respective public securities of the Confederate States and of Mexico, upon the receipt of favourable intelligence, are so marked that the mind naturally seeks for a solution by a comparison of the positions respectively occupied by these two embryo nations. The desperate tenacity of Grant is foiled by the masterly generalship of Lee at Petersburg, and forthwith the Confederate Loan advances 2 per cent. in the Stock Market of London. By the same mail we have intelligence that the Emperor Maximilian has been welcomed to his capital by the enthusiastic acclamations of his loyal subjects, but the securities of Mexico exhibit no symptom of improvement. We learn that Sherman is thundering at the outer defences of Atlanta, but that he is stoutly confronted and kept at bay by the unconquerable Southerners, and again the Confederate bonds, in response to the public opinion of the day, take another upward leap. We learn at the same time that the great chiefs of the party in Mexico opposed to the empire are giving in their adhesion by scores to the new monarch, and yet Mexican securities remain perversely stationary. In the midst of the undecided yet gigantic efforts to 'crush the great rebellion' which have of late signalised the Federal Government, confidence in Confederate securities has constantly increased, until now they stand at almost as high a point as they have ever stood since the commencement of the war. From Mexico the intelligence has been uniformly of a more favourable character than could have been expected by even the most sanguine friends of the Empire, and still the promissory obligations of Mexico to pay money at a future day fail to exhibit a corresponding improvement in the public confidence.

What is the origin of this marked distinction in the results which follow similar or corresponding causes? The answer is obvious. The public have confidence that the Confederate States are seeking to establish a Government independent of foreign control, while the Emperor of Mexico is regarded, whether correctly or not, as but a Proconsul of the Emperor of the French. He is not held by the public opinion of the world to be a monarch with a national policy apart, but simply an exponent or instrument of French policy upon the American continent. Does Napoleon III. desire to maintain friendly relations with the Federal Government, by abstaining from recognising the Government of the Confederacy; the Emperor of Mexico is required to adopt the same policy. This want of public confidence in the new Empire does not proceed wholly from the fact that the policy indicated is intrinsically bad, but that it is a policy imposed by an overruling Power without—a policy not dictated by the interests of the Empire over which Maximilian is the nominal monarch, but by an interest wholly foreign, and in some respects antagonistical. Mexico is thus regarded somewhat in the light of a province of France, without, however, being entitled to that protection which such a relation would enforce from the parent country. In short, it is neither an independent nation acting from its own volition, nor yet a dependency which may of right claim the protection of a master.

Whether or not this public opinion may be well or ill founded, its existence affords the true solution of the apparent enigma in the relative value of the public stocks of these two new American Governments in the money markets of Europe. If it be true, the sooner the Emperor of the French confers upon Maximilian the privilege of independent action, the more speedily will the nascent Empire which he has been the means of establishing in the New World attain to the rank and dignity of a nation. If upon this point public opinion is at fault, the error cannot be too soon eradicated. It may be said that the Emperor of the French can hardly be expected, under the existing state of facts, to surrender at once that supremacy, which he has acquired by the sword over the late Mexican Republic; but Maximilian may well be impressed with the grandeur of the mission he has undertaken. As the chief of an independent nation bordering upon the two rival and warring States of the American continent, how magnificent is the part he might enact in the future of that aggregation of great and growing Powers! It requires no prophetic vision to see already in the near future four of these Powers, the two pacified sections of the late Union, with British America, now forming itself into a federal empire to the northward, and regenerated Mexico to the southward. Of these Mexico, though physically the weakest, would have the inestimable advantage, if her ruler do not let it escape, of entering unimpeded upon her career of self-development, with the best wishes of civilised Europe, while two of the others are still in the agony of a suicidal war, and the fourth in the throes of internal transformation. It is not, therefore, an altogether chimeral vision, that which assigns to Mexico, lately so despised, a leading part in the international drama now enacting on the North American continent. States are great, not so much in proportion to the armies and navies they possess as to the ideas which they represent. What Mexico now wants, to give her prestige abroad and tranquillity at home, is an object worthy of the national ambition, and therefore concentrating all energies and all desires, and conciliating all paltry domestic feuds. It is a policy that shall be truly American, and that shall be inspired by a wise prescience of the future balance of power in the western hemisphere. This policy should have for its central thought, first, the autonomy and internal consolidation of the four distinct nationalities into which North America geographically and historically divides; secondly, the closest ties of amity and absolute free trade among the nationalities thus established. Already the rumours of peace which come to us from across the Atlantic, indicate that North and South are beginning to read their true destinies by a clearer light. Ere long the cry may come: distinctive national existences, but no custom house from the Great Lakes to the Rio Grande. It would only require of the EMPEROR of MEXICO a timely perception of his own opportunity, to make that cry embrace three empires, with not a customs' barrier from the Great Lakes to the Isthmus of Tehuantepec. The last remaining step would soon be taken by the British colonial federation, and North America would present to the world an unexampled spectacle of external grandeur and power, combined with internal peace secured by an even adjustment and equipoise of material force.

What the measures are by which the Emperor MAXIMILIAN may act this brilliant rôle, it is not for us to indicate. It is sufficient to say that, situated as he is, a bold policy is safer than a timid one or no policy at all. As regards France, she is equally in honour bound not to withdraw her support prematurely, whether he places himself in the attitude of a proconsular titular monarch or of an independent sovereign, and in the latter attitude he is less likely to need that support. As regards his neighbour, he cannot but know that, with the South for his friend, he may laugh at the enmity of the North, and with the South as an enemy—whatever be her relations to the North—the friendship of the latter, even if it could be depended upon, is of no avail.

THE NEW YORK CORRESPONDENT OF THE 'DAILY NEWS.'—The New York Correspondent of the Daily News, whom we have frequently paid the compliment of quoting, is so ungrateful as to complain of the spirit in which we have done so. In a late letter, published by our cotemporary on the 23rd inst., he actually gets into a passion, calls us with wrathful inverted commas 'an organ,' at which we are not greatly offended, and oddly enough adds to this that we are 'notoriously supported by Confederate speculators.' He then goes on to aver in the same connection that he has never dined with more than two of the members of Mr. Lincoln's Cabinet, on neither of which occasions his letters to the News were the subject of conversation, and that he has never received even so slight a favour as a pass from anybody connected with the Federal Government. All this seems to us much rather to prove Yankee ingratitude and bad manners than any fault of ours towards the aforesaid correspondent. We hasten, however, to sooth his wounded feelings by assuring him that we are among his most constant readers and most sincere admirers. We admire him for his ingenuity, which is never at fault, and still more for a quality which we 'Confederate speculators' cannot help admiring even in a foe—the pluck which enables him to write by every steamer letters which the same mail contradicts, to prop up a cause which ninety-nine out of every hundred Englishmen disapprove if not utterly detest. The perseverance and consistency with which he has accomplished this arduous task prove, what formerly we were inclined to doubt, that, though eccentric in his partialities, he is a true Briton. With this expression of admiration we should, however, like to couple a modest piece of advice. Inasmuch as there may be some readers of his who also read other papers, it would be as well not to count too much upon their credulity. When he estimates Grant's losses in the affair of the 30th at 240, we may charitably set it down as a slip of the pen or a blunder of the types, but we can scarcely do so when he calls Mr. Lincoln's ultimatum to the Niagara peace propositions a 'safe conduct' for the better opening of negotiations. We would rather recommend to him as his model the following passage which we quote approvingly from his own letter of August 10:—

Grant's campaign has, ever since the late fiasco at Petersburg, been undergoing vigorous discussion, both in the newspapers and in private circles. Those who hold that it has proved a failure have certainly, so far, the facts in their favour. The fighting from the Wilderness to Richmond consisted of a series of vigorous attempts to fling Lee to the westward of the railroad, and thus secure possession of the inner line, and of the approach to Richmond over the Chickahominy. These were all foiled by the end of the succession of elaborate fortifications which Lee had constructed the previous year, and which, with such troops as his, he had little difficulty in holding. The attempt to seize upon his communications with the South, by crossing the James River, cannot, also, be said to be a success. So far they are open, and have only been subjected to one temporary interruption. The damage inflicted on the Darville-road by Wilson's raid has been repaired, and the hold on the Weldon-road which Grant had at one time secured he has since been compelled to relax. Two desperate assaults on the works at Petersburg have been repulsed, and the Federal cavalry has been so exhausted by the tremendous labours it underwent during Grant's advance to his present position, that it will be unfit for some weeks to come for further exertion. It is now engaged in renovating and refitting.—Daily News, August 22.

THE NEGRO UNDER FEDERAL RULE.

To the Editor of THE INDEX.

NEW ORLEANS, LOUISIANA: July 30, 1864.

SIR,—That a boon ill-bestowed may become a curse rather than a blessing to the receiver is a fact of common experience. The boon in itself may be one of unmixed good, but the good to be derived from it must depend upon the time, manner, and conditions of the bestowal, and the ability and desire of the recipient to make the most of his opportunity. It cannot be denied that in many philanthropic schemes zeal outruns discretion; and my own observation in Louisiana has taught me that there is a mad, fanatical, hate-engendered philanthropy which works its will regardless of consequences. I do not intend to discuss the question of slavery or the wisdom of emancipation—not even to express an opinion on these points—but simply to speak of things as they are, deriving my facts solely from official documents or from my own observation.

The boon of freedom to the slave has turned to ashes in the first year of his emancipation, if we may trust the declarations of Federal officials, those who lured him from his bondage with visions of liberty and social independence, and who now leave him to perish by the Dead Sea of disappointment, to eat of its ashy fruit, to drink deep of its bitter waters, and to die. I said my facts were derived from observation and official documents. I have, however, concluded to rely solely upon the latter in this letter. I have now before me a copy of an official report from a special agent of the 'Plantation Bureau' of the Treasury Department, who was directed to examine and report the condition of 'all abandoned plantations, or those worked by the Government in the parish of Iberville.' Let us hear what this Government agent has to say upon this subject, and then let the honest Abolitionists of England pronounce judgment upon the spurious philanthropy of their American brethren: 'On visiting these places I found them in the most deplorable condition. On every plantation worked by the Government, or represented to be in the possession of the Government, I found there had not been one day's work performed since the time of their occupation by Lieutenant Hanks's orders in June last to the day of my visit, with the single exception of the White Castle or Vaughan plantation. . . . . Not another will be able to turn out one hogshead of sugar or any other produce. In fact, I honestly declare that the management—if we can with propriety use that word—has been of the most reckless and abandoned character, with a perfect indifference to the interests of the unfortunate negro, as well as the interest of the general Government, which, we have been told, sought the amelioration of these people. In fact it does appear that the agents or overseers placed in charge by Hanks considered they had no other duty to perform than to draw the rations for the dead as well as the living negroes, and their own salaries, and leave everything to run to ruin.' The agent goes on to say that he returned sooner than he should have done, because he could not go on and complete his report with such desolation around me.' He found the sugar cane 'covered with the tie vine and other rank vegetation.' But let us hear what he says about the condition of the 'freed men.' 'The mortality that has taken place in these Government plantations is truly appalling. On the White Castle plantation, out of 300 placed there by Lieutenant Hanks or Captain Miller, there remained in January last but 47 souls to tell the tale of woe. On the Belle Grove plantation, there were placed by the same parties, 325 negroes in June last (1863); 202 of these have died. On the Magnolia plantation 250 negroes were placed; of these 117 have died up to this date.'

The date of this report is omitted in my copy, but I know the agent made his inspection of these plantations in the spring of this year.

'On the Richland plantation there were placed, as near as I can remember, 460. Of the number that died I could obtain no satisfactory information. I found only 192 in the place. On the Grove Place, Bayou Plaquemine, there were placed 300 negroes; the mortality was so great that they had to be buried in trenches, and without coffins. On the Manocaux plantation, 150 were placed; 100 have died. On the Old Hickory plantation there were placed, in June last, 413 negroes; of this number, up to the 11th inst., 243 have died; of the remaining number, 38 are lying sick in their quarters, and 23 are in the hospital, no care being taken of them. On entering the hospital I found the number stated. In their midst lay the corpse of a woman who had died at three o'clock p.m. the day before. There was no Government overseer there, and had not been for three weeks before. The man Ely, who had been placed in charge by Lieutenant Hanks, had left. He said he was going to New Orleans on business, and would be back in four days. He persuaded the negroes to let him have what little money they had to make purchases for them; he went off with three to four hundred dollars, and never returned.'

'The corpse of the woman lay on the bare floor, with a block of wood under her head, but no covering over her. The body had begun to decompose, as the weather was exceedingly hot. . . . . Humanity shudders when we think that in this room, and at the foot of the corpse, lay a woman who had been confined two days before. The child had died, and she herself was in the last stage of a fever of the most contagious character; two children with measles; a poor wretch breathing his last with typhoid fever, and in the next room a woman chained with an ox chain to the bars of the window, by her own son, to prevent her from killing others about the place. On entering the pesthouse the first salutation I heard was, 'Please, massa, for God's sake, give me a drop of water! Ah, massa, we're dying, and nobody to care for us.' I enquired if there had been no doctor to see them. The reply was that the doctor had been there two weeks before, and for the first time had left medicine, but as there was nobody there who could read (the prescription) it had not been given.'

There have been placed on the Miles Taylor plantation 1,100 negroes in all, of whom but 278 remain. The numerous graves here disclose the last resting-place of the poor negro. You will perceive by the annexed document that I have made out a list of articles stolen, as well as of those carried off by order of some one unknown. You will also perceive that I prefer charges against the agents for drawing rations, clothing, wages, &c., for negroes long since dead! The Ventriss plantation was the last visited. I found no overseer there. Of the 538 negroes placed there by Lieutenant Hanks, only 112 are living. This place is a perfect wreck. There has never been any one in charge of the negroes, who have died without the least care, and after death been taken to the fields and left there—food for buzzards. Their skeletons prove the fact.'

One of the stock phrases of the American press is, 'comment is unnecessary.' In this instance comment is certainly unnecessary, and I shall attempt none. But perhaps the reader would like to know whether this report has yet been made public on this side, and whether any action has been had upon it. This report yet sleeps in some pigeon-hole of the 'Plantation Bureau' of the Treasury Department, and the agent who made it has resigned his office in despair, as I understand, of any amelioration of the wretched condition of these 'freedmen and women,' and in disgust at the utter callousness of his superior officers.

A CITIZEN OF NEW ORLEANS.

NEGRO REBELS.—We quote the following from the New York World of August 16: —'If the negroes are as intelligent as the abolitionists say, then the proclamation of freedom which has been hung out to them ought to be hauled down and retracted. They are the most persistent of rebels, if intelligent enough to be freemen and citizens, as the Republicans desire. Their white masters we have not even offered to bribe. The policy of the Government has been to bully and drive them back to their allegiance. The policy of Mr. Lincoln has been to threaten confiscation, emancipation, subjugation, and every other horror, as a punishment for their rebellious contumacy. We have given the white men of the South no ground for hope, no object in life, except in the success of the rebellion. But to the negro—intelligent, equal, fit for freedom and citizenship, so say the miscegenators—we have proffered every boon, life, liberty, citizenship, and a share in his master's acres. Meanwhile they have gone on planting, sowing, and reaping the harvests which have sustained those who have kept them in bondage, which have invigorated the bodies and made possible the exertions of those whose rebellion has well-nigh ruined the republic. But for the negro producers the rebellion could never have survived six months. These negro rebels we still degrade ourselves by proffering freedom to as the price of their desertion of a cause which they chiefly sustain. They still laugh at our offer, and "hoe corn for massa."'

MR. LINCOLN'S PERSONAL SECURITY.—The President regards a steamboat lying ready in the Potomac, and a locomotive fired up on the Baltimore Railroad, and the Scotch plaid which has recently been sent him from Scotland, as an ample personal security against capture.—New York Paper.

FEDERAL ATROCITY.—The Springfield Republican says: —'General Hunter owe it to his own reputation to explain the destruction of Governor Letcher's house, or to deny that he ordered it, if such is the fact. Equally unjustifiable is the capture of three or four hundred factory girls, at Rossville, Georgia, and their transportation as prisoners northward, to be sent beyond the limits of the United States, it is reported. These girls are no more hostile to us than the rest of the women of the South, probably less so, and it is a great cruelty to take them from their homes and put them unprotected among strangers. The Indians make prisoners of women, but it is a new thing among white and civilised Americans. Against the introduction of all barbarities into the war the true friends of the country should protest. It is a horrible enough struggle at the best, and there is no need to add to its inevitable evils.'

THE FEDERAL WOUNDED.—A New York paper says: 'There are 15,000 sick and wounded soldiers in the Washington hospitals, and in other military hospitals throughout the States there are 90,000, and in camp hospitals 50,000, making a total of 155,000.

THE AMERICAN QUESTION IN GERMANY.

FRANKFORT-ON-MAINE: August 20, 1864.

THE sharp but wholesome warnings of the Times' 'City Article' during the past few months have at last begun to tell upon our money market, though I fear too late to prevent much individual ruin and misery. At all events the delusion is on the wane, and this fact is the more significant, as, like bubbles when once pricked, speculative epidemics subside with astonishing rapidity. The time is not far distant when the rage for United States 5.20 Bonds will be remembered with the same surprise and unavailing repentance as the Tulip Mania, or the Law Bubbles. The salutary change now manifest is, doubtless, aided by the melancholy unanimity of the accounts received by the great business houses through their commercial correspondence from the States, coupled with the significant fact of heavy orders for manufactured goods being countermanded by every mail. Primarily, however, I believe it mainly attributable to the cold logic of your stock exchange as translated into the columns of the Times. If the Germans had to depend upon their own press for the facts of the American war, and the financial prospects of the Federal States, they might, at least until quite recently, have still been discounting Mr. Seward's drafts on victory at 60 or 90 days. What scanty American news gets into the German papers is all couleur de rose. The correspondence appears almost all furnished by Federal recruiting crimps; and the meagre telegrams, omitting frequently the most important facts, have a suspicious resemblance to the tricks of 'bull' speculators. With a highly intelligent public like the German, such culpable neglect of the duties of the press, or such systematic deception, must sooner or later lead to a violent reaction, and it is the premonitory symptoms of this reaction, thoroughly genuine and spontaneous, which are discernible, and which I deem of sufficient importance to bring to the notice of your readers.

The Frankfort Journal, one of the oldest newspapers in Germany and probably in the world, being nearly coeval with the invention of printing, opens the ball in its impression of August 17. The article is marked by such admirable good sense and such unexpected emphasis that I translate it entire:—

The latest news from the theatre of the American war drives the official intelligence addressed to our bourse close to the wall. Its effect would, however, be more beneficial if it could once for all destroy the illusions which are fostered to a criminal degree from certain quarters, and if it could open the eyes of us Germans to our true interest. It is clear that heretofore we have but little understood this interest, when we allowed ourselves, by the continued predictions of prospective great achievements, to be deceived as to the real situation of the belligerents; or looked quietly on while our sons were enticed into an emigration which exhausts the country, or opened wide the savings of our people to be plundered by a speculation without prospect or foundation. It is surely not our German interest to aid in an inhuman butchery by contingents of men and money. Even the sentiment of common humanity revolts at the needless prolongation of a war of this character. But when we see Germany in particular impoverished by stock-jobbers, and through the misleading of insincere guides, directly and indirectly abetting a maniacal civil strife on another hemisphere, it is time that the voice of warning should be clearly heard, and that voice cannot be too loud. Let us not be accused of extreme opinions or expressions. For such squanderings of human life as in this American war, any phrase is too mild. The interests of mankind demand its cessation; the interests of Germany demand the restoration of that commercial intercourse with America, the interruption of which has caused such deep wounds everywhere among us. But if the Southern part of America is subjugated, devastated, and held under by military force, peace will be barren, independently of the fact that the North must permanently ruin itself before it achieves even this deplorable success. The exportations of the South are by far the more numerous and important; in the South, therefore, we find the champions of free trade. The tariffs which at any time hampered the trade with the Union, are naturally the inventions of the North. It is German interest, both that there should be peace, and that the South should be an independent State. Who tells us otherwise either deceives himself, or presumes upon our ignorance. This peace and Southern independence can scarcely now come too soon.

An equally outspoken and earnest article appeared in the Cologne Gazette, the Times of the German press, in its number of the 16th, and is reproduced in full in the Frankfort Volksfreund of 19th. I regret that the great length of this article forbids my giving you more than extracts.

It would almost appear as if Germany and Holland, intentionally or otherwise, were destined to pay a great part of the enormous reckoning which the war in North America is costing. This is not a question of sympathies or antipathies; it is simply a question whether our good countrypeople are wise in handing over their solid cash to the Finance Minister of the Union, and identifying their private fortunes with the event-laden, and at best changeful financial future of the United States. In South Germany as well as in Holland there is at present a rush for American Government securities which gives a vertigo to the reflecting and sober looker-on, and which inspires doubts of the politico-economical good sense of many of the great European capitalists. North America, in any event, cannot avoid considerable internal revolutions or transformations; these must render standing armies and large navies indispensable. Even in the event of peace, therefore, the present financial embarrassments will, in presence of such wants, be only slowly remedied; in the not improbable prospect of new wars—say with Mexico, France, or England—not at all. We may give our sympathies for the cause of the North, our admiration assuredly not to a hair-brained administration of the Federal Government!

Then comes a quotation from the Aktionär of Frankfort, a paper thoroughly in the Northern interest, but which in this instance also advises its readers to prudence. The Aktionär, as quoted by the Cologne Gazette, says:—

We remember quite well how persons who prided themselves on an accurate knowledge of American affairs used to say that the Americans, in their promises to pay, whether of corporations or of States, would always keep in mind their credit abroad. Yet it is notorious that that credit has never been held so light as by those very corporations and States, and even the State of New York has been the first to repudiate a plighted engagement. The German capitalist must therefore be careful to probe the security before he decides upon further investments in American stocks. Momentarily they are certainly 'fancy stocks' (Spielpapieren) of the first class, but no man can tell what fate they may have next year, and that these stocks are likely, at all events, to fall still lower is proved by past experience.

The Cologne Gazette follows this quotation by another from the New York World, reviewing the last financial statement of Mr. Chase, and editorially adopts the reasoning of the New York print in the following words:—

No sane man who knows Washington of to-day will consider our statement exaggerated—least of all the Secretary of the Treasury himself, who has long deplored, both privately and publicly, the extravagance of Congress and the different Departments—that without an immediate return to economy, and without decisive military successes, every measure for the support of the Federal credit must be abortive. There is on July 1 of this year a debt of $1,800,000,000, which grows at the ratio of $1,000,000,000 a year, though even the past may not be a fair standard for the military expenditures of the future. Supposing the war to last another year, and only on the same scale, we shall on July 1, 1865, be in presence of a debt of $3,000,000,000. But is it probable that the depreciation of the paper-money will, during that period, be kept within the same bounds? Nine months ago the paper-dollar was worth 84; to-day it is still 42, that is to say, exactly the one-half; and the downfall took place with constantly accelerating velocity! Under such conditions who will venture to estimate what the bt will actually be? Does not the mere probable estimate lead us directly to a statistic of despair?

Better evidence, however, than that which I have extracted from the leading organs of German public opinion, that the change of feeling is not merely superficial or temporary, may be afforded by the comparative quotations of Federal bonds since May last:

May 1	64	61¾
June 1	61¾	59¾
July 1	54	52¼
August 1	43¼@44	42½
August 19	40¼@39⅝	39@37⅞

I have now before me two private letters, one from a Southerner travelling in Europe, the other from a German of high social standing, both writers men of quick intelligence, accurate observation, and unquestionably reliable. The Southerner writes from Hanover, a few days since:—

I think that public opinion in this part of the Vaterland becomes daily more and more in favour of the 'Rebel States.' In the different trips that I have taken through the neighbouring country, I have found a great many people kindly disposed towards our bleeding country, and always ready to admire the bravery and daring that have ever characterised the behaviour of the Southern troops in their dearly-bought victories. In fact, the public opinion of the whole kingdom, as far as I am able to judge, is more in favour of the Confederates than of the other party. The North is passing un mauvais quart-d'heure just now.

My German friend encloses several newspaper extracts, some of which I have already quoted, with the remark: 'It is easy to perceive that a great change in public opinion throughout Germany is actually taking place through the medium of the German press, as regards the civil war in America. Witness, for instance, the tone of several articles recently appearing in some of the most widely circulated political journals of the country.'

(POSTSCRIPT.)

FRANKFORT, August 22.

I have further to transmit slips of the Journal of this city, of yesterday's and to-day's dates, being the first two of a series of articles on the American question from the German point of view, under the title 'Germany and America.' They cannot fail to interest your readers. Also a significant extract from the Frankfort Post Zeitung of yesterday. I hope to have quite a batch of translations for your next week's number. The U.S. Bonds to-day, under the news from Mobile, have slightly recovered since my last quotation. At that time the market showed signs of panic.

LIEUTENANT-GENERAL S. D. LEE.—The Marion (Mississippi) Clarion gives the following brief military biography of this officer, recently appointed Lieut.-General. He is a native of South Carolina and a graduate of West Point, where he was honoured with a diploma in 1854. He was a classmate of Generals J. E. B. Stuart, J. B. Villepigue, W. D. Pender, and Horace Randall. After leaving West Point, he entered the regular service as Second Lieutenant of the Fourth Artillery, and was subsequently promoted First Lieutenant of the First Regiment of Regulars. Shortly after his native State left the old Union, General Lee resigned his position in the service of the United States, and repaired to South Carolina, where he entered the army of that State as Captain, early in March 1861. He served with Beauregard in the taking of Fort Sumter, and after the strife was fully inaugurated and a hostile army on the soil of the Old Dominion, he repaired to Virginia with a battery of light artillery, and there, with the legion of Hampton, figured conspicuously and honourably in many of the sanguinary engagements. He was soon honoured with the rank of Major, next Lieutenant-Colonel, and then Colonel. He commanded a battery on the Potomac for some time; was in the battle of Seven Pines and the seven days' fight around Richmond; was next assigned to duty as Colonel of the Fourth Virginia Cavalry, and subsequently to a battery of artillery that gained distinction in the second battle of Manassas and at Sharpsburgh. When a commander was needed for the defences of Vicksburg in the fall of 1862, President Davis sent him to defend the stronghold of Mississippi, having conferred upon him the rank of Brigadier-General. He commanded at the battle of Chickasaw Bayou, above Vicksburg, where, in December 1862, he whipped Sherman and Morgan Smith, who brought a large force against his heroic little band. At the battle of Baker's Creek he commanded a brigade of Georgians, and, during the siege of Vicksburg, held that portion of Stevenson's line so furiously assaulted on May 19 and 22. Shortly after the surrender, General Lee was appointed to the rank of Major-General, and assigned to the command of all the cavalry in the Mississippi Department.

THE CONFEDERATE CAUSE IN FRANCE.

PARIS: August 23.

THE news of Grant's defeat before Petersburg has sadly discomposed those journals here which side with the North. The Siècle is shocked at the thought of iniquity triumphing, and finds fault with Providence for not ordering things better. The Opinion takes it somewhat more quietly, and asserts that notwithstanding this ephemeral advantage, 'the South is exhausted, and would unhesitatingly renounce all idea of independence if she could preserve slavery.'

Hence you perceive that the course adopted by the supporters of the North among the Parisian journals differs in no respect from that pursued by the whole Northern press. At Paris and at New York their tactics are the same, and these consist in representing the South as fighting preeminently for slavery. Scores of times have the Pays, the Patrie, and the Constitutionnel explained the real causes of the war; and week by week the excellent American correspondents of the Moniteur and the Patrie portray the various phases of this grand conflict, showing that, from whatever side it is regarded, it is exclusively a war of independence. But all to no purpose. The blind organs of Radicalism in Europe are stubbornly resolved to see in us nothing but aristocrats bent upon founding an empire on the oppression of an inferior race.

I say 'blind organs,' because I give them credit for honesty in their error, which I can easily account for their having fallen into. Before the war the American Union was looked upon in Europe as the prototype of free government. Democrats, Republicans, Liberals of all shades—in short, the whole body of champions of the rights of man and of nations—regarded that Government as the result of the most learned and profound political elaboration, and admiringly held it forth as the choicest of models. All at once the revolution overturned the idol at the feet of its worshippers. Hereupon the reactionists, the enemies of liberty—in fact, all the representatives of the past who tremble at the very sound of the word 'Republic'—raised an outcry of triumph, and tendered to the South, whose part they do not comprehend, the tribute of their dangerous sympathy.

Viewing events only on their surface, and failing to perceive that the South, by her very separation from the North, was saving the principle of Republicanism, which was undergoing a gradual but steady process of obliteration in the midst of Yankee corruptions, the Liberals in Europe made friends with the Federals, exhibiting the greater sympathy for them because the Conservatives favoured the South.

Passing by slavery, of which the real circumstances are so little known in Europe, there are other reasons besides the grievance they feel over the rupture of the Republic which alienate the French Democrats from the Confederates. The French Democrats and the American Democrats belong to two widely different schools of politics. The first espouse Jacobin traditions, and are centralisers; the second espouse Jeffersonian traditions, and are decentralisers. The one party are for establishing liberty by means of authority; the other, on the contrary, would establish it by the gradual extinction of authority. The Jacobin school are of opinion that a powerful government is necessary to the maintenance of liberty, while the Jefferson school look upon all governments as administrations which should be simplified as much as possible.

This difference of opinion on political matters sufficiently accounts for the partialities of the French Liberal press towards the Federals. They find among these latter all the traditions of their own Convention of 1791: namely, an enormous display of force, the centralisation of administrative functions, Republican institutions, and extreme levelling theories. To those who view things as they are, it seems strange that an enlightened and generous people, who have always a ready hand for the victims of great misfortunes—who answered as one man the Poles' cry of distress—and who are undoubted representatives of progress—should thus close their eyes to the true case of the Southern Confederacy, turn a deaf ear to her just claims, and open wide their hearts to the Yankees. But to those who share these prejudices against the South, there is no contradiction in this fact. I am convinced that the majority of unfriendly journalists sincerely believe that they are acting logically and faithfully to their Liberal traditions in giving their sympathies to the North.

By a strange phenomenon in moral optics, industry, commerce, national wealth, civilisation, enlightenment, justice, right, and liberty appear to many French Liberals to be exclusively on the side of the Federals. Truly, these are errors which must be dispelled at whatever cost—these are prejudices which must be uprooted. In my idea, it is a grievous mistake to imagine that, because the South has the sympathies of the French Government, she can dispense with the support of Liberal opinion. For the Liberals, however they may go astray in matters of general politics, derive from the idea of progress, of which they are the representatives, a force which carries all before it. Onward they march along the pathway of the future, and with them marches all that has youth, strength, or interest in life. I make bold to say, that if the South had the support of that small phalanx of Liberal Frenchmen which defends with so much courage and self-denial that liberty for which our brethren are pouring out their blood in America, the moral force thereby imparted to the Confederacy would far exceed any she might gain from her official recognition by more than one Government. The friends of the South have too much neglected Liberal opinion. I think they have done wrong, for if not recognised as the reigning influence, it is certainly that which controls the world, and those who appear to defy it the most are often the very persons who suffer most severely from its influence.

It is, I own, no easy task to open the eyes of these prejudiced people and convince them that slavery will disappear gradually from the South in a manner which will obviate injury either to the black or to the white race—that the Confederate States are essentially Democratic States—and that the only genuine Republican doctrines which still exist in America are to be found among these Confederates—these Democrats who are so unjustly stigmatised as aristocrats. But even this task is possible. What the friends of the South have already accomplished in this direction is a sample of what may yet be done.

It must be admitted that at the present moment the more advanced organs of Liberal opinion here exhibit less vehemence in their attacks upon the South than they did a twelvemonth back. The Siècle, for example, which could not forego an opportunity that recently occurred of attacking the Confederates, manifests somewhat of coolness to-day. It is always very unjust to the Confederates; but this time it is not so violent. Truth has had fair-play. The Journal des Débats, whose zeal in behalf of the North has for the last few months been of so ardent a character, has also strangely cooled, and, although still continuing to uphold the North, has ceased its attacks upon the Confederacy. In fact, two Liberal writers (the only ones, it is true), M. Chatard, of the Presse, and M. Alfred Assolant, of the Courrier du Dimanche, have penned some notices which are not only very truthful, but highly flattering to the South. These are, then, so many signs that the Liberal opinion of France is not systematically hostile towards us, and that it is coming round to us in proportion as it becomes more enlightened.

Unfortunately the French journals lack those opportunities of enlightenment which the English press enjoys. First of all, they have to translate everything; moreover, the correspondence system is almost unknown to them. In America and in England every paper has two, three, or four special correspondents occupied in transmitting from different political centres authentic information on the progress of events. French journalism, in this point as in many others, is far behind English journalism. Whenever any great war breaks out, even the most important of the Parisian papers seldom count a single correspondent abroad. Now, however, since American affairs have assumed such immense importance, several of these journals have secured the services of American correspondents, who have largely helped in correcting the ideas of Frenchmen on the nature of our revolution. Among these correspondents must be mentioned those of the Moniteur and the Patrie. The first of these withholds his signature; but he is evidently a man who unites to a sound judgment a thorough knowledge of American affairs. The correspondent of the Patrie is M. Albert Fabre, late major in the 10th Louisiana Regiment, and one of the journalists most favourably known at New Orleans, where for some time past he has conducted the Louisiana Courier. The letters of these two gentlemen, as well as those transmitted by the Correspondance Havas, have contributed in no small degree to rectify the erroneous ideas which malevolence and ignorance had propagated in regard to Southern institutions and the causes of the war. On a future occasion I will furnish you with a few extracts from their communications, which will enable your readers to form a more exact estimate of the influence they have exercised over public opinion in France. For the present I content myself with directing attention to two excellent articles in La France and the Globe respectively.

The first of these papers, under the title of 'Les Evénements d'Amérique,' speaks out against the North in a tone of extreme severity.

The general opinion (it remarks) seemed to be that in this supreme struggle between might and heroism, conquest and independence, the victory would eventually rest on the side of grand battalions, and that the Southern cause was fated to succumb; but Atlanta and Petersburg, in the first place, and the invasion of Maryland in the next, have demonstrated the capabilities of the Confederate States for offensive operations.

The bravery of the South has everywhere been equal to her perils and her trials. Three years of a crisis unparalleled perhaps in history, have failed to wear her out; despite all her reverses, she remains precisely as she was at the moment when she unanimously seceded from from the North—a nation entire and distinct, enjoying her own government, supporting her own armies, living under her own laws, and resolved to die in behalf of her independence.

What invests this article with peculiar importance is the fact of its bearing the signature of M. Garcin; for the Parisian press are well aware that the money articles of La France, which bear this gentleman's signature, are written by M. de la Gueronnière, a member of the Senate, and chief editor of the journal, who only writes articles meant to engage public attention.

The other article, of which I would speak, is by Mr. Duckett, the writer in the Globe who handles the American question, and to some of whose writings I have already drawn your notice. This fresh article turns on the financial condition of the North. The writer details the squandering of the public wealth which has been going on since the war began, and conclusively shows that the continuance of the struggle will ruin the country without advancing in the least the cause of the Union.

In its bulletin the Globe thus discusses the American question. Quoting from the leading article in the last number of THE INDEX on the chances of peace, it endorses all its conclusions, backing itself by the following considerations:—

The failure of the campaign so boastingly undertaken by General Grant ought to open the eyes of the infatuated Northerners, and afford them a glimpse of the impossibility of reestablishing the Union by force. After two years of a sanguinary war, the two belligerent parties find themselves just as they were at the opening of hostilities.

Death has thinned the ranks of the combatants; pillage and incendiarism have devastated their cities and plains; commerce is annihilated; the treasury exhausted; hatred alone keeps up the spirit of the two parties; and Mr. Lincoln ought first to ask himself what would be the consequences of the forcible submission of the South should he even succeed in reconquering her. The idea of cementing the Union with blood is an absurdity.

CONFEDERATE CAUSE IN LANCASHIRE.

MANCHESTER: August 24, 1864.

THE remarkable letter that has recently reached this country from the pen of the escaped slave, Frederick Douglass, has been accepted by the Southern Independence Association as a most suitable and telling travelling companion to Lord Edward Howard's speech, and, as such, will enjoy an amount of publicity hardly anticipated for it by the writer. 'We do not know,' says the Guardian, 'how Federal advocates in this country will deal with the statements in Mr. Douglass's letter. To us they seem to deprive them of the last rag of decent excuse for countenancing the aggressive spirit of Northern statesmen. Henceforth they must admit, on the testimony of the most ultra of Abolitionists, that the promise of freedom to the slave is a mockery, the hope of emancipation a delusion, the affectation of regard for the welfare of the negro a snare, the purpose of the North one of simply selfish aggrandisement, and its pretence to any high or honourable motive in commencing or continuing the war a wretched and miserable sham.'

Our ex-Manchester 'philanthropist, orator, and man of affairs,' George Thompson (in whose career we shall not cease to take some kind of interest), has received, it seems, from a New York College the degree of LL.D., and Yankee latinity appears to have been rather put about in the discharge of the ceremonious office. The doctor, according to the New York Independent, sat upon the platform, unconscious of the impending 'blow.' President Cummings, in conferring it, made, says the same journal, even an 'unknown tongue' eloquent with eulogy, and brought down the house in applause as he called him (sic)—'Humanitatis et hominis amicus, apostolos libertatis eloquens, catenorum ruptor, oppressorum lætitia.' No wonder if we are told in the next breath that, smitten by the sudden stroke, the object of the eulogy bowed his head and kept it covered till the ceremonies of the occasion were concluded.

We have heard nothing more at present of the notable scheme of 'Federal emigration,' as concocted by the United States Government, and considerately set forth for our instruction in a recent article in the New York Times. Neither Lancashire nor 'West York' has been favoured as yet with the promised (or threatened) visit of General Bowen, or any of his subordinates; and it is quite possible, if the 'General' could fully anticipate the kind of reception he is likely to be honoured with, he would advise himself better than to attempt to open any of his 'subvention' offices anywhere in these parts. The sturdy labourers of 'West York' will be apt to remember the case of the young Yorkshire lad, as told the other day by the Richmond correspondent of the Times. Nor will the operatives of Glossop, or any other manufacturing town in Derbyshire, Cheshire, or Lancashire, have forgotten the scandalous necessity that urged Lord Edward Howard to deliver that celebrated speech, which by this time has found its way into nearly every household where the warning was most needed. The game is up for 'subvention schemes,' and the time, I hope, is gone by for our toleration of the attempt to launch them.

Nothing coming from Mobile can be without interest just now, and I have therefore much pleasure in extracting a few sentences from a letter recently received by a gentleman of high standing in the Manchester trade from his correspondent at that port.

'It is a very great while since I last had this pleasure. The excitement of war has all along kept our minds and hearts on the stretch, and the usual matters of everyday life (as it used to be) have an exceedingly dull, flat, stale, and unprofitable flavour about them. The end of the war is at last promising to make its appearance. Our danger—thanks be to God!—has long since reached its culminating point. . . . The most astounding feature in this war is the unparalleled system of downright falsehood which the Yankees have pursued on every occasion. It is truly wonderful! They have lied to Europe, and in the most barefaced manner they have lied to their own people. However, some few of their public men from the West and one or two of their journals are beginning to be outspoken. The New York Journal of Commerce, one of the few respectable papers of that section, says:—'Ruin is before us as a people, a nation, an Union, if we go on under present guidances with the principles which now prevail in the Halls of Congress and in the President's house. All the promises and prophecies of the men who led the Radical party are but a repetition of what just such men promised and prophesied for other nations in other times, and the end always was as it will now be—destruction. It is useless to speculate on what a few weeks may decide, the results of the campaign in Virginia; but it may be doubted if any possible success of General Grant can save the North from repudiation, bankruptcy, and ruin.' Our final success is now only a mere question of a little while. There never were better armies than those of Lee, Johnston (on this side the Mississippi), and Kirby Smith (on the west side), food, clothing, discipline, and determined spirit, and a firm and deep abiding trust in God! How can such troops be whipped? Odds appear never to deter their leaders whenever an opportunity to strike occurs. . . Our harvest is very abundant—wheat particularly. Our people have pretty much made up their minds that recognition by European Powers will come just as soon as their interest moves them to it, and not any sooner. Certainly it is far better that the States should achieve their independence without help or the appearance of it; and that they can do so does not admit of a doubt. . . . My son, who was wounded two years ago, had a surgical operation performed lately, by which it is hoped he will save his leg, and be able to move about again after a while. My own health, I am happy to say, is good: am connected with the corps of engineers for this Department of the Gulf, for it is expected that every one should render some assistance to the country.'

THE BATTLE BEFORE PETERSBURG.

THE accounts that have appeared in the Northern newspapers of the battle of July 30, are unusually graphic and interesting. Differing in some details they all agree that it was one of the most terrible combats of the war, that the Confederates fought with a degree of coolness and resolution hitherto unsurpassed. No doubt the springing of the mine was a surprise, but it had none of the effects of a surprise except that the gallant men who held the fort were killed. On the side of the Confederates there was no hurrying, and no excitement, but a stern determination to avenge the deaths of their comrades. With a steadiness that only veteran soldiers are capable of, the fire of the musketry was reserved until the assaulting column was near enough for it to be delivered with deadly precision. Without loss of time the cannon poured shot and shell into the cavity formed by the explosion, and into this cavity the Federals had crowded for protection; but they found it a veritable slaughter-pen. The negro troops suffered terribly, and the civilised world must denounce the inhumanity of the Federal commander for sending the unfortunate creatures into the very jaws of death. How could it be expected that negro troops would succeed when white troops had been driven back in confusion? We subjoin the account published in the New York Daily News:—

'The troops were formed in assaulting bodies. Burnside's corps was to lead the charge. Ord's corps, formerly Smith's, was on Burnside's right. The second and the fifth corps were in reserve. They were to advance in support of Burnside and Ord. At forty minutes after four the earth began to tremble. Then a great mass of clay and débris was thrown about one hundred feet in the air. Then a heavy sound, deep and rumbling—differing from any ever before heard by the army of the Potomac—was borne five miles around the fated fort. For a few moments the air was thick with dust, and then the great yawning gap was visible. The mine had done its work. Then the artillery opened. Never on the American continent was heard such an awful roar. It commenced on the right, and extended to the left, gun after gun joining in mighty chorus. Gettysburg, Malvern, Spottsylvania, Coal Harbour—these were as nothing. It was dreadful and unparalleled.

'The storming column was already formed. It consisted of two brigades of the first division, ninth corps. The first was commanded by Colonel Marshall, fourteenth New York heavy artillery; the second by Brigadier-General Bartlett. The men moved forward when the command was given. Forward a few yards, and then wavered. They were appalled by the terrible fire that the enemy had opened on them. A few cheering words and they rallied. They proceeded on past the débris of the fallen fort. Bartlett quickly followed. Twenty minutes had elapsed and the enemy was well prepared. A hundred guns concentrated their fire on the spot. It was too much for human endurance; the line again wavered. Men fell rapidly; some ran back, and others huddled together wherever they could find shelter.

'The charge failed.

'The second and third divisions followed. One was on the right, the other on the left. All connected at the fort. This was the fatal spot. It was here the vengeance of the enemy fell in showers of death. Bravely but vainly the first division sought to breast the terrible wave that rolled down against it. The Confederates had breastworks in front and on either side. There stood the infantry, and from ten thousand muskets a concentric fire rained on the devoted spot. They had forts in front and on either side, and the cannon mounted therein were trained on the breach and poured thunderbolts of destruction into it. They had mortars, and from these shells flew screaming and bursting among the advance. And nearly all this fire came from a hill in front. Several times did the brigades of Marshall and Bartlett essay to reach this hill. Every attempt was met by that awful fire. Every attempt failed. Hundreds fell and fell in vain.

'Ferrero's division of negroes was in reserve. The first division fell back. Bravely they tried to maintain their ground, but could not. Ferrero was ordered to the front. His men advanced well. When they reached the breach they were met by the same fire that had driven back the others. At first they stood firm. The enemy saw that negro troops were sent against them. Their rage became concentrated with their fire. A terrible volley was poured into Ferrero's ranks. The negroes could not stand it. White veterans had succumbed to the same fire. The negroes were terror-stricken. Some of them rushed wildly to the rear. Every foot was swept by the enemy's cannon. One-third of the running mass fell on their wild retreat. Others rushed to the shelter of the great cavity made by the explosion. They thought they could find safety there, but they made a sad mistake. Let one sheep jump into the water and the flock will follow. So with these unfortunate fellows. Soon the pit was filled with a struggling, panic-stricken, maddened mass. Then the enemy's mortars opened on them. Right in their midst the shell fell thick and fast. The divisions on the wings gave way, and onward came the Confederates. The poor negroes heard their yells as they rushed down victoriously. To stay in the pit was certain death. Those who could extricate themselves did so, and clambered out. As they emerged and came back toward the line they were shot down. Two-thirds of them were killed or wounded in this way. Shells were still dropping and exploding in the pit—another slaughter-pen.

'Thus it went on till ten o'clock. Every attempt to charge, and three several attempts were made, was repulsed with fearful slaughter. Often have the Confederates won encomiums for valour, but never before did they fight with such uncontrollable desperation. It appeared as if our troops were at their mercy, standing helpless or running in terror, and shot down like dogs. No such scene has been witnessed in any battle of the war. On the right the eighteenth corps attempted to divert the enemy's fire. They advanced, but Lee massed his troops and hurled them against ours, driving them back in confusion. The charge of the enemy against the negro troops was terrific. With fearful yells they rushed down against them. The negroes at once ran back, breaking through the line of white troops in the rear. Again and again their officers tried to rally them. Words and blows were useless. They were victims of an uncontrollable terror, and human agency could not stop them. The Confederates followed in hot pursuit, battling fiercely against the supports and throwing them into temporary disorder. Then when all hope of success was gone, the order to fall back was issued. The men retired to their old position, leaving the dead and wounded and a large number of prisoners in the hands of the enemy.'

The Richmond Examiner gives the following summary from the Petersburg papers:—'The chasm caused by the enemy's explosion appears to be about forty feet in depth and some two hundred feet in circumference, and resembles more what one would imagine to have been the effects of a terrible earthquake than anything else. Immense boulders of earth were piled up rudely one above the other, and great fragments of bombproofs, gun carriages, timbers, &c., were lying promiscuously in every direction. The sides and bottom of the chasm were literally lined with Yankee dead, and the bodies were in every conceivable position. Some had evidently been killed with the butts of muskets, as their crushed skulls and badly-smashed faces too plainly indicated, while the greater portion were shot, great pools of blood having flowed from their wounds and stained the ground. Between our breastworks and the enemy's large numbers of dead and wounded were still lying, the latter begging piteously for water and praying to be cared for. The length of the "sap" made by the enemy is supposed to have been about six hundred feet.'

A Petersburg paper, describing the struggle for the repossession of our works captured by the enemy in the confusion consequent to the explosion, says:—'Arriving upon the ground, General Mahone found twelve of the enemy's flags waving upon the ramparts of that portion of our line carried by the explosion, and the whole vicinity swarming with white and black Yankee troops. Getting his troops into position, General Mahone ordered his brigade to retake a portion of his works, and instructed Wright's brigade to come up in such a position as would insure the recapture of the remaining portion. Under command of Colonel Weisiger, acting brigadier, Mahone's brigade formed into line, and were about to move up, when the enemy rallied out and made a charge. The Confederates reserved their fire until they could see the whites of the enemy's eyes, when they poured into them such a storm of bullets that the enemy recoiled and fell back in confusion. A charge was now ordered, and Weisiger's men dashed forward with a yell, driving the enemy up to and over the breastworks. On the works our men halted and delivered a plunging fire, which proved so destructive that the enemy never rallied again on this portion of the line, but left our men in undisturbed possession.'

TERMS OF PEACE.

(From the Richmond Sentinel.)

WE find the following in the Washington Chronicle, an organ of Mr. Lincoln's Administration, of a late date:—'Throughout the entire North there is an undoubted sentiment in favour of peace, unopposed except by some mean army contractors or sordid army followers.' This is very well for a beginning. Indeed, we think it rather oversteps the modesty of nature. But yesterday this organ talked of nothing but fire, and sword, and subjugation, and all at once it begins cooing as soothingly as the turtle dove. Like all new converts, its new-born zeal hurries it too far. It denounces all who hold to-day what it held yesterday as mean and sordid men.

Nine-tenths of the people, North and South, are heartily tired and sick of the war. But the prospects are not quite so bright as Mr. Forney paints them; for, unfortunately, there are a great many people, North and South, besides army contractors and camp followers, interested in the continuance of the war. Yet we thank the Chronicle for its admission, and accept it in the kind spirit in which we hope and believe it was made. When both sides desire peace, peace cannot be very far off. 'Where there's a will there's a way.' In the meantime, we presume, neither side will remit its exertions, nor lessen its vigilance in prosecuting the war. We would respectfully suggest, however, that it is little out of the ordinary course of peace negotiations to begin with ultimata. They, as their name implies, come last, and shut the door on further negotiation.

Let Peace Commissioners be appointed by either section, and, invested with plenary powers of negotiation, meet on neutral territory, and discuss the terms of peace. Let all subjects be open to free discussion and negotiation. We of the South consider independence as the great and first object of the war, and that separation is essential to independence; yet we shall be willing to listen to what you have to say and propose on the other side. You may offer us something that will secure our equal rights within the Union; you may propose to give the slaveholding and free States equality of votes in Congress and in the election of President; and, partly to effect this, you may throw all New England into one State, or give her to England—or, if England won't have her, let her secede.

Now, this would be a tempting bait. We don't say it would satisfy us; but the subject is worthy of consideration. This war was brought about by New England and New Englanders, and who knows but that the balance of the States might live in peace and harmony if she were out of the way. But we do not mean to anticipate or prescribe the action of the Commissioners. Let them enter into the negotiations untrammeled by ultimata, other than that any terms of peace they may agree on shall be subject to be rejected or ratified by their respective Governments. As to the slavery question, we would leave that to be settled last. The question of independence concerns us all, the subject of slavery but part of us.

'PUNCH' ON RECOGNITION.—Our comic contemporary publishes this week a very clever cartoon. Punch and Lord Palmerston are walking arm in arm, the former pointing to a placard on which is inscribed 'America: another Federal Defeat.' A little in the back ground is the figure of a Southern soldier; 'Punch remarks, 'That was Jeff Davis, Pam, don't you recognise him?' To this Pam replies, 'H'm! Well, not exactly—may have to do so some of these days.' The title of the cartoon is 'Very Probable.'

BANISHED.—A despatch to the Northern papers, dated Cairo, August 8, says:—'Several disloyal citizens of Columbus and Paducah, with their families, have arrived here en route to Canada, having been banished by General Payne. Among them are a number of merchants and leading men whose property had been seized by the Government.'

AFFAIRS FINANCIAL AND COMMERCIAL.

WEDNESDAY EVENING.

MONEY AND DISCOUNT MARKET.

THE state of the money market is at this moment purely exceptional. With full supplies of capital seeking employment, abundance of money both in Lombard Street and at the Stock Exchange, no permanent prospects exist of a reduction in the rate of discount. Indeed, part of these large reserves are held to meet any sudden pressure that may occur in the autumn, and the abundance is the result of the bankers and brokers only lending from day to day, or discounting at short dates, so that they may have their resources within easy call. Notwithstanding the quotation in Lombard Street is about half per cent. below the official minimum of the Bank, there is little desire to enter into extended engagements, and it is quite clear the chief financial establishments are looking for enhanced terms in the autumn and winter, when an enormous amount of Indian transactions become due. The rumour of a probable peace between the North and South gains ground rapidly; but what the actual basis of the arrangement is to be appears not to have transpired. A variety of causes are, therefore, tending to induce bankers, financiers, and others to have a good look-out for the future. The present rate of the Bank continues 8 per cent.: the quotation in Lombard Street for prime paper is $7\frac{1}{2}$ per cent., and short loans at the Stock Exchange rule 4 to $4\frac{1}{2}$, while in some instances they have been completed at $3\frac{1}{2}$. The Bank directors will not, without they have full cause, move in the downward direction when they may, in three weeks or a month, have to carry their terms still higher than at present.

BULLION AND SPECIE MOVEMENTS.

The operations in bullion and specie continued on a very limited scale, but on the whole the tendency of the markets is rather more favourable. The last rise in the Bank rate still continues to operate effectually in preventing the withdrawals of specie for transmission abroad. Still the amount of gold sent into the Bank has not been large this week, only 106,000*l*. The arrivals of specie have also been unusually light, the total being 31,782*l*., all of which was from New York. The Delta for the East takes out 60,668*l*., viz., 46,905*l*. gold and 13,763*l*. silver. Of the above sum there was for India, 11,905*l*.; China and the Straits, 3,563*l*.; Mauritius, 45,000*l*.; and St. George's Sound, 200*l*. The silver market has been rather active in consequence of a slight rise in the exchange for Bombay, but there has been no material alteration in the price, bar being still quoted at $61\frac{1}{4}$d. per ounce. A small order for Mexican dollars has been executed at 63*d*. per oz., that price having been obtained in consequence of the present scarcity of that coin in the market. The amount of gold mentioned last week as having arrived from Australia is still out, none of the vessels mentioned having yet arrived.

HOME AND FOREIGN SECURITIES.

The English Stock Market has been entirely without animation throughout the week. At this season business is generally very flat, but at the present moment there is unusual dullness, owing, in some measure, to the state of the money market, and also, to some extent, to the spirit of political affairs abroad. Prices have been gradually declining, and from which there has been no reaction, though there was slightly more firmness exhibited this afternoon. Consols closed this evening at $88\frac{7}{8}$ to 89 for money, and $89\frac{1}{8}$ to $89\frac{1}{4}$ for the account, which is a decline of $\frac{1}{4}$ to $\frac{3}{8}$ upon the quotations of this day week. Exchequer bills remain steady at 25*s*. to 15*s*. dis. Although there has not been a large business transacted in Foreign Securities, prices have generally been less affected than in the English market. The chief operations have been in Spanish, which show an improvement, the Passives of $\frac{1}{8}$ per cent. and the Certificates of $\frac{5}{8}$ per cent. Greek has declined $\frac{1}{2}$ per cent., and Mexican are $\frac{1}{8}$ per cent. lower; but Turkish are without change. The final quotations this evening were—Greek, $23\frac{1}{4}$ to $23\frac{1}{2}$; Mexican, $28\frac{5}{8}$ to $28\frac{7}{8}$; Spanish Passives, $30\frac{5}{8}$ to $30\frac{7}{8}$; ditto Certificates, $12\frac{3}{8}$ to $13\frac{1}{8}$; Turkish Six per Cents. of 1854, 90 to 91; and those of 1862, $69\frac{3}{4}$ to $70\frac{1}{4}$.

CONFEDERATE COTTON LOAN.

The Cotton Loan was hardly affected by the news per last steamer; the payment of the dividend and the drawing being so near at hand, there are ready buyers. The closing quotation is 78 to 80. Rumours of a probability of peace negotiations are further likely to strengthen the market for this security.

AMERICAN SECURITIES.

Week by week the operations in American Government and railway securities continue to decline, and under present circumstances there does not appear any prospect of improvement. Unless for special orders, where it is necessary to effect sales, the brokers will not look at this class of securities, and the few bargains that take place are generally at a decline. The only transactions recorded this week have been in Virginia State 6 per Cents. at 30; Erie, \$100 shares, 40 and $41\frac{1}{2}$; Illinois Central, \$100 shares, \$90 paid, $44\frac{1}{2}$ and 44 dis.; do. do., all paid, 52; and Pennsylvania, \$50 shares, 29.

LIVERPOOL, Wednesday, August 24.—There has again been a lull in our cotton market; the demand for most descriptions has generally subsided, except for American descriptions, which still continue to be more sought after. The present state of the money market and the prospect of the civil war in America being at no distant date brought to a conclusion, has for the present entirely put a stop to anything like active speculation. Prices, which last week showed an advancing tendency, are again declining. The sales this week have been only 29,500 bales, of which 9,000 were on speculation and for export. The total sales this year to the present time have been 1,793,310 bales, and to the same period in 1863, 1,397,892 bales. There have been imported this year 1,399,147 bales; last year the number was 960,254 bales. The trade have taken this year 1,107,626 bales, and to the same period in 1863, 786,532 bales. The exports this year have been 357,046 bales, whilst last year they were 280,436 bales. There have been taken on speculation this year 309,271 bales, and in 1863, 304,782 bales. The estimated stocks at the present time are 221,920 bales; at the same period last year they were 283,194 bales. The advices from Bombay to the 23rd ult. state that the clearances of cotton to that date for the preceding fortnight amounted to 46,836 bales. The exports since January 1 had been 638,126 bales, against 583,941 bales in the corresponding period of 1863. In addition to the foregoing, the Castilian and the Jamsetjee Cursetjee, both ships of large tonnage, had sailed for Liverpool with full cargoes of cotton, but the amount could not be ascertained in time for the mail. The latest quotations were: for American descriptions, $29\frac{1}{2}$d. to 31*d*.; Pernambuco, $29\frac{3}{4}$d. to 32*d*.; Maranham, 31*d*. to $31\frac{1}{2}$d.; Egyptian, $27\frac{1}{4}$d. to $35\frac{3}{4}$d.; Surats, $13\frac{3}{4}$d. to $25\frac{1}{2}$d.; Bengal, 15*d*. to $17\frac{1}{2}$d.; Scinde, 15*d*. to $17\frac{1}{2}$d.; China, 18*d*. to 22*d*.; and Peru $32\frac{1}{4}$d. to $32\frac{1}{2}$d.

The markets at Manchester have been unfavourably influenced within the last day or two by the private letters from America intimating the probability of an early termination of the war. Although little confidence is placed by mercantile men in these rumours, nevertheless they are sufficient to create a very unsettled feeling, and it is not considered likely that the markets will assume a better tone till further advices have been received. The accounts from India received in the earlier part of the week were regarded as favourable, and it was considered likely that a satisfactory business would have ensued, but the American news has so far put a complete stop to transactions, both in cloths and yarns. In the cloth market buyers are quite out of the market and refuse to make any offers. There is a slight weakness in prices in some quarters, but on the whole manufacturers keep up their quotations, though in some instances, when stocks are heavy, there is some anxiety manifested to realise. There is nothing whatever doing in shipping yarns, and to effect sales spinners would have to submit to a decline of at least $\frac{1}{2}$d. per lb. on last week's prices. In home trade yarns there is likewise nothing doing, and prices generally show weakness. The closing quotations were:—$\frac{7}{8}$ Grey Printers, 8*s*. 9*d*. to 16*s*. 9*d*., according to quality; $\frac{9}{8}$ Grey Madapollams, 7*s*. $10\frac{1}{2}$d. to 10*s*. $4\frac{1}{2}$d.; $\frac{9}{8}$ Grey Printers, 12*s*. $1\frac{1}{2}$d. to 18*s*. 6*d*.; $\frac{5}{4}$ Grey Shirtings, 13*s*. 3*d*. to 27*s*. 6*d*.; Water Twist, No. 20, 2*s*. 3*d*. to 2*s*. $10\frac{1}{2}$d.; No. 30, 2*s*. 8*d*. to 3*s*. 2*d*.; No. 40, 3*s*. 1*d*. to 3*s*. 7*d*.; Mule Twist, No. 20, 1*s*. 11*d*. to 2*s*. 9*d*.; No. 30, 2*s*. 4*d*. to 2*s*. 11*d*.; No. 40, 2*s*. $6\frac{1}{2}$d. to 3*s*. 4*d*.; No. 50, 2*s*. 11*d*. to 3*s*. 6*d*.; No. 60, 3*s*. to 3*s*. 8*d*.; No. 70, 3*s*. 2*d*. to 3*s*. 10*d*.; No. 80, 3*s*. 6*d*. to 4*s*.; No. 90, 3*s*. 8*d*. to 4*s*. 2*d*.; and No. 100, 3*s*. 11*d*. to 4*s*. 9*d*.

VICKSBURG AND PETERSBURG.—The New York World thus replies to the suggestion of General Grant's friends that the positions at Vicksburg and Petersburg are analogous:—'Pemberton's retreat into Vicksburg drew our victorious army after him into such a position, that the rebel garrison found themselves shut in between our army by land and our fleet upon the Mississippi. After the battle of Champion Hill, Pemberton and Vicksburg had absolutely no chance of escape from surrender save in the reinforcement of Johnston to such a strength as would enable that commander to assume the offensive against our triumphant general. But no one of the conditions which involved the doom of Pemberton now weighs upon the spirits or can effect the plans of Lee at Petersburg. His troops have not been defeated in the open field; they are not invested in a city commanded by our gunboats; they are not isolated from their supplies and from their reinforcements. Were it not, indeed, for our control of the James river, the position of Pemberton would be much more nearly reproduced in the position of General Grant to-day than in that of Beauregard and of Lee.'

THE TACTICS OF JOHN PHŒNIX.—A correspondent of the Boston Courier writes the following. A neighbour told him 'that he had seen a man only the day before who was just from the "front," who assured him that Grant might have taken Richmond at any time within a month, and the only reason he had not done so was that he wished to hold Lee where he was to prevent his going to the relief of Atlanta. I asked him if he had ever read the works of John Phœnix. "No," he replied; "who was he?" "A distinguished writer on tactics," said I, "who once described a 'military position' somewhat similar to your conception of Grant's. He was engaged in a street fight, and says: 'when we fell, I came undermost, and held my antagonist down by my nose, which I inserted between his teeth for that purpose."'

TORPEDOES.—The repeated proofs given during the war in America of the immense destructive power of the 'torpedoes,' or submarine batteries employed by the Confederates, and which are attached by a peculiar apparatus to a number of their vessels, has induced the Federal Government to take a leaf out of the enemy's book in this respect, and a letter from the United States informs us on the best authority that this new and formidable engine of war has been extensively introduced in the Federal navy, and several ironclads are already fitted with the same apparatus as the Confederates employ, or one closely resembling it. The British Government seem to be on the same track, for a wonder, though of course they are pursuing it with their usual deliberation, and as yet have not proceeded farther than a few experiments at Chatham, and the Royal Dockyard at Pembroke, on the force of submarine explosions, which, however successful they may have proved, will not be followed in all probability by the adoption of torpedoes as a part of the regular armament of British ironclads, till France has, as we understand she is about doing, fitted them to half a dozen or so of her iron fleet, and a periodical fit of invasion panic seizes the authorities, and hurries them to a tardy exhibition of zeal.

A YOUTHFUL VICTIM OF THE SUBSTITUTE BROKERS.—The Petersburg correspondent of the New York World, writing on August 5, narrates the following case of forcible enlisting:—'Charles R. J. Jackson—is only about fifteen years of age. Having recently arrived from England, he fell into the hands of one of these sharpers, in your city, who first induced him to contract a debt of a few dollars, then persuaded him to enlist, and finally gave him fifty-five dollars of the bounty money, less the amount of the debt! To render the lad better satisfied with his situation, the broker told him to take his citizen clothes along with him, and, after getting here, he would find no difficulty in escaping, when he could again come to New York and repeat the operation. The lad was taken very sick shortly after his arrival, and narrowly escaped death, from cholera morbus.'

MORMONISM IN NEW ENGLAND.—The New York correspondent of the Morning Herald writes:—'Conversions to Mormonism in the New England States have become very numerous of late. The bright, keen, quick-witted, educated girls of the Eastern States have "no notion" of being old maids, if they can help it; and as the young men have either been killed already or are in a fair way to get killed before domestic pursuits can be resumed and social usages again taken up, and as the old men are already appropriated, they have apparently determined to do the next best thing—hold one husband in common among several. The recent call for troops had the effect of converting 100,000 American girls to a perception of the beauties of Mormonism and the desirability of polygamy. So Brigham Young may shortly expect a grand accession to his population in the shape of full-grown, buxom, and good-looking Yankee females.'

TWO ONE-LEGGED COMMANDERS.—It is observed by those curious in coincidences that both the commanders-in-chief of the confronting armies at Atlanta, Hood and Sherman, have left a leg on the battle-field. General Sherman has, however, physically an advantage over his opponent in the use of both arms, while General Hood has only a stump in the place of one of his. General Sherman lost his leg in the repulse from Port Hudson; General Hood, in the victory of Chickamauga.

It is intended to hold a Bazaar in St. George's Hall, early in October, in Aid of the Southern Prisoners' Relief Fund. Many Ladies, in addition to those named, have promised their active aid.

The suffering of the Southern Prisoners of War in sickness, wounds, and deprivation of every comfort of life; the multitudes of widows to whom nothing remains—and of orphans unable to help themselves—form an amount of woe, which some who are blessed here with abundance and peace have felt a desire to alleviate.

Efforts have already been made, and not without success, through reliable friends in the Northern States, but unhappily the field is so wide that aid is now required to replace the means already provided and exhausted.

It is hoped that you will not refuse your assistance in this work of humanity. The Committee will be glad to hear in what form you will aid them, if disposed to do so, and will attend at once to any suggestion with which you may oblige them.

3. In case any prohibited articles shall be on board any ship, vessel, boat, raft or carriage arriving in the Confederate States after said 1st of March, and shall be omitted in the manifest, report, or entry of the master or person having charge or command of such ship or vessel, boat, raft, or carriage, or shall be omitted in the entry of the goods owned by the owner or consigned to the consignee of such articles, or shall be imported or landed without a permit, the said goods shall be seized and dealt with, and the vessel and parties shall be subjected to the same forfeitures, fines, and penalties as in cases of similar omissions, landing, importation, or attempt to land or import, in relation to articles liable to duties on their importation into the Confederate States.

In case any prohibited article shall, after the 1st of March, 1864, be imported into the Confederate States, or shall, after said date, be put on board any ship or vessel, boat, raft, or carriage, with the intention of importing the same into the Confederate States; all such articles shall be forfeited, and also all other articles on board the said ship or vessel, boat, raft, or carriage, belonging to the owner of such prohibited articles; and, moreover, the owner thereof shall forfeit and pay double the value of the prohibited articles.

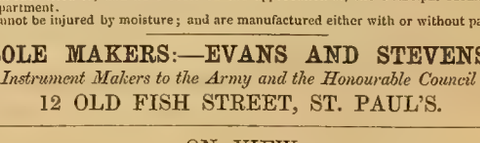
DUNCAN'S PATENT RATAN CANE SPLINTS.



THESE Splints are introduced and recommended to the Faculty for the great advantages which they possess above others,—viz., their comfort, coolness, and durability, as well as the facility with which they may be applied to the fractured limb.
As cleanliness is an important consideration, these Splints possess that quality pre-eminently, as they may be readily washed without the slightest fear of injury.
They are especially adapted to the constant usage of the General Hospital, and the movements of an Army on Service, as they cannot easily be injured. For Colonial practice they are recommended for the same reason.
They have been submitted to, and have received the approbation of, the Principal Medical Officers of the Army Medical Department.
The Splints cannot be injured by moisture; and are manufactured either with or without pads.

THE PEACE MOVEMENT AT THE NORTH.

FROM OUR SPECIAL CORRESPONDENT.

NEW YORK: August 12, 1864.

POLITICS now rule the hour, and the big wars are of secondary consideration for the time being. Indeed, so far as the politicians can control the generals, military movements are made subsidiary to the schemes of party. Grant and Sherman are overshadowed by Lincoln and M'Clellan. The latter is not, like the former, as yet the regular nominee of a party, but he is looked upon as among the most prominent—perhaps the most prominent—of the aspirants for the Democratic nomination. However this may be, the fact is patent that the people of these Northern States—and doubtless the Western also—are more absorbed in speculations about the approaching Presidential election than in the progress or ultimate issue of the war. If Charleston were captured, or the 'grand army' were to enter in triumph the 'capital of the rebellion,' the masses might be aroused, but this I doubt, judging from what I have seen and heard here during the past two months. Possibly the realisation of these seemingly impossible achievements might revive the drooping spirit of the country. But it is evident that the days of those mighty popular uprisings, the 'war mass-meetings,' have gone by. For the heart of the people—rich and poor—is heavy because of its slaughtered sons, ruined industry, and dark future; and that faith in the perpetuity of the Union—faith in the 'manifest destiny' of the 'Model Republic' that made this people arrogant and rapacious, that made them proudly exult in their supposed destined career of triumph—like the feeling of immortality in youth, this national faith is dead. There is a universal conviction that the sacrifices of life and treasure that have been already made ought to have achieved the object of the war; and all these sacrifices having been in vain, there is a widespread and growing conviction that that object is beyond the reach of human power. This impossibility of a restoration of the Union—or rather of the subjugation of the South, for that is really the issue—is now become the rallying cry of a large and daily augmenting party. It is evident that the North and West not only weary of the war, but begin to show unmistakable signs of exhaustion. The rural districts are said to be still 'rampant for a vigorous prosecution of the war;' but, though ever so rampant, they are sending no volunteers to the army, nor is it expected that they will be able to fill up their quotas under the late call for 500,000 men. The cities, this one in particular, are crowded by the young men who have fled from the conscripting officers of these same rural districts. Even the large centres of population will find it difficult, if not impossible, to make up their quotas; and so universal is the feeling of opposition to another draft, that the Government authorises the States to make up their quotas with the 'freed men.' Opposition to the further prosecution of the war has much to do with this repugnance to conscription, but the moving cause springs from a general conviction that the productive industry of the country would suffer seriously from it. Emigration and the contraband camps are expected to furnish several thousands, but whence the five hundred thousand are to come by September 5 is a problem beyond my conjecture. To make up her quota before the 5th proximo, New York should be enlisting from 500 to 600 men a day; yet she does not enlist 200 a week. If such be the condition of this metropolitan city—with its large class of idle, thriftless, floating adventurers—we can easily conjecture the difficulty of procuring recruits in the others.

If the truth were told, it would be found that the inaction of the Federal armies was owing as much to their exhaustion as to the skill, vigilance, and enterprise of the Confederates. The losses in battle have been enormous, and the hardships of the campaign have told fearfully upon the survivors; so much so, that it is not believed that General Grant would care to risk a battle in the open field. The men are broken down mentally and physically. The bloody but fruitless struggle from the Rapidan to the Chickahominy, followed by the frequent and terrible repulses in front of Petersburg, might damp the ardour of the finest veteran troops. The men, we are told, show painful signs of mental and physical exhaustion. They are constantly speaking of their slaughtered comrades, or sadly dwelling upon their now thinned ranks, and this weariness of spirit leaves them assured victims of the malaria so deadly prevalent about the lowlands of the James River in the autumn, now at hand. Officers, we are told, felt the effects of the campaign as well as the men. The Army and Navy Journal of this city reckons the number of officers killed or wounded during the campaign by the thousand, and the consequence was that captains were commanding regiments, majors brigades, and colonels divisions. Such are the results of the late campaign under the leadership of a man who was held up to Europe as the greatest soldier of the age, and who was hailed here as the Moses of this people. Such is the morale of the largest, best appointed, best officered, and, considering the field of operations, the most important army of the Union. Sherman's situation in Georgia is thought not to be even so favourable as that of Grant. The latter is strongly entrenched, and his communications, being by water, can suffer but little interruption from the Confederates. Indeed, many think General Sherman's position one of extreme, though perhaps not of immediate, peril. General Hood, who has been heavily reinforced, occupies strong fortifications, and has frequently assumed the offensive of late. He is vigilant, prompt, skilful, and enterprising, as shown in his attacks and the counter movements against those of his antagonist. The raids of the Federal cavalry upon the railroads in his rear have, with one and an unimportant exception, proved disastrous in the extreme to the raiders. Over two thousand of them were captured, including Major-General Stoneman and a large number of other officers; about 800 were killed or wounded, and the remainder scattered in wild confusion, leaving arms, trains, &c., behind them. This victory was so complete that Sherman can now neither threaten Hood's communications, nor adequately protect his own, unless he receives large reinforcements of cavalry; but before they can arrive it is expected that the Confederate horse will have played havoc with the railroads between Atlanta and Chattanooga, and, mayhap, with the Chattanooga and Nashville road. The 'situation' has certainly changed in Georgia, and it is plain the Federal arms have not gained by it. As it now looks, taking for granted that the Confederate cavalry are, or will soon be, operating in Sherman's rear, it would seem that the Federal commander would find it difficult to extricate himself. He cannot take Atlanta by assault; he cannot invest it; and he dare not sit down before it for a regular siege. That would be a stroke of military insanity—a weakness, however, with which the General has been charged more than once during the war. To lay siege to the position without investing it, with his enemy's lines of communication intact, while his own would surely be severed, and he left without supplies in the heart of a hostile country—for General Sherman to attempt a siege under such conditions would be for him to imperil the safety of his whole army. It must be remembered, however, that Sherman is not easily appalled.

An expedition under command of General A. J. Smith left Memphis a few days ago, but its destination is as yet unknown. I have no doubt it is intended to create a diversion in favour of Sherman, or to co-operate with the force sent from New Orleans for the land attack upon Mobile. The long-expected attack upon this city was inaugurated on the 5th inst. Admiral Farragut has succeeded in running past Forts Morgan and Gaines, and the latter post is said to have been surrendered on the morning of the 8th. Fort Powell, which commanded Grant's Pass, a shallow channel leading in from the Mississippi Sound to Mobile Bay, some six miles above Fort Gaines, has been evacuated and blown up. Gaines and Morgan were the outer fortifications of the harbour, commanding the main entrance from the sea, and had both remained in the possession of the Confederates. It is thought that Farragut's squadron would be in by no means a desirable position, for he would then be between these two forts and the fortifications of the city. The surrender of Fort Gaines and the other batteries on Dauphine Island, and the destruction of Fort Powell, leave Fort Morgan to receive alone the fire of the whole fleet. It is a very strong work, and, as it has been garrisoned and provisioned for a siege, it may resist for months. Meanwhile, Farragut has his task yet before him, if he is aiming at the capture of Mobile. That city, as is acknowledged on all sides, is fortified very elaborately, and can defy the Federal squadron though Morgan should follow the fate of Gaines or Powell. Our news from Mobile comes through the press of Richmond, transmitted from the headquarters of General Butler. There seems to be something wrong about the surrender of Fort Gaines, and we must await details for a clear understanding of the matter. An immediate attack upon Mobile is not looked for, the general impression being that Farragut and the Government will rest content with what has been achieved, the main object having been to secure such a position on the land as would give them command of the main ship channel, so as to put a stop to blockade-running. This accomplished, the large squadron on blockade service off Mobile would be relieved for service elsewhere; and this is about all the advantage the Northern press expect or claim to have achieved in this latest exploit of Admiral Farragut. If we look to the south-west, we find that the 'rebels' have become formidable in Missouri and Kentucky—have wrested back the whole of West Tennessee—have reconquered Arkansas, except the posts of Helena and Little Rock, and these are now all but invested. In Mississippi the Federal lines do not extend beyond Vicksburg and Natchez, while in Louisiana they have been driven to the fortifications of Port Hudson and New Orleans.

The Federals also hold a short strip of the river bank on the west side, at Morganzia, but the garrisons of all these posts are so weak that, in case of attack, their defence must rest mainly upon the gunboats. Such is the situation after nearly three years and a half of war, and an unparalleled expenditure of life and treasure. Since affairs have reached this pass, it is no wonder the people cry for peace. Truly, the wonder would be if they did not. But the great question now is, how is the wish for peace to be gratified in opposition to the Radicals of the Administrative party, the place-hunters of the Democracy, and the rich, unscrupulous, and all-powerful army contractors, the army of 'shoddyites.' Long ago Sir James Mackintosh spoke of politics as that exploded villany. There is much of villany in it, surely, the world over, but more here, perhaps, than in any other country of the globe, and it is very far from being 'exploded.' The schemes of party now going on preparatory to the Presidential election are so utterly reckless of love of country or principle, that a patriot even of Mr. Seward's school of optimists might despair of the Republic. It is admitted that the masses of the Democratic party desire peace even at the expense of permanent disunion; and the problem which the leaders of that party are trying to solve is how to meet that desire, and yet commit neither the party nor its candidate to any clearly defined policy on the question of peace or war. We may be sure these astute leaders will solve the problem. The Democracy of the Northern States are for General M'Clellan; but the Western Democracy, being more fully committed to a peace policy, will not accept him as a candidate. He has repeatedly of late reiterated his opposition to 'any peace with traitors and rebels.' And yet he is probably the most available candidate the party could put up. The country at large respects and admires him, while the soldiers, particularly the army of the Potomac, almost idolise him; and this, it is contended, should be a ruling consideration. This idea was boldly announced at a great mass-meeting of the friends of General M'Clellan held in this city on Wednesday evening last. Among the resolutions adopted was one declaring 'that success in the election, in opposition to the powerful combinations of this Administration, depends upon the popularity of the candidate with the army, and the final selection must therefore fall on one of the great soldiers who has distinguished himself in defence of the principles upon which the Government was founded.' Dangerous doctrine this in a republic! If 'success in the election depends upon the popularity of the candidate with the army,' how long will it be before some ambitious military chieftain makes himself President by the aid of bayonets instead of ballots? When a great and popular party enunciates so slavish a doctrine as this, we may be sure the masses will soon be ready to hail the advent of 'the man on horseback.' None of the resolutions adopted at this meeting declared for a further prosecution of the war, neither was anything said either for or against a so-called disunion peace. I believe myself, from what I can gather of their intentions, that the Democratic leaders, if they get into power, will restore peace to the country. And their chances of success are growing better daily. Indeed, it is now thought, owing to the irreconcilable divisions in his party, that Mr. Lincoln cannot be reelected. On this subject I quote the following from the Washington correspondence of one of the most respectable of the city journals, with the remark that the jealousies and feuds of these 'managers' render the correspondent's statements highly probable:—

> The deliberations of the leading Republican managers in this city, New York, Boston, and elsewhere, have led to a most singular determination on their part. It is stated upon very good authority that they have determined to allow the election to go by default, and leave the Democratic party to elect their President and the House of Representatives. It is Secretary Chase who is said to be the author of this very curious political movement. The reasons for the adoption of this policy are as follows:—First, the Republican leaders are satisfied that the war is near its conclusion; that a disunion peace is inevitable; and they wish the Democratic party to suffer the ignominy in history of being the political organisation which consented to a separation of the North and South. Second, they argue that no more money is to be made out of the war; that the finances of the country are now in such a state that contractors will hereafter lose, but cannot make money; in short, that the public orange has been squeezed dry, and that the election of a Democratic President and House of Representatives would put the latter party in a position whereby they could not conduct the war nor make any money for their friends, and would be compelled to submit to a dishonourable peace. Third, they further argue that should Mr. Lincoln be elected, peace would likewise be inevitable, owing to his wretched management of the war; but that a peace under Republican auspices would for ever ruin the political fortunes of every public man connected with that party. Fourth, that as the Republicans would have a majority in the Senate during the entire term of a Democratic President, they could prevent any peace that would not bring with it the abolition of slavery in the Southern States. Now that they consider the war hopeless, the Republicans are willing enough that there should be peace, but it must be peace with disunion, so that they would not have the political power of the South to contend against in a reunited Union.

THE SYRACUSE CONVENTION.—The New York Daily News of August 20 says: 'The Syracuse Convention has taken time by the forelock in a determined protest against the interference of the Administration with the freedom of election. The people present pledged to the maintenance of that foundation of our liberty "their lives, their fortunes, and their sacred honours." We hope most earnestly that every Democratic meeting throughout the land will reaffirm that pledge, in order to stand prepared for redeeming it, if necessary, by force of arms. Mr. Lincoln's Kentucky practices may be held to urge on us the necessity of preparation for maintenance of the sanctity of election, when his own personal ambition becomes subject to direct test.'

LETTER FROM NEW ORLEANS.

NEW ORLEANS, LOUISIANA: August 8, 1864.

THE NAVAL ENGAGEMENT AT MOBILE—FARRAGUT'S DARING AND SKILL — PASSING THE FORTS — THE GALLANT FIGHT OF THE CONFEDERATE FLEET—FORTS POWELL AND GAINES—THE FEDERAL LOSSES—THE CONFEDERATE CAVALRY AND THE FEDERAL GOVERNMENT PLANTATIONS — THE EVACUATION OF BROWNSVILLE, TEXAS—THE FEDERAL STORES SOLD TO CORTINA — CONDITION OF 'LOYAL TEXANS' — THE EXCHANGE OF PRISONERS, ETC. ETC.

ADMIRAL FARRAGUT has struck his blow at the outer defences of Mobile, and with that dash, daring, and skill characteristic of the man. Though the odds were tremendously in his favour, it must be admitted that he fought his way past the forts in a manner that challenges general admiration. Farragut has all the personal daring, skill, and enterprise of those great English sailors, the Nelsons, the Collingwoods, the Hardys, and others that made their country truly the mistress of the seas while they commanded her wooden walls. Pity it is that his most brilliant services and all his fiery zeal should be directed against his native South—against New Orleans, the home of his boyhood and the present abode of a large circle of his nearest relatives. The North, the seafaring North, has produced no such naval heroes as Farragut, Dupont, Buchanan, Tattnal, Hollins, Moffit, Semmes, and a host of less known names that have been distinguished in this war, fighting on the Federal or Confederate side. Farragut's position on board his flagship was a novel one in action, but was quite characteristic. He was up aloft, lashed to the mast, whence he could take in at a glance the movements of the entire squadron. He gave his orders to his fleet captain below through a speaking trumpet that reached to within a few feet of the deck. The action commenced about 5 o'clock A.M. on the 5th instant, the four ironclads taking the lead in passing the forts, the wooden vessels (16) of this powerful squadron following lashed two and two. Farragut's flagship, the Hartford, was immediately in rear of the ironclads. Fort Morgan opened fire as soon as the fleet came within range. The monitors replied, but the wooden vessels of the squadron reserved fire until abreast of the fort, when each one poured in broadside after broadside as long as the guns could be brought to bear upon it. The Federal accounts state that the Confederates were driven from their guns by the concentrated fire of the fleet; and this is very likely, since the fleet took the channel that runs close by the fort. Though nothing is said about it, we may suppose that the vessels on the port side gave their attentions to Fort Gaines. When the Federal squadron had passed the forts, it was instantly attacked by the four ironclads commanded by Admiral Buchanan. Four small and rudely constructed ironclads against a squadron of three monitors — two of them double-turreted — and fifteen wooden vessels, consisting of screw sloops of the first and second class and double-enders—thirty-two guns against two hundred and fifty! As might have been expected, the action was short, sharp, and decisive, but lasted long enough to inflict terrible injury upon the Federal squadron, and to shed a never-fading lustre upon the infant Confederate navy. The Tennessee was forced to surrender, surrounded by the greater part of the enemy's fleet, who were butting her and pouring broadsides from every quarter. The Gaines was beached, the Morgan escaped to the city, and the Selma was captured while attempting to get off, most of her officers being either killed or wounded. Admiral Buchanan lost a leg. All honour to the brave, to the maimed heroes who survive, and to the memory of the heroic dead who fell in defence of their homes, their altars, and their independence! Fort Powell, which commanded Grant's Pass, was blown up and evacuated on the night of the 7th. It had sustained a furious bombardment from several gunboats and a monitor for several days. Fort Gaines, on Dauphine Island, which, with Fort Morgan, command the entrance from the Gulf, was bombarded by the fleet on the 5th, 6th, and 7th, and by the land forces in the rear, who had effected a lodgment on the island. It was surrendered on the morning of the 7th, and the action is truly 'inexplicable and humiliating,' as General Maury says of it in his despatch to the War Office at Richmond. It looks so, at least, in its present light. It was garrisoned by 600 men, the 21st Alabama Regiment, Colonel Charles Anderson, and had supplies for six months. On the day before the surrender Colonel Anderson signalled Fort Morgan for permission to communicate with the enemy's fleet, but returned no reply to the enquiry as to the object of his visit. That same evening General Page, commanding at Fort Morgan, visited Fort Gaines and found Colonel Anderson absent aboard Farragut's flagship. General Page thereupon relieved him of his command, and left strict orders not to surrender the fort. But next morning the Yankee flag was flying from its ramparts. The Federals acknowledge a loss of 250 killed and wounded; but private accounts state a much heavier loss, and admit that the fleet sustained severe and extensive injury. The gunboat Philippi was fired and sunk. The monitor Tecumseh was blown up by a torpedo, and all her officers and 100 of her crew went down in their iron tomb. The sides of the flagship Hartford were badly stove in, and she will have to go north for repairs. The Oneida and others of the fleet are likewise badly injured: but, as usual, the public must wait for some time before the Federal authorities acknowledge the full extent of their losses. It is believed that Farragut is in no condition to attempt the reduction of the defences of the city, and we have it here that General Maury says, 'the people of Mobile are confident and eager for the fray.'

All the Confederate prisoners and the Federal wounded have been sent to the hospitals at Pensacola. The fleet keeps a respectful distance from Fort Morgan, which still holds out and has no idea of surrendering. Lieutenant-Commander Craven perished on board the Tecumseh. The vessel which conveyed the wounded of both sides to Pensacola was permitted to pass Fort Morgan unmolested, leave to do so having been asked by Admiral Farragut through a flag of truce. He also asked and was granted permission to bury his dead. General Richard L. Page, who commands at Fort Morgan, was a lieutenant in the United States navy up to the outbreak of hostilities. He is a Virginian, I think, and has the reputation of being a fine artillerist, and of being eminently fitted for the very responsible position he now holds. The Gaines lies under the guns of Fort Morgan. Her crew has arrived at the city.

The Confederate cavalry have begun their annual raids on the Government plantations east and west of the Mississippi. These raiding troopers are accompanied with wagon-trains, out of all proportion to their immediate wants, but the wagons are always well filled when returning from one of these expeditions. The cavalry confine their destructive visits to the so-called Government plantations, whether worked by Uncle Sam or by one of his needy sons from the North. 'Pirates in the Gulf' is the startling announcement of the local press. Some ten days ago a launch, containing twenty-two men, captured in Chandeleur Sound a schooner employed in the United States lighthouse service. After despoiling the schooner of her sails, rigging, and cargo, they disposed of her according to the practice of Captain Semmes's prize-court. These 'rebel pirates' must have come out from some one of the innumerable inlets in the Mississippi Sound. If they have such a leader as Captain Duke proved himself in similar enterprises in the same waters, they can interfere seriously with the coasting craft. Peace to the ashes of the bold 'pirate Duke!'

The Federal forces have evacuated Brownsville, Texas, the garrison retiring to Brayos Santiago, at the mouth of the Rio Grande. With the exception of this garrison all the Union troops have now been withdrawn. It is given out that the military stores were taken away at the time of the evacuation and sent to Brayos, or brought to this city. Not so. They were nearly all sold to Cortina, that Mexican highwayman, assassin, and horse-thief, who commands at Matamoros. Hundreds of Federal deserters are in the service of this same immaculate Juarist chief. Indeed, I am informed by a lady from Brownsville that the Federals supplied the Mexicans regularly with all the military stores they needed. The Confederates are reported to have reoccupied the town under command of Colonel Ford, a famous Texan ranger. 'Loyal Texans' made a dash recently upon Eagle Pass, a crossing of the Rio Grande some hundred miles above Brownsville. It is the point whence the Confederates have been sending their cotton to Monterey since the occupation of Brownsville by the Union forces. It is admitted that the 'loyal Texans' were easily beaten off, though the garrison at the Pass was quite small. The condition of these 'loyalists' is now very pitiable. The tender mercies of those who vauntingly came to aid them in throwing off the iron despotism of rebeldom—that is the Shibboleth, I believe—have proved more cruel than the war to the knife of the Confederates. The presence of the Union arms seduced these men to throw off the mask of fealty to the South, and now that the Union forces have withdrawn, nothing remains for them but exile, or a precarious and bandit-like life in the bush, where starvation or death at the hands of the Confederate cavalry awaits them. It should always be borne in mind that these loyalists are not Texans, but Yankee and foreign settlers. The cotton trade of Matamoros will now receive a new life. Indeed, it is said that one of the reasons for withdrawing the Federal troops was to allow the trade to be resumed. The North must have cotton. A general exchange of prisoners is expected to be agreed upon between General Canby and General Kirby Smith, the opposing commanders of the West Mississippi division. There are about four or five hundred naval prisoners in Texas, and these General Smith refuses to exchange so long as the Federal Government persists in regarding certain naval prisoners in their hands as 'rebel pirates.' This is the only obstacle to an exchange, and, as in all other cases touching the cartel, it is the Federal authorities who make the obstacle, and most unjustly.

We are as yet in doubt about Confederate forces having crossed to the east side of the Mississippi. The movements and intentions of the Confederates west of the river are wrapped in seemingly impenetrable concealment. They are still on this side of the Atchafalaya and demonstrating upon Morganzia, the Federal stronghold below the mouth of the Red River: they have been hovering around Donaldsonville and Plaquemine, throwing the Yankee planters, storekeepers, &c., at these points into wild alarm, a general packing up and clearing out being the order of the day. Then, again, they have been seen on the Opelousas Railroad, below Thibodeaux, with the supposed design of cutting off the garrison at Brashear City. Report has it that they came near enough to that post to capture a large wagon train, a hundred mules, and other spoil, besides some prisoners. Last week the Confederates surprised and captured almost the entire of two negro regiments near Morganzia. Thus it seems impossible to anticipate the movements of General Kirby Smith's army. He may have reinforced Price in Arkansas for the capture of Little Rock; he may have crossed over into Mississippi, to take the place of the troops sent to reinforce Hood; or he may be approaching Algiers, our vis-à-vis suburb, for a demonstration on this city. We can only wait and see, with the belief that Kirby Smith ought and will do something with the armies of Louisiana, Arkansas, and Texas, to divert the enemy from Mobile and other threatened points.

In compliance with orders, the registered enemies reported themselves as ready to be sent across the lines. The order was a 'Yankee trick,' so far, at least, as the able-bodied of the registered enemies were concerned, for they were thrown into prison, and there they now lie for an indefinite period, there being no intention of allowing them to cross the lines. Many of the sugar plantations have this season been devoted to cotton, and the production of this staple will be largely increased if the 'rebel guerillas' don't take off the crops, which they have a very summary mode of doing. A few lighted pine-knots thrown into a field soon reduce its fleecy whiteness to ashes. The sugar-cane suffered much during the winter. The steamer Rob Roy is reported to have been burned by Texan cavalry in the Ouachita River a few days ago: she had one thousand bales of cotton. The recent trade regulations issued by General Canby prohibit any trading boat from coming below Cairo, and all commercial intercourse between the Federal and Confederate lines. Trading stores, with produce, &c., for the non-combatants living within the Union lines, are restricted to permanent military posts. We have an apparently well-founded rumour that General Beauregard has gone to Atlanta with 20,000 men. Another rumour has it that he is at Mobile. More mystification for the Federal generals! Under the pretext that it was being sent within the 'rebel lines,' General Banks has prohibited 'traffic' in gold, except upon condition that the purchaser deposit the gold purchased in the United States Assistant-Treasurer's office, for which deposit the seller and purchaser will be held alike responsible, and which may be drawn by such depositor from the Treasury upon presentation to the Assistant-Treasurer or the Provost-Marshal-General of satisfactory explanations of the purposes to which it is to be applied. This is to bolster up the depreciated and depreciating Government currency. It would also be handy to have the gold in the hands of the officials in case of a forced loan. Northern Mexico is becoming the theatre of active operations between the Imperialists and Juarists. By late arrivals here we learn that Cortina is marching on Tampico, and has occupied the city of Victoria, the Imperialists evacuating it upon his approach. Juarez is at Monterey with about 2,500 infantry. A force of Imperialists are menacing the city, having already cut off its communications and supplies. A body of French troops have occupied the city of Durango, and an expedition is said to be in readiness for Matamoros.

Notes on Events of the Week.

AMERICA.

GRANT has made another movement. Two corps have been transferred to the north of the James River. The first operations of the Federals were, according to Mr. Stanton, 'not successful.' Two days later there was fighting at Deep Bottom. Hancock's corps attacked the Confederates, and lost a considerable number of men. The Confederates retired to a strong position where they were again attacked, and repulsed the enemy. The Federal troops were withdrawn under cover of darkness, having wasted 1,000 men (this is the Northern admission) in the vain attempt to pierce the Confederate line.

The Federal cavalry brigade, under General Gregg, in an engagement on August 16, has suffered severely. Gregg was dangerously wounded, and his corps had to retreat precipitately.

The most important engagement, however, took place on the 19th. The 5th Corps took up a position on the Weldon Railroad, and were surprised by the Confederates, and driven back with the loss of 3,000 men. At the latest advices, it was reported that the fighting was going on.

On the 18th the Confederates shelled the Federal lines before Petersburg for three hours. The Federals were held in readiness to sustain an assault, but none was made. Some Northern correspondents assert that the object of Grant's last movement is to protect Butler, who is supposed to be opening a new channel for the James River, so as to enable the Federal gunboats to ascend the river obstruction below Drury's Bluff, and to attack that stronghold with the boats.

THE official report of Admiral Farragut gives a fair, modest, and succinct account of the late naval engagement. The contest with the Tennessee is thus described:—'All the vessels had passed the forts by half-past eight o'clock, but the rebel ram Tennessee was still apparently uninjured in our rear. A signal was at once made to all the fleet to turn again and attack the ram, not only with guns, but with orders to run her down at full speed. The Monongahela was the first that struck her, and, though she may have injured her badly, yet she did not succeed in disabling her. The Lackawanna also struck her, but ineffectually. The flagship gave her a severe shock with her bow, and, as she passed, poured into her a whole port broadside of solid nine-inch shot and thirteen pounds of powder, at a distance of not more than twelve feet. The ironclads were closing upon her, and the Hartford and the rest of the fleet were bearing down on her, when at 10 A.M. she surrendered.' Thus for one hour and a half did the Confederate ram fight the whole Federal fleet, although the enemy made most determined and gallant efforts to run her down and to riddle her. When the Tennessee surrendered, her crew were utterly exhausted, and the brave Admiral Buchanan was wounded with a compound fracture of the leg, having been shot through the leg a little below the knee. Admiral Farragut proposed to General Page that the wounded, both Federals and Confederates, should be taken to Pensacola, where they would be properly cared for. General Page consented to this arrangement.

The monitor Tecumseh was struck by a torpedo, and sank so rapidly that only ten of her crew escaped. The Oneida was so injured by the ram of the Tennessee that she was only kept from sinking by being run into shoal water. The Hartford also suffered severely, and is to be sent north for repairs.

Admiral Farragut displayed excellent judgment and seamanlike courage. It appears that, before going into action, he caused himself to be lashed to the rigging of the Hartford, and, by a speaking-trumpet running to the deck, communicated his orders to the fleet. He remained in this elevated position until the engagement was over. Admiral Farragut is a Southerner by birth, his native place being New Orleans.

The Confederates have abandoned Fort Powell, the garrison escaping. Fort Gaines was surrendered by its commander, Colonel Charles Anderson. According to the Federal official report, it surrendered 'with 56 officers, 818 men, 26 guns, and one year's provisions.' At present this affair is shrouded in mystery, and the Southern press charge Colonel Anderson with 'inexplicable and shameful conduct.' Fort Morgan refuses to surrender, and is supposed to be provisioned for six months. The fort was assailed on the 9th, but, according to latest advices, had successfully resisted the attack. Admiral Farragut has made a reconnaissance within two miles of the Confederate forts, and opened an ineffectual fire. The loss of Forts Gaines and Powell is deplored; but still Mobile is in no danger from a naval attack. Between the city and the hostile fleet are miles of fortifications and earthworks. Our New Orleans correspondent gives an account of these operations.

SHERIDAN is getting notorious for the celerity of his movements. In the morning it is reported that he is hotly pursuing the Confederates; in the evening it is reported that he is being pursued by the Confederates. On August 16, Sheridan reports that he defeated a body of Confederate cavalry with a loss of 300 men. On the 17th he was beaten with a loss of 300 men, and had to retreat to Harper's Ferry. On the 13th a train of 70 wagons and 300 mules for Sheridan was captured by General Mosby near Berryville. The Washington correspondent of the New York Daily News writes that Sheridan's campaign has been a complete failure, and says: 'There is too much reason to believe that the Confederates will now be able to hold the Shenandoah Valley until the campaign at Atlanta is decided, and then make it the base of extensive offensive operations against the North.'

THE news from Georgia is rather meagre, but it is on the whole favourable to the Confederates, and causes uneasiness in Washington. Hood has kept Sherman in check, and all the attempts of the Federal commander to extend his lines have been repulsed with heavy losses. In the meantime Hood is being largely reinforced. The Richmond Whig says: 'The militia are responding to General Hood's call for reinforcements en masse, with an alacrity that shows they are really in earnest.' The correspondent of the Augusta Sentinel of the 9th says: 'Our army has been strengthened to a considerable extent of late. How many thousands of State troops have arrived I cannot mention, but this much I can say: General Smith is at the head of a large and splendid body of men, and they are daily increasing in numbers. And in addition to these reinforcements the fighting material has been increased by putting guns in the hands of the working details. Negroes are now performing service for the men in the trenches. An effort is being made to secure negro drivers, which, if it succeeds, will add three thousand more to the ranks. From all sources there has been an addition to the army that greatly increases general confidence in ultimate success.'

ON August 16, there was a fight at Graysville, about eighteen miles from Chattanooga. The Confederates were under the command of General Wheeler. The Federal accounts do not state the result of the action; but as they admit that the Federal commander, General Stoneman, was wounded, and Colonel Straight was killed, we may conclude that the result was not favourable to the Federals.

NEW YORK has been enlivened by the visit of a Confederate cruiser off Long Island. This vessel, the Tallahassee, captured about fifty vessels in a few days, amongst others the emigrant ship Adriatic from London. This must have annoyed Mr. Lincoln's recruiting agents. After this short and very successful cruise, the Tallahassee put into Halifax, but, after receiving three hundred tons of coals, was ordered off by Admiral Hope. She left immediately, steering eastward. After her departure a Federal gunboat steamed into the harbour to watch the 'pirate.'

The Tallahassee is a blockade-runner, and intended for commercial and not warlike purposes. The Federals may learn from this that the loss of the Alabama does not make their commerce safe on the ocean.

THE M'Clellan meeting in New York on August 10 was attended by an immense concourse of people, and there was throughout great enthusiasm. The Herald calls it an 'Anti-Lincoln' meeting, and certainly all the speakers took care to denounce the Administration, and were loudly applauded for so doing. But this great meeting was also an exposition of the peace sentiment of the North. The auditors only shouted for M'Clellan when the speakers pointed to him as the restorer of peace. It is apparent that, so far as the peace sentiment is concerned, the meeting was far in advance of its promoters, and there are some who think that M'Clellan's friends, taking the hint, will run their candidate on a thorough peace policy. We elsewhere publish the resolutions that were adopted at the meeting. We do not know if they are to be regarded as the M'Clellan platform; but if so, it is safe to predict that General M'Clellan will not be elected.

EVEN those who have been watching the growth of a peace sentiment in the North must be surprised at its recent rapid development. It is now impossible to describe the progress of the peace movement except in general terms. In all parts of the country there are peace meetings. All the papers teem with peace articles. Rumour says that Mr. Lincoln is about to place himself at the head of a movement he cannot control, and to propose an armistice. The following are a few specimens of the resolutions passed at the peace meetings.

At a meeting held in Pike County, Delaware, it was resolved:—

That we are in favour of an armistice and a cessation of hostilities in order to terminate the terrible slaughter of our men, and to avoid the utter bankruptcy of the nation, and to prevent the erection of a military despotism on the ruins of civil liberty.

That we are in favour of immediate peace and against the further prosecution of this war.

That the Government of the United States has no right to coerce a sovereign State.

That, if we cannot restore the Union by peaceable measures, we are in favour of an acknowledgment of the independence and sovereignty of the States composing the Southern Confederacy.

At a meeting held in Berks County, it was resolved:—

That we also agree with Mr. Lincoln, when in his inaugural he says: 'Suppose you go to war, you cannot fight always: and when, after much loss on both sides and no gain on either, you cease fighting, the identical questions as to terms of intercourse are again upon you.' That we believe the loss has been sufficient and fast becoming ruinous, and we therefore call upon Mr. Lincoln to 'cease fighting,' and do now what we must at some time do, agree upon 'terms of intercourse.'

At a meeting of the people of Crawford County, Ohio, it was resolved:—

The experience of the last three years proves most conclusively that war cannot restore the Union.

We consider that every life hereafter lost in this most atrocious war will be a deliberate murder, and every dollar wrung from the pocket of the tax-payer to further its prosecution a downright robbery.

In view of these facts we therefore resolve:

1. That justice and humanity demand the immediate cessation of hostilities, and the adoption of peace measures, as the only hope of the people.

2. That we remonstrate against any draft upon the able-bodied men of the country to assist in prolonging a war that we believe uncalled for and superlatively wicked.

At a meeting held at Peoria, Illinois, at which 40,000 people were present, it was resolved:

That we warn this Administration to desist from its encroachments upon the rights and liberties of the citizens of our State, and resolve that we will not tolerate the rule of martial law, of military interference with elections, or any more arbitrary arrests of our citizens, to the maintenance of which we pledge our lives, our fortunes, and our sacred honour.'

At a meeting held at Bucyrus, Ohio, it was resolved 'that justice and humanity demand the immediate cessation of hostilities, and the adoption of peace measures, as the only hope of the people.'

At a convention held at Syracuse, New York, resolutions were adopted in favour of an armistice.

Amongst other papers, the Tribune proposes peace negotiations. It says:—

We feel certain that two-thirds of the American people on either side of the dividing line anxiously, absorbingly, desire peace, and are ready to make all needful sacrifices to insure it. Then why shall it be long withheld? Let us know, as soon as may be, the most that the rebel chiefs will do to secure peace—let us know what is the 'ultimatum' on our side. We have no sympathy with the shuddering dread that our Government may, by listening to propositions from the rebels, virtually acknowledge their independence. Etiquette is the disease of little minds; great souls are never troubled by it.

But the course pursued by the Herald is the most noteworthy. When that paper comes out boldly for any policy, we may be sure it represents the popular sentiment. We append a few quotations from the Herald articles, which, together with various pro-peace paragraphs, appear in every issue:—

'The Administration can afford to try the magnanimous experiment of opening the door to negotiations for peace. Suppose, for example, President Lincoln were to appoint three commissioners to Richmond, with authority to conclude an armistice for six months, and to enter into arrangements, subject to the ratification of Congress, for a Peace and Union Convention of all the States, could the Administration or the great cause of the loyal States lose anything? President Lincoln, therefore, in our opinion, will establish a claim to sagacity and wisdom as a statesman and as a politician in taking the initiative in behalf of peace, by despatching three commissioners to Richmond with the overtures suggested.'

'One of the best features of the plan of restoring the Union by an armistice and convention of States is that it requires no more blood, no more fighting, no more treasure. It will end the war speedily and honourably. None but Radical ghouls and copperhead traitors can object to it.'

'The peace propositions we have suggested must emanate from headquarters at Washington. To this end we would call upon the citizens of this great metropolis, taking the lead in the war from the beginning, to take the lead now in behalf of an armistice as the first step towards peace. We call upon our merchant princes, manufacturers, financiers, tradesmen, working men—men of all professions and all pursuits—regardless of party notions and party leaders, to proceed at once to the work of bringing together a grand independent citizens' meeting in Union Square for the express object of appointing a committee of five hundred representative citizens to wait upon President Lincoln in behalf of an embassy to Richmond, with liberal overtures for an armistice and a convention of all the States, North and South, in order to see if this dreadful war cannot be ended in a mutually satisfactory treaty of peace.'

'If any bad blood remained on either side, it would soon disappear, or be purged by a foreign war. With a combined veteran army of over a million of men, and a fleet more powerful than that of any European Power, we could order France from Mexico, England from Canada, and Spain from Cuba, and enforce our orders if they were not obeyed. The American continent would then belong to Americans.'

This last paragraph is a proof that the Herald is in earnest about the armistice. It appeals to the hatred of England and France in order to make the proposition acceptable.

A CONVENTION in Maryland chosen under the auspices of Federal bayonets, lately recommended that harsh measures should be adopted against 'disloyal' citizens. No one was surprised that a body elected under such circumstances should echo the sentiments of Mr. Lincoln. But it appears that so strong is the patriotic feeling in Maryland that the military power of the Federal Government did not suffice to insure loyalty, and that a minority of thirty-five members presented a spirited protest against the action of the Convention.

THE mortality amongst the negro troops is appalling. The specification of an order issued at New Orleans to consolidate the negro regiments, shows that the reorganisation into ten regiments absorbs the shattered remnants of thirty-eight. The New York Daily News remarks: 'The Corps d'Afrique, then, may be supposed, notwithstanding all the recruiting of the unscrupulous energies of Abolitionism, to have been cut off by disease and battle to the extent of sixty-five per cent. of its original force. Alas, that a man's colour should make it benevolence to butcher him!'

AT the time when the North is bent upon recruiting with negroes, a letter written by General Sherman to an agent in the State of New York has created a disagreeable impression. He says: 'The negro is in a transition state, and is not the equal of the white man. . . . I prefer negroes for pioneers, teamsters, cooks, and servants.'

THE rumoured resignation of Mr. Stanton is contradicted. It is said in some quarters that he had resigned and withdrew his resignation at the earnest request of Mr. Lincoln.

GENERAL BURNSIDE is charged with the responsibility of the Federal failure at Petersburg. He has been relieved of his command, and is succeeded by General Wilcox.

MR. HALL, a member of Congress, has been arrested in Missouri by the Federals for saying, 'I hold Abraham Lincoln to be as much an enemy to this Government as Jefferson Davis.'

WILLIAMS COLLEGE, Massachusetts, has conferred upon B. F. Butler the honorary degree of Doctor of Laws. It is not for us to question the fitness of this act. It is not for us to deny that the infamous Butler is a worthy member of a Massachusetts College.

ENGLAND.

WHEN it was discovered by the Common Council that on the average 706,621 persons entered the city of London daily, that of these 171,086 were in cabs and omnibuses, and that the number of vehicles entering daily was 57,765, it was but natural that the absurdity of about three-fourths of these numbers being crammed into one street, and that but a narrow one, should strike forcibly on the minds of the guardians of the city interests. On their promotion a Bill has been passed by the Legislature, conferring extensive powers for the regulation of the traffic on the civic authorities. Of course there is a slight flaw in the Act, and consequently, of the eighteen by-laws proposed by the Council to the Home Secretary, only about three are held to be legal. However, these have already shown results sufficient to reward all the exertions made. The regulations, indeed, are simple enough. All cabs and omnibuses going and returning between St. Paul's Cathedral and London Bridge are ordered to pass down Cannon Street instead of Cheapside. Merchandise exceeding certain dimensions can be carried only before 9 o'clock in the morning and after 6 o'clock in the evening; and a total prohibition is placed on scaffolding, heavy timber, and the like during the day. These simple regulations have been in operation about a fortnight, and the effect is simply magical. Indeed, it is now even possible to get along Cheapside at a fair rate of progression, and it is no longer a feat of high courage to cross the Poultry in front of the Mansion House. It is to be hoped that a successful commencement will urge the Council to yet more skilful devices for rendering the city a thoroughfare, and not an elaborate system of barricades.

THE Committee appointed in June by Lord De Grey and Ripon to examine the question of arming the British infantry with breech-loading rifles, has issued its report. The evidence of Major Young, who was present at the reviews of the Prussian army in 1861, was decidedly against the use of such weapons. On the other hand, Colonel Walker, who was in Slesvig in March, and Colonel Tower, who was present at the siege of Dybbol, declared that the success of the Prussian breech-loaders was acknowledged both by the Austrian and Prussian officers. Two officers who had been sent on a mission of enquiry to the United States stated that Mr. Stanton had refused to permit them to accompany the Federal army. They, however, said that an officer from the Confederate States had been arrested in New York while engaged in procuring machinery for the manufacture of such weapons for the Southern army. The Committee were unanimous in recommending the arming of the British troops with breech-loaders; and advertisements have been issued from the War Office for schemes for converting the Enfield rifles.

A SPECTACLE that could not fail to warm the heart of a friend of the people was witnessed in London on Friday last. Some weeks since a notice of the Queen's visit to the Royal Horticultural Gardens was given in these columns, and it was then recorded that, at the suggestion of Her Majesty, the Council of the Society had resolved to honour the memory of the Prince Consort by opening the gardens to the people on the anniversary of the birth of the Prince. At ten o'clock on the 26th ult., the gates, which already were besieged by large crowds, were thrown open, and remained so till seven o'clock in the evening. During the day about 120,000 persons, men, women, and children, visited the grounds. No charge was made, and no restrictions imposed on the people except a modest request that they would not eat their dinners in the flower-garden. Some few police were visible, their orders being to show enquirers the various modes of exit from the grounds. Several bands were in attendance, and not the least agreeable feature were the processions of many of the metropolitan schools. Late in the evening the visitors in position on the upper terraces sang the national anthem to the lead of trumpets, with fine effect. The weather was charming, and the crowds of people appeared to be much delighted with their holiday.

MR. J. TUCKER CRAWFORD, Consul-General at Havannah and also Commissary Judge, died on July 21 at Havannah. The deceased gentleman held the office of Acting Consul-General in Portugal from 1822 to 1827. He was appointed Consul-General at Havannah in 1842. He was made a Companion of the Order of the Bath in 1859.

THE Coroner for Middlesex has held an inquest on the body of Barbara Lee, formerly 'Queen of the Gipsies' in England. From the evidence of Keziah Lee, the daughter-in-law of the deceased, it appeared that Barbara Lee had died quite suddenly while lying on the ground asleep after supper. Neither the deceased woman, nor indeed any one of the tribe, ever had known a day's sickness or a doctor's care, and the witness in answer to the Coroner strongly protested that the workhouse would have killed the 'old lady' years before. She also further declared that the Gipsy Queen was no more than her subjects, and that the tribes recognised Her Majesty as their only Queen. The deceased was nearly one hundred years old. The corpse was buried in the Victoria Park Cemetery, and the funeral was attended by the gipsy tribe and a great concourse of spectators.

BELFAST is tranquil from sheer exhaustion, at least so far as open violence is concerned. The Peace Society has exerted itself with considerable success in effecting the reconciliation of the belligerent parties, the protection of the inoffensive, and the suppression of the threatening notices. In many cases the prohibition to work in certain factories or to dwell in particular districts has been withdrawn by the respective factions, and Roman Catholics and Protestants have been induced once more to labour for the same master or to reside in the same quarter. Deputations from the Society are engaged in visiting all the mills and other establishments, and in appealing to the good feeling of the people to terminate their feuds. A reward of 100*l.* has been offered for the detection of any writer of a threatening letter or notice, and the proclamation has been signed by the principal firms in the town. An attempt at a fight in Longford was suppressed, chiefly by the Roman Catholic clergy. An effigy of King William had been prepared for the celebration of an Irish auto da fe, but the rioters finally yielded to persuasion and abandoned their design.

LORD PALMERSTON having enlightened his constituents at Tiverton on the political and social condition of the country with his usual alacrity, determined to exchange serious studies for gay delights, and to enjoy a day's racing with his friends. Tiverton races are but poor fun in themselves, and no one can doubt that the noble Premier was the most attractive object on the course. His Lordship led off with a cordial grasp of the hand with Mr. Rowcliffe, butcher and political antagonist in ordinary to the dominant party in Tiverton, an admirable foil for the Premier's wit, and well calculated to show the world how jovial Lord Palmerston can be with an acknowledged foe. After the conclusion of the sport the company adjourned to the Three Tuns Hotel, and proceeded to perform the ceremony of eating the Tiverton Race Dinner. At the termination of the repast, the chairman proposed in flattering terms the health of the members for Tiverton, namely, Lord Palmerston and the Hon. G. Denman. The speech of the Premier in reply was so characteristic of the man that we cannot forbear giving an extract from it. He observed that 'the House of Commons very much resembled a racecourse. First of all, parties went there and ran for the Queen's Plate. It was a general sweepstakes, and more than one shared the stakes. Then, again, there was the match, and he was a lucky man who did not meet his match. However, almost every man did meet his match, and was not contented with the encounter. Again, the rules were similar to those of the turf, for there was that good feeling in the House of Commons which gave weight for age. The young ones, indeed, were very apt to bolt out of the course. Moreover, it not unfrequently happened that a very good horse broke down. In fact, in things seemingly different there was a very great analogy.' If the comparison might be continued, it would be a fair subject for regret that the stars of the turf wane with lamentable rapidity, while no weight that the great handicapper, Time, can impose is sufficient to deprive the favourite in the House of Commons of success, even in the most desperate encounters.

ALL annual reports yield in interest to that of the Registrar-General of Births, Marriages, and Deaths in England. It is not necessary to submit the will to the doctrine laid down in the Cornhill Magazine, and consent to be born, marry, commit acts of benevolence or acts of felony, and finally to die at particular dates and under particular circumstances, in order to save an average from displacement. At the same time statistics are not contemptible. They teach something, seem to teach much more, and are certainly amusing. One fault, however, must be found with the Registrar of Marriages, Births, and Deaths, and that is, that he is very considerably behindhand. In these days of unparalleled speed news of the age of eighteen months is somewhat stale, and, unreasonable as the desire may be, it is but natural on September 1, 1864, to desire something more recent than the facts of the year 1862. In that year we find that in England and Wales 328,060 persons were married, 712,684 children were born, and 436,566 persons died. Of the marriages, 79 per cent. were solemnised according to the rites of the Established Church. A considerable increase is observed in Roman Catholic marriages. The Jews boasted but 300 nuptials, and that respectable section, the Quakers, only 59. No less than 22,457 widowers made a second venture, but of these only 7,891 contented themselves with widows for their wives; of the 14,737 widows who a second time entered the state of wedlock, 6,846 were espoused by bachelors. The educational test furnished by the ability to sign the marriage register shows a decided improvement. In 1862, only 28 per cent. were unable to write their names, while in 1847 these uneducated individuals reached the frightful percentage of 41. Westmoreland shows the most creditable and Monmouthshire the least creditable return. In births the proportion of males to females was 104 to 100, and of all the counties of England Durham was the most prolific. The number of illegitimate children was only 6 per cent. on all the births, but the counties of Westmoreland and Cumberland, probably from their proximity to Scotland, were conspicuous for the production of bastards at the rate of 11 per cent. The comparative numbers of births and deaths justly call for the remark in the Report, that were it not for emigration the excess of births over deaths would in three years have added a population equal to that of Liverpool and Birmingham united.

In the metropolis 34 children were born to every 1,000 persons, and the births in 1862 exceeded those in 1852 by 17,000. There is, indeed, reason to think that in the present year the births will not be less than 1,000,000.

It is somewhat remarkable that the terrible ravages of the cotton famine have not left their mark on the death registers—a result to be of course attributed to the immense provision for pauperism made at the commencement of the American blockade. Marriages, however, were less numerous, the dictates of common prudence forbidding the operatives to increase the demand on their resources at such a crisis.

THE quantity of unmanufactured tobacco imported into the United Kingdom in the six months ending June 30, 1864, was 15,358,105 lbs. The quantity imported during the same period in the year 1863 was 12,923,357 lbs., and during the same period in 1862 only 7,436,306 lbs. The quantity of manufactured tobacco imported is very greatly on the increase, owing to the reduction of the duty. During six months ending June 30, 1864, the supplies were 3,041,129 lbs., as compared with 1,222,493 lbs. in 1863, and 553,863 lbs. in 1862. It is scarcely necessary to point out that the small import of unmanufactured tobacco in 1862 was caused by the American war.

LAST week some hundreds of persons from Boulogne and other places on the north coast of France made an excursion to the Crystal Palace at Sydenham. On the same day some thousands of the Foresters also visited the Palace, and the London Gymnastic Society's fête took place. The directors had made ample provision for the entertainment of the excursionists. Mr. Coxwell made an ascent in his balloon, the great fountains played, and the bands of the Coldstream Guards and of the Sapeurs Pompiers de la Ville de St. Pierre performed during the day. The visitors from France appeared to derive very great pleasure from the proceedings. A new marvel has been now added to the numerous attractions of the Palace, in the shape of a railway in which the pneumatic principle is applied for passenger traffic. The line is 600 yards long, and runs throughout in a tunnel. The tunnel is 10 feet high and 9 feet wide. A framework attached to the carriage fits the form of the tunnel, the interval between the wood and the arch being filled with a mass of bristles. Two discs 22 feet in diameter, revolving in an iron case, constitute the motive power, and are turned by a small steam-engine.

HER Majesty the Queen has left Windsor for Scotland, with the intention of spending six weeks at Balmoral. The Duke and Duchess of Saxe-Coburg Gotha accompanied the Queen. Her Majesty was present at the uncovering of the statue erected at Perth to the late Prince Consort.

INDIA.

The internal state of Bhootan is said to be most deplorable, and a series of civil wars is expected. Several chiefs are striving to gain the chief power at the head of their respective factions. Ambaree and Fallacottah had been annexed to the British Empire, and the Bhootan Government had been informed that strong measures would be taken by the Governor-General unless speedy reparation was made for the capture of the Bengalees and the plunder committed.

From Cabul it was reported that Shere Ali had visited Afzul Khan under a flag of truce, and had been treacherously made a prisoner. The tidings, however, required confirmation.

THE CONTINENT.

FRANCE.

A horrible murder was committed a few weeks ago in the South of France. The victim was M. de Lassalle; he lived in a very penurious manner at a house of the high-sounding title of Château Baillard. One day he was found lying dead in his house, his desk broken in, and its contents stolen; and, to complete the horror, three of his servants also murdered. Two men, Latour and Audouy, were arrested on suspicion; their trial has been the chief object of public attention during the past week. To outsiders there is no point in it of remarkable interest; the speech of the Procureur-Général for the prosecution was, singularly enough, not only vindictive, but in bad taste; he loaded the wretched prisoners with accusations of blasphemy and hypocrisy, in a manner which certainly reflected the charges back upon himself. The prisoner Latour conducted his own defence; he said he had already been in trouble for other accusations, and had always been found guilty through the folly or knavery of his advocate. His own endeavours on this occasion were not more successful; he was condemned to death, and Audouy to penal servitude.

The French Administration have adopted the English custom of vacation speeches to an appalling extent. Besides several of smaller note, we find the Duc de Persigny, M. Rouher, M. Rouland, and M. Behic among the Ministers and other notables who have been starring it in the provinces of France during the last week. Strange to say, there was a marked disagreement between the statements of these distinguished men. M. Rouland in addressing the Council-General for the Lower Seine, and M. Rouher in opening that for the Puy de Dôme, informed their audiences that it was the wish of the Government to widen the programme of subjects for discussion at the Councils-General; they hoped that the decentralising tendency of the present Administration would increase the liberty of the nation, so that, while the State refrained from vexatious meddling, the free activity of every citizen would be promoted and encouraged. M. de Persigny, on the other hand, in addressing the Council-General of the Loire, informed his hearers that the liberty of France, a liberty worth all those of the rest of the world put together, was the consequence of the admirable administrative hierarchy with which that country was blessed. 'Take away in England,' said he, 'the whole of the electors of one county—that is, the whole of that class which administers and secures justice, collects the taxes, and secures public order—what have you left? Chaos and misery. But in France take away all the electors of a commune, you have left to you the Government officers, and the administration of the place may go on, scarcely feeling the loss of a hundred or two of citizens.' Such is M. de Persigny's knowledge of foreign countries; from it he deduces the fact that there is more liberty in France than in England. Such is his logic. So impressed was he, however, with the truth of his theory, that as a corollary to it he proposed the toast 'Napoleon III., the founder of liberty in France.' He is to a certain extent right; under no former rule has there prevailed so absolute a freedom from the laws which, since the time of Aristotle downwards, have restrained our right of forming a correct judgment, as that in which he rejoices. The French press has not been slow to take up the gauntlet, and has, in the first place, denied the accuracy of his statements, and, secondly, has refuted his theory of liberty. They point out that his idea of liberty resting on the basis of an administrative hierarchy is utterly inconsistent with the hopes expressed by MM. Rouland and Rouher, that the Councils-General would be allowed a wider scope for their discussions. He still clings to centralisation; the Ministers speak of decentralisation as an object to be aimed at, and point to the Councils-General as a means for effecting that object.

Prince Humbert, the Crown Prince of Italy, has arrived in Paris after his visit to Denmark. He has been received with due honour by the Emperor, and by his brother-in-law the Prince Napoleon. There are rumours of a projected marriage between him and the Princess Anna Murat. They would have greater weight were it not that the lady is about six years his senior, and has already been given by public report to well-nigh every available potentate who has yet visited France. The Prince is only twenty years of age. A soldier by birth and profession, he is likely to be popular among a military people. As described by a contemporary, he is of irregular features (to use the very mildest possible term), but of a frank, open, and manly countenance. It would be a most remarkable fusion of families were the heir to the crown of Italy to marry a descendant of the great cavalry officer to whom was given the kingdom of Naples as spoils of war.

The venerable maestro Rossini held a fête on the 27th ult. at his villa at Passy. Several of the greatest vocalists of France, England, and Italy assembled to do honour to the festival. Among them were Mrs. Lemmens-Sherrington, MM. Faure, Tamburini, and Vautterot.

It is estimated that the telegraphic lines in France (exclusive of those used by railways for their own purposes) stretch over 98,446 kilometres, or 61,528¾ miles; the average annual number of private telegrams is one million and a half, despatched from 1,301 stations.

The engagements for the Great Paris Prize at the French Derby for 1866 have just been made, and number 94 horses against 83 in 1863, 126 in 1864, and 112 in 1865. The winning of that event by a French horse this year appears to have stimulated the owners of racehorses in France; for of those now entered 53 are French and 41 only English, while in previous years the proportion of English to French was as two to one.

At the inauguration of the Northern Spanish Railway at San Sebastian on the 15th ult., M. Isaac Pereire read an address to the King of Spain after the benediction of the locomotives, in which, while commenting on the fulfilment of Louis XIV.'s exclamation, 'There are now no Pyrenees!' he used the following expressions:—'If we congratulate ourselves upon these pacific conquests, if we glorify ourselves, it is because they powerfully second the religious tendency of societies to unite their forces towards a common end. On all sides the way is opened by treaties, whose first result will be the free exchange of the various products with which nature has gifted each country; every day, in fact, prepares the new order of things clearly indicated by the Emperor Napoleon III. when he proposed to Europe to substitute the judgment of Congresses for the deeds of force and the consequences that only a blind impiety can term the judgments of God. The establishment of railways is the first step in this fruitful course of the future.'

THE DANISH QUESTION.

The peace negotiations have not yet commenced in Vienna. Everything indicates that they will be long and laborious. Besides the question of the debts, there is also the division of the common fortune to settle, and it appears that the pretensions of the defenders of the Duchies are exorbitant. On the other hand, the Danish plenipotentiaries intend to demand a change in the rectification of the frontiers as stipulated in the preliminaries. It is to be presumed that such proposals will meet with a warm opposition, as it is well understood that the German Powers only acceded to the conditions of the present armistice on the supposition of the loyalty and absence of reservation on the part of the Danish plenipotentiaries.

DENMARK.

At the sitting of the Rigsraad held on the 27th ult., the President of the Council, Herr von Bluhme, solemnly declared that at the peace negotiations the Government would endeavour to protect the interests of the Slesvigers, both as to their national and political rights. This declaration was received by the House with loud and general applause.

GERMANY.

The two German Powers, if the telegrams are to be believed, have come to a complete understanding on the subject of the conquered Duchies. Prussia is to receive territorial, political, and military compensation for the cession of Slesvig-Holstein. The claims of the Grand Duke of Oldenburg are consequently gaining ground; while the Duke of Augustenburg has had the opportunity at length of asserting his demands formally before the Diet in a memorial.

As to the Duchies themselves and their constitution, little clouds are already beginning to arise, which show that the snake of Prussian constitutionalism has been scotched, not killed, by the late war. We can scarcely now remember, so quickly have events succeeded one another, that, but a few weeks before the beginning of the Slesvig-Holstein quarrel, all Europe was looking with curious eyes upon the constitutional struggle in Prussia. Would the King abdicate, or the people rise? The question hung trembling in the balance, when the war abruptly stepped in and pushed the scales aside. Now, however, that it is shrewdly suspected that Herr von Bismarck will deprive these territories of the constitution given to them in 1848, and give them one more nearly resembling that which he would, if possible, set on foot in Prussia, the Opposition journals of Berlin see the cloven hoof displayed under the robe of the liberator. They see the thin end of the wedge of despotism introduced into their system through these quasi-conquered provinces, and they are not slow to speak up in their behalf. 'They are expected,' says the Volkszeitung, 'to abandon, on the question of land, money, and men, a fearful share of their self-government. But supposing they were to ask us, "Do you, Prussian friends, propose to relinquish your right of self-government also?" We are to submit to the Prussian recruiting system; do you approve of this system? We are to adopt your organisation of the army; have you sanctioned this organisation? We are to bear a share of the military estimates; do you recognise a similar liability on your part? We are to cede territory for dockyards, ports, &c., we are to furnish money for the building of ships, fortresses; are you prepared to incur all the sacrifices which similar operations would necessitate with you? We are to enter into an alliance for war and peace; are you, we ask, disposed unhesitatingly to accept whatever your Government may choose to do?'

The King of Prussia is paying a series of visits to the minor potentates of Germany. Great expectations are entertained of the effect of his meeting with the young King of Bavaria; it is hoped that 'many a dark cloud which still overshadows the horizon of Germany may vanish before this royal meeting.' His Prussian Majesty also pays a passing visit to the King of Wurtemburg, on his way to Baden-Baden. He is everywhere preceded by Herr von Bismarck, who doubtless finds that the King stands in great need of the service of an avant-courrier.

At the closing of the Saxon Chambers the King addressed the deputies on the various subjects which have occupied their attention, and among other things expressed his regret that the Saxon troops were prohibited from actively taking part with the Allies in the late war, and said: 'The unshaken discipline and the strict fulfilment of their duty under difficult circumstances by the Saxon troops must, however, be acknowledged, and those are qualities as necessary to the soldier as valour on the field of battle. This testimony is due to those brave men.'

The Russian Legation at Frankfort has commenced proceedings against L'Europe for an article in which the Emperor of Russia was called a 'crowned executioner.' Another prosecution has been instituted by the Prussian Legation against the same paper for similar language respecting King William of Prussia.

It is officially stated that Wurtemburg intends to propose that the minor German States, with Bavaria at their head, should form a third Power in the German Confederation, the other two being Austria and Prussia.

SWITZERLAND.

The generally quiet city of Geneva has passed through a violent attack of fever, none the less critical that it was short. Election disturbances are apt to bring out the hidden devil in a people; but it will be a matter of surprise to Europe that a demon of such magnitude should so long have been concealed under the amiable exterior of the good burgesses of Geneva. It appears that in the election to the Council of State the Conservative candidate, M. Chenevière, beat his Radical opponent, M. Fazy, by 5,677 votes to 5,340. The bureau of election, consisting of 17 Radicals and 10 Conservatives, immediately annulled the election by a vote of 17 to 10. The Conservative anger was roused; a public meeting was held, delegates sent to the Council of State, and a promise of redress obtained. Overjoyed at this result, the crowd formed a procession through the streets; when suddenly it was fired upon by a body of armed men, stationed some in the streets, others in the surrounding houses. The crowd turned aside into the Place de l'Hôtel de Ville, occupied and barricaded it, forced open the Arsenal and secured muskets, and prepared to defend themselves. The Radicals then raised counter barricades and armed them with cannon taken from another arsenal. In this state the two parties remained, in defiance of the entreaties of the Administration. The Government of the canton being powerless, the Federal Council sent their commissioner, M. Fornerod, to quiet the disturbance with a battalion of troops, and power to levy others in the cantons of Vaud and Neufchatel. By this time the opposed mobs were beginning to return to their senses; the excitement gradually cooled down, though not without a few spasmodic returns of violence. The burial of the victims of the first day's attack was expected to create another outbreak, but, luckily, such fears proved to be unfounded. The question of the election of M. Chenevière has been discussed by the Grand Council of Geneva, and they have resolved to request the Federals to support that gentleman's claims.

ITALY.

The Austrians appear to have discovered the existence of a widespread conspiracy against them, both in Venetia and the South Tyrol; numerous arrests have already taken place at Venice, Trent, Roveredo, Riva, and other towns. Depôts of arms and tricoloured flags have been discovered.

A great fire has taken place in the Forest of Picuzza, a Crown domain near Palermo. The people assembled and hastened to the spot in order to arrest the progress of the conflagration.

CHINA.

The news from Pekin by the last mail is of a cheering character. Sir F. Bruce has arrived at Hong Kong on his way to England; and it is believed that his conduct at the court of the Emperor has left an impression highly favourable both to the English and other Western nations. Mr. T. F. Wade remains as acting Minister for England at Pekin.

The Portuguese plenipotentiary had failed to obtain a ratification of the treaty between Portugal and China.

MEXICO.

The important city of Acapulco, the key of the province of the same name, has been surrounded by Imperialist forces under Alvarez, and is expected shortly to surrender. Juarez is still occupying Monterey, but his difficulties daily increase, on account of the strictness of the blockade maintained by the French cruisers. Heretofore the Yankees have been his chief purveyors; but they have now discovered the meaning of a true blockade, which they may contrast, with instruction to themselves, with that which they keep up over the east coast of the American continent. It is expected that, in consequence of a fresh determination on the part of Juarez, he will move in such a manner as to afford the French troops an opportunity of inflicting upon him a signal defeat during this autumn.

TUNIS.

Advices from Tunis have been received to August 21. It is officially announced that fourteen of the tribes have made their submission. Private letters state, however, that forty tribes are still in insurrection, and that several chiefs who had manifested a wish for peace had been killed. A chief who signed conditions of peace was obliged to take refuge in Tunis.

Disturbances continued at Sfax and Sousse. Most of the tribes demanded the dismissal of the Khasnadar.

EGYPT.

The difference between the United States Consul at Alexandria and the Egyptian Government has been adjusted. It is said that the chargé d'affaires of the United States in Constantinople highly disapproved the conduct of the Consul. The new Consul-General had arrived on August 18, and had been visited by Chirif Pacha.

PERU.

The Republic has taken up so determined an attitude that it is hoped that the Spanish Government will see the necessity of apologising to it. Her nearest neighbour, the Argentine Republic, has spoken up loudly in disapprobation of the seizure of the Chincha Islands. Should the worst arrive, therefore, the Peruvian Government feel secure in the sympathy of their neighbours, and their own power to resist an insolent demand.

CHILI.

The National Assembly has voted $1,500,000 for the increase of the navy, and very scientific discussions daily take place in that body on naval matters. As for the deputies, ironclads, cupola ships by Ericson and Cowper Coles, steam-rams, Armstrong, Whitworth, and Parrot guns, and all the mysteries of rifled ordnance, 'are familiar in their mouths as household words.' They request the Minister of Marine to state his views on these subjects, which that unfortunate functionary is by no means prepared to do.

Some amusement was lately caused at Valparaiso on the arrival of the Russian corvette Gaidamack from Callao. The officer in command of her requested the honour of an interview with the President, which was granted. Opinions were exchanged in the course of it, and the Russian captain was much pleased with his reception, until unfortunately, at the end of it, the President asked him whether he belonged to the Russian or Prussian navy.

INCONSISTENCY OF ANGLO-FEDERALS.—Every day some of the journals which recommend an abjectly pacific policy to the people and statesmen of Great Britain urge extreme war measures upon our American neighbours. To the Southern States, struggling now at least to preserve their territory from fire and sword, themselves from conquest, and their homes and families from the most hideous outrage and ruin, the worst motives are attributed. The very same writers who recommend at home a policy pregnant, if adopted, with the early unresisted dissolution of the British Empire, who would cry out if strong measures were taken to preserve or restore the ascendency of the mother country in Australia or Canada, advise the Washington authorities not to yield an inch to the claims of independence urged by nearly a half of the old Union States. Those who rejoiced over the English exodus from Corfu, and hint at the inexpediency of retaining Malta and Gibraltar, and who would probably meet a Roman Catholic insurrection in Ireland by an offer of a more thorough repeal than ever Daniel O'Connell dared to ask or cared to advocate, are the foremost in inciting the Northern States Government in America to risk everything, to spend and anticipate the resources of the country, and to change the nature of their free institutions, and destroy the hopeful characteristics of their land, by the adoption of the most extreme views of the dominion of a Government once established. The English Government, they say, may and perhaps ought to give up everything rather than fire a rifle in anger, or cause the sacrifice of a single rebel's life to preserve the oldest monarchy in Europe. But the newest and least consolidated commonwealth on the territories of the New World must be upheld by ruinous extravagance of life and fortune.—The Morning Advertiser, August 31.

VALUABLE EGGS.—The Custom House authorities of San Francisco have discovered a very ingenious Chinese trick in smuggling. A regular magical trick it is. Among the cargo of the barque Ceres were 400 tubs, invoiced as eggs, value stated at $1 each. The eggs were coated with a particular kind of varnish, to preserve them. One of the officers, in examining the eggs, scraped off a little varnish, and disclosed a metallic case, egg-shaped, filled with opium. Each metallic egg is worth $300. So far as the examination has proceeded, 500 have been found.

PRIVATE LETTER FROM RICHMOND.

WE have been favoured with the subjoined private letter from a young Confederate gentleman, who recently left his family and friends in Europe to take his place in the army. The letter has a peculiar value from the freshness of the first impressions which it records, and the glimpses it gives us of camp life.

RICHMOND: June 28, 1864.

My dear Mother,—More than three weeks have elapsed since I first set foot on the shores of Dixie, and yet, notwithstanding the most diligent enquiries, I have not heard of the arrival of a missive from you or from any one of my other beloved correspondents. I do not, however, give myself up to despair, and I am buoyed up with the hope that when they do come they will come, 'not single spies, but in battalions.' I ought not, however, to be surprised at this longum interallum in our correspondence, for to the risks and uncertainties of the blockade must be superadded the dislocation of postal communications caused by the proximity of the enemy to Richmond. The 'Yanks' have taken a leaf out of Morgan's and poor Stuart's book, and are now displaying more dash than we gave them credit for in the shape of raid-making. They prowl about in the vicinity, tear up railroad tracks, and cut telegraph wires, to the intense disgust of the post-office officials. So you see that, even after arriving in the Confederacy, letters are a very long time in reaching their destination. As an instance of this postal irregularity, I wrote to Mr. —— and to Mr. —— immediately after landing, and yet I have not received any answer from either of those gentlemen. The only thing to be done is to 'peg away,' in the hope that out of a mass of missives one may perchance be received. This is what I am doing, but, alas! so far with little success. Sheridan and his vile gang of plunderers, after a succession of discomfitures, have at length been 'wiped out' of the peninsula, where they have perpetrated the most fiendish atrocities. Punishment has overtaken these abominable miscreants, and now, after a sound drubbing administered to them by Hampton, they are cowering demoralised and panic-stricken under the protection of their gunboats. When —— ran the gauntlet of the Federal pickets, as I related in my last letter to il padre, Caroline County was occupied by Grant's army, and the poor old family homestead was hemmed in on all sides by the Federals, who pillaged and destroyed all the private residences within their reach. Up to the time of his departure they had not molested any of the inmates of —— or stolen anything from the interior of the house, but, to my inexpressible sorrow, I have just heard that the comparative immunity of my poor uncle was of short duration, for, when Grant, after that 'overwhelming victory' at Cold Harbour, was obliged to resume his triumphant but crab-like march to Richmond, he was followed by Sheridan's shattered command, who revenged themselves on the defenceless women and children for the hard blows the Virginian cavalry dealt them. Maddened by repeated defeats, they entered and proceeded to steal all they could lay their hands on. They carried off or tore up most of the clothes that were to be found, and, not content with robbing my uncle, my aunt, and my cousin of all they had, the ruffians actually laid violent hands on the food and money belonging to the slaves. This is their new system of freeing the negroes; for, having found the poor creatures loth to leave their masters, they now destroy all their provisions in order that the fear of starvation should make them follow the invaders. Some of the servants were induced by the threats and the lying representations of the Yankees to run away, but the great majority of them stubbornly declined to abandon their homes. I am restrained by decency from attempting to narrate all the abominable outrages which many unfortunate women have been the victims of in this last campaign—outrages so horrible that we ought to blush now at the thought of having lived in amity and under the same Government with such fiends incarnate. Four of these Vandals entered the house of a gentleman in King William County. He was away at the time, but his wife and daughter had not had time to effect their escape. They were immediately seized upon, and every description of brutal indignity was offered them. Their shrieks were happily heard by some of the negroes, who rushed to the rescue just in time to save them from the hands of the detestable Northern savages. The two women were locked up in a safe place by the slaves, who, in order to mollify the incensed Yankees, laid before them all the edibles and drinkables that were in the house. In the meantime one of the 'darkies' ran to the headquarters of General Fitzhugh Lee, informed him of what had taken place, and the General sent a troop of cavalry under the guidance of the faithful slave to the house. It was surrounded, and the Yankee wretches were bagged whilst gorging: a rope was procured, and they were forthwith hanged on a neighbouring tree!

Things have come to such a pass now that forbearance ceases to be a virtue. The coarse and brutal natures of the Northern people are incapable of appreciating patience and moderation; in fact, impunity only renders them more ferocious and more malignant. Reprisals have therefore become absolutely necessary, and it is only by striking terror into their black souls that these enormities can be stopped. These excesses of the enemy have so exasperated the people of the South that old men and the gentlest women all clamour for retribution. The Government is very much blamed for its weakness in submitting to Yankee barbarities, and in not taking an eye for an eye and a tooth for a tooth.

I went yesterday to visit the battle-field of Cold Harbour, where the Yankees are said to have lost 12,000 men. The battle had raged there about a month ago, and yet the ground was strewn with the corpses of Yankee soldiers festering in the broiling sun. The carnage must have been awful, for, within the space of about ten square yards, I counted no less than thirty dead bodies clothed in the Federal uniform. In some cases the flesh had been gnawed away and the skeletons alone remained, covered by Lincoln's detestable livery. On some parts of the field the dead were literally heaped up like stones. Perched on these mounds of human putrefaction were the sleek and sluggish buzzards of Virginia engaged in hideous orgies. Like the 'shoddy contractors' of the North, they too have grown fat on the war. This last campaign of Grant's must have met with their approval, for never has the army of the Potomac supplied them with such copious meals. Accoutrements and muskets were lying about in all directions, mixed up with cooking utensils and every description of débris. Notwithstanding these indisputable signs of a precipitate retreat, Grant and his employers have the unblushing audacity to claim a victory at Cold Harbour. The scene of desolation was heartrending: fields which before this deadly struggle were covered with waving crops are now trampled under foot and devastated; the houses in the vicinity are battered down and abandoned; and the poor farmers will have nothing to gather this year but Yankee carcases mowed down by Southern musketry.

My guide and companion on this sad expedition was a young Frenchman, who lost an arm in one of the fights in the West. As we were rambling over the battle-field, we fell in with two stragglers belonging to Grant's army. One of them had broken down, and was lying down almost dead with thirst and heat. Although tales of Northern ruthlessness were fresh upon my memory, I could not refrain from giving him some restoratives in the shape of a little whisky and water and a little liquid ginger, which is said to be an excellent thing for this climate. His comrade professed to be very contrite, and told me that he had been entrapped when drunk into the service, and that a few days after his impressment he had been sent down to fight the South. He appeared very anxious to be taken prisoner, and swore solemnly that he would never reenter the army. I had sallied out with the intention of joining the rear of Lee's army, but after hunting about for it all day we met a cavalryman, who told us that the whole of 'Massa Bob's' force had crossed the James River in order to confront the 'invincible Ulysses,' who had again changed his base. So we determined to retrace our steps to Richmond, and the next morning I left in a sutler's wagon for Petersburg, where General Lee has established his headquarters. The railroad to that place had been cut by the enemy; therefore I had to choose this mode of locomotion, which was none of the pleasantest, seeing that the heat was intense and the dust exceeded anything of the kind I had ever suffered before. I reached Petersburg after a journey of ten hours, and made straight for the headquarters of the great commander; but aides-de-camp and orderlies were rushing in and out so frantically that I thought this was not a seasonable occasion for an humble individual like myself to ask for an interview. I had brought out a letter of introduction from Mr. W. C. Rives (whose kindness, let me tell you en passant, I shall never forget) to General Field, now commanding Hood's famous division of Texans and Georgians, and so I determined to shape my course towards his division. In order to do so I had to make many enquiries, but the civilians were too much flurried to give me much information, for the Yankees were shelling the city at the time, and the noisy projectiles were tumbling about in a very alarming manner. I saw one in particular fall through the roof of the Yankee hospital, and the shriek which followed the explosion was the most awful I have ever heard. I don't know how long I would have been obliged to 'loaf' about had I not met a civil young soldier, who kindly volunteered to show me the way to Field's division. As he belonged to a Georgian brigade in that command, I followed him, and he first took me to his own regiment, which, not having formed yet into line of battle, was taking it easy pro tem. in a cosy little valley well sheltered from the enemy's artillery. There I was asked by some of the privates to partake of their supper. The warm-hearted fellows pressed me so much that I consented to pitch into their grub—not, however, without some compunction, as I thought of the harrowing stories of starvation amongst the soldiers which have grieved us ever since this war commenced. But my scruples were soon quieted when I perceived that they had plenty of corn-meal out of which they made capital cakes, an abundance of bacon and vegetables, and very fair coffee. After supper my good-natured guide showed me the way to General Field's headquarters. I had a few moments of very interesting conversation with the General, who is a very gentlemanly and well-informed man. He gave me permission to visit his lines. When we started for our breastworks, night had come, and skirmishing was going on all along the front; consequently our progress thither was, to say the least, very exciting, for Minie balls whistled every now and then close to our ears, and shells burst, as I thought, very near to us. At last we reached the trenches. There I sat some time chatting with the Texans, who seem to be a jovial set of fellows and utterly unmindful of cannon-balls and rifle bullets. Crack-crack went the enemy's rifles, and yet my Texan friends laughed and talked as unconcernedly as if they were enjoying themselves in a café. The enemy made an attack upon our right that night, and were repulsed with great loss, losing 1,600 prisoners. It is evident that, after the frightful carnage of the past six weeks, they no longer charge our breastworks with any élan. The Southern troops are dead tired of burrowing like moles in holes and trenches. They want to meet the foe in the open, and to drive off Grant as they did M'Clellan. I am happy to say that so far my health is capital, although the heat is the most terrific I have ever experienced. It is in the room in which I am writing no less than 105 degrees, and yet it is supposed to be in the shade. Mais hélas! I have come to the end of my last sheet, and so I must say adieu to you, my dearest, dearest mother. With kind remembrances to you all, I fondly embrace you.

GENERAL S. D. LEE'S TROOPS.—The following is a congratulatory order from Lieutenant-General Lee to his troops:—'Headquarters, Department of Alabama, Mississippi and East Tennessee. Meridian, Mississippi, July 20, 1864.—General Orders, No. 96.—The Lieutenant-General expresses his thanks to the officers and soldiers engaged in the recent active operations in North Mississippi for their gallantry, endurance, and cheerfulness. All did their duty, and are entitled to praise. The result is, that a well-equipped army of 16,000 veteran troops, under the command of a general of experience, carefully organised to overwhelm the gallant Forrest, and desolate the State of Mississippi, has been discomfited and compelled to retreat before your impetuous attack, well knowing the futility of advance in the face of so gallant and determined a foe. Though all performed their duty well, the General, nevertheless, thinks special praise should be given to the Kentucky Brigade, and Bell's Tennessee Brigade, of Buford's Division; Rucker's Tennessee Brigade, of Chalmer's Division; Maury's Mississippi Brigade; and the artillery under Captain Mouton. To the desperate gallantry of these troops on the 14th, and their tenacity under a galling fire, is to be attributed the discomfiture of the enemy more than to any other cause. Many of your companions have sunk to honourable graves, sacrifices to our sacred cause. Peace be with them! To you, their former companions, they have left the legacy of their brave deeds, which must ever command your admiration and that of the army, and the gratitude of the country. Let us endeavour to emulate their valour. They have died the death of the soldier, the most honourable that falls to the lot of man.—S. D. LEE, Lieutenant-General.—P. ELLIS, Jr., A. A. G.

ONE VOLUNTEER.—The first and only volunteer recruited in Springfield, Massachusetts, to count upon the quota under the new call, appeared lately, in a stalwart Englishman, over six feet tall, and a man whom the examining surgeon declared perfectly free from blemish. He has been for several years in the British service.—New York Paper.

THE FINANCIAL CONDITION OF THE UNITED STATES.

THE following report, presenting a general view of the finances of the United States of America, as well as of the growth of the public debt, and the increased expenditure entailed by the war, has been made by Mr. Stuart, Her Majesty's Secretary of Legation, and is dated February 22, 1864. Mr. Stuart has drawn his statistics from the reports presented to Congress by Mr. Chase for 1861, 1862, and 1863, as well as the report for 1860 of Mr. Chase's predecessor, Mr. Cobb:—

The financial year in the United States begins on July 1, and ends on June 30, and it receives its numerical designation for the year in which it ends—the year 1864, for example, signifying the year ending on June 30, 1864. In converting American into English money, I have taken the usual par of exchange, namely, $4·87 to each l. sterling, and, to the best of my belief, the only inaccuracies will be found in the units of pounds sterling, owing to my not having converted the fractions of dollars or odd cents into shillings.

The following will show the amount of the public debt and of the interest paid thereupon at the end of each of the last four financial years:—In 1860, the public debt was 13,299,733*l.*, bearing an interest of 650,372*l.*; in 1861, debt 18,658,691*l.*, interest 821,390*l.*; in 1862, debt 105,587,509*l.*, interest 2,708,485*l.*; and in 1863, debt 225,624,383*l.*, interest 5,077,997*l.* The same statistics for the current year and for 1865, according to Mr. Chase's estimates for those years, will give the following results:—For 1864, public debt 346,397,667*l.*, interest payable 12,148,898*l.*; for 1865, debt 458,302,913*l.*, interest 17,533,403*l.*

The following shows the receipts from all sources, including loans, and the expenditure during each of the years, those for 1864 and 1865 being, of course, only estimated as the probable amounts by Mr. Secretary Chase:—In 1860 the receipts were 16,651,192*l.*, and the expenditure 15,905,975*l.*; in 1861, receipts 17,830,780*l.*, expenditure 17,367,317*l.*; in 1862, receipts 119,894,301*l.*, expenditure 117,215,954*l.*; in 1863, receipts 185,036,072*l.*, expenditure 183,941,813*l.*; for 1864 the estimated receipts are 155,147,536*l.*, the estimated expenditure 153,949,067*l.*; and for 1865, estimated receipts 42,471,568*l.*, estimated expenditure 154,376,814*l.* With regard to the returns for 1863, Mr. Chase explains that 37,183,087*l.*, included in both receipts and expenditure, were borrowed for the payment of the existing funded and temporary debt, and were spent accordingly. The estimated receipts for 1865 do not include those which will be acquired from loans. The next tables will show the different sources of the revenue, and the several purposes to which it has been applied, during each of the same years:—

These estimates are based on the actual receipts and disbursements for the first quarter, and on opinions formed upon probable events and conditions as to the other quarters. But as they include all unexpended balances of appropriations from former years, Mr. Chase is of opinion that there may safely be deducted from the aggregate of estimated expenditures, as likely to remain unexpended at the close of the fiscal year 1864, the sum of 71,868,583*l.*, leaving—total means, 155,147,533*l.*; total expenditure, 153,949,065*l.*

It should also be mentioned that the amount received from loans and transferred to the redemption of the public debt is not included in these figures, as was the case in the figures for 1863.

But from these expenditures Mr. Chase calculates that there may be deducted, as likely to remain unexpended at the close of the fiscal year 1865, the sum of 82,135,523*l.*, which would leave:—Total means, 42,471,567*l.*; total expenditure, 154,376,812*l.*, or a deficit of 111,905,245*l.*, to be provided for by loans in the course of that year. The average annual expenditure at the present rate may be set down in round numbers at about 150,000,000*l.*; and of this sum about 133,000,000*l.* may be considered the annual cost of the war.

It will now be interesting to show the extent to which Congress has provided the means required for the prosecution of the war, and how far the Secretary of the Treasury has availed himself of the extraordinary powers which have been intrusted to him. The calculation has been made easy by a table which Mr. Chase has annexed to his last report, giving a synopsis of the various Acts of Congress by which loans have been authorised, and showing the amounts authorised as well as those respectively issued in virtue of such Acts. Taking these collectively since the commencement of the war, it appears that during the period between July 1861, and March 1863, Congress authorised loans to the amount of 268,993,839*l.*, exclusive of an unspecified amount of certificates of indebtedness, payable in one year from date, and bearing interest at the rate of 6 per cent. No less than 104,722,792*l.* of the above might be issued in United States legal tender notes bearing no interest, or in fractional currency; and the amount of such notes actually outstanding on June 30, 1863, appears to have been 84,433,278*l.*, and on September 30, 1863, 86,760,837*l.* Of the interest-bearing debt raised during the same period by Mr. Chase, and outstanding on June 30, 1863, were 122,532,912*l.*, and on September 30, 1863, 145,595,635*l.* These sums include respectively 32,193,889*l.*, and 32,221,445*l.* issued in certificates of indebtedness. The total amount of debt, therefore, actually raised from loans during the two years ending on June 30, 1863, and outstanding at that date, was 206,966,190*l.*, and the addition made to it up to September 30, 1863, raised it at the latter date to 232,356,472*l.*, and the entire outstanding debt at the same date to 250,947,342*l.*

It has been seen that Mr. Secretary Chase estimates that on June 30 next the total debt will amount to 346,397,667*l.*, an increase of 135,055,236*l.* during the current year; and that on June 30, 1865, it will amount to 458,302,913*l.*, a further increase of 111,905,246*l.* The total amount added to the public debt during the four years ending on June 30, 1865, will be no less than 439,644,222*l.*, according to Mr. Chase's present calculation. Mr. Chase does not appear to anticipate much difficulty in raising loans to the required amount for the services of the present and of next year. But as he admits that the issue of United States notes and fractional currency cannot be further materially augmented without evil consequences of the most serious character, almost the whole of the necessary loans must henceforth belong to the interest-bearing portion of the debt. And as Mr. Chase estimates the interest payable in 1865 at 17,533,403*l.*, upon the debt which would be only gradually approaching, and which would not reach its maximum until the end of that fiscal year, the future annual charge for interest upon the debt then contracted will perhaps scarcely fall far short of 20,000,000*l.* So far the measures adopted for raising the required loan have been certainly ingenious, and on the whole successful, if immediate wants and convenience are to be considered without reference to future liabilities. Nearly one-half of the loans already contracted may be said to have been raised by the issue of paper money, the extraordinary influx of which has to a great extent enabled the public to take the other half as preferable, from its bearing interest, to the retention of non-interest-bearing notes. The exchange of these notes for bonds is therefore very popular; and as the notes thus return into the hands of the Government, and thence again into circulation, their exchange may be several times repeated, although probably each time in a smaller proportion, or realising less from increasing depreciation. After various fluctuations, caused sometimes by extravagant speculations and their consequent panics, and at other times by the news of victories or disasters from the seat of war, the depreciation has latterly averaged about 50 per cent. as compared with the value of gold. (By the latest accounts the depreciation amounted to within a fraction of 60 per cent.*) In the meantime, and notwithstanding that such a depreciation represents a corresponding increase in the amount of duties charged upon imports, these duties being exclusively payable in specie, the increase of imports has latterly required a continuous export of specie, and the abundance of the harvests of last year in Europe renders it unlikely that the balance of trade can for some time to come be in favour of the United States. Specie must therefore become more and more scarce, and the United States Government will find increasing difficulty in continuing to pay the interest required for the debt in specie, as stipulated. The most popular loans have been those known as 'Seven-thirties' and 'Five-twenties;' the former so called from the rate of interest being at $7 30c. per cent., and the latter from being redeemable at any time after five or within twenty years from date. The interest upon these latter bonds is at the rate of 6 per cent., payable in specie (and therefore equal to above 9 per cent.† in the present depreciated currency); and so rapid has been their distribution, that although on June 30, 1863, only 34,677,669*l.* were outstanding, the secretary states that on December 1 81,917,947*l.* had been taken, or within 20,751,457*l.*, the total issue authorised by Congress. It is now stated that the whole amount has since been taken. The distribution was made as general and as widely extended as possible, by the employment of a general agent and subagencies in different parts of the country; and the bonds were in denominations of $50, $100, $500, and $1,000. Another measure employed was the receipt of temporary loans in the form of deposits, reimbursable after a few days' notice at an interest not exceeding 5 per cent. A reserve of 10,266,940*l.*, in United States notes was provided to meet extraordinary demands for reimbursement, and at a time of great stringency at New York the secretary was enabled to relieve the pressure by reimbursing more than that amount of deposits within a few weeks. The limit to these deposits had been fixed at double the amount of the reserved fund, but it had been somewhat exceeded at one time, before the flow could be effectually checked, and Mr. Chase is now of opinion that it may be usefully removed, provided that a reserve is always maintained equal in amount to half of the deposits. The principal measure suggested for raising further loans is that the secretary should be permitted in negotiating them to make them redeemable absolutely at pleasure, or at pleasure after a time fixed not more remote than 40 years.

It remains to notice the small proportion, as compared with the expenditure or with the sums raised from loans, of the revenue of the country derived from taxation or from sources other than loans. The actual revenue so derived, including the proceeds of customs duties, the sale of lands, internal duties, &c., amounted to only 10,664,418*l.* during the fiscal year 1862, or to about an eleventh part of the total expenditure, and during 1863 to 22,874,693*l.*, or to about one-eighth of the expenditure. The estimates for 1864 and 1865 respectively count upon receiving 32,082,022*l.*, or about one-fifth of the expenditure for the former, and 41,273,099*l.*, or somewhat less than one-fourth of the expenditure for the latter year, from ordinary revenue; but hitherto the actual receipts from taxation have fallen very far short of the estimates. For instance, in 1863, the internal revenue and the income tax together only produced 8,034,063*l.*, instead of the sum of 19,933,680*l.* expected by Mr. Chase. The estimates for 1865, both as to revenue and expenditure, are acknowledged to be necessarily general and uncertain. The amount which the Secretary originally desired to raise annually from the internal revenue during the war was 30,810,823*l.*, and he still presses for the enactment of laws which will secure an increase to that amount; and with this object he supports the recommendations of the Commissioner of Internal Revenue for increasing the tax on bank-note circulation, the duties on distilled spirits, on tobacco, on crude petroleum, and on cotton, and for repealing the drawbacks on tobacco and petroleum. These proposals, and others originated by individual members of Congress, are being taken into consideration during the present session.

* By the accounts received per Africa from New York, August 18, the depreciation is reported to amount to 157½ per cent.

† Now equal to nearly 15¼ per cent.

RELIGION IN THE CONFEDERATE ARMY.

At the annual meeting of the Baptist General Association of Virginia, lately held in Richmond, the following report was read by the Rev. A. E. Dickinson, the General Superintendent of army colportage:—

'The year through which we have just passed has been replete with tokens of the Divine approval of our work. Many have become obedient in the faith, and are now looking forward to a blessed immortality, who, at your last annual meeting, were far from God by wicked works. It may be questioned whether the world has ever before witnessed a more genuine and thorough work of grace. From the reports which have thus far been received, we feel authorised to state that not less than fifteen hundred soldiers have been baptised by the brethren in the employ of this Board. Of course, many more converted through their instrumentality have united with other denominations. Surely the Baptists of Virginia may well thank God and take courage, as they review the history of this great movement, originating, as it did, at our annual meeting three years ago, and spreading far and wide, until now in almost every encampment and in every hospital are to be found those over whom "there is joy in the presence of the angels of God."

'We have thus far published over one hundred tracts, many of which have been so well received that they have been republished by other societies. Over nineteen millions of pages have been printed during the past year, while during the war we have published and distributed fifty millions and eight hundred and seventy thousand pages. Besides, we have published one hundred thousand copies of a little volume of "Hymns for the Camps." This selection is now very generally used by chaplains of all denominations throughout the army.

'We have been favoured with the cooperation of some of our most efficient pastors, who have laboured with remarkable success in protracted meetings and in supplying destitute regiments with the Word of Life. Very many of those who have learned to love the Saviour will, through eternity, hold in grateful remembrance the sermons and exhortations of these evangelists.

'In order to secure to the chaplaincy some of our most gifted ministers, whose pecuniary condition was such that the Government pay was not sufficient for their support, we have, in certain cases, supplemented the salaries of chaplains. Thus a number of excellent ministers have been induced to enter the field of usefulness, who, but for this arrangement, would have been denied the luxury of publishing the tidings of salvation to our gallant soldiers.

'At various points, contiguous to the several departments of our forces, we have kept up depositories, by means of which a vast amount of religious literature has been judiciously distributed.

'At Orange Court House, an establishment of this character, under the superintendence of Rev. C. F. Fry, has effected great good. Almost every hour, while the army was in Orange, a dozen or more soldiers would call at this little tract house to select for themselves and for their comrades suitable reading matter. In addition to this, by looking after all the boxes and packages sent from various parts of the country to the chaplains and missionaries, brother Fry has forwarded to their destination thousands of papers and pamphlets which otherwise would have been lost to the army. A Methodist chaplain indicates the appreciation in which this Tract Depository is held by the remark, that "it had grown to be an institution without which the chaplains could not get along in their work."

'In Atlanta we have a similar establishment, superintended by Rev. H. C. Hornady, by means of which many millions of life-giving pages have been sent into the Western army. During the past year we have had in our employ ninety missionaries. It has pleased the Lord of the harvest to give them many souls for their hire. But much remains to be done. Thousands of those who are defending our homes and altars rarely ever hear a sermon. Scores of regiments are without chaplains. The revival spirit so abounds in the army that souls are saved by almost every exhibition of the gospel. Veterans who have a hundred times stood firm in the mighty shock of battle, and who are sacrificing everything for their country, are trembling because of the wrath of God, and, with streaming eyes, they beg that the ministers of the Lord Jesus may come to their rescue. Shall that appeal be made in vain?'

VASTNESS OF TERRITORY A BAR TO CONQUEST.—Modern history furnishes no parallel in illustration of the work of conquering a great region like the South. The Russian campaign of Napoleon does not constitute any analogy in reference to the immensity of the Confederacy; but even that, all the world knows, resulted in disaster referable simply to distances. Under the light then of the only similar case on record, and that greatly inferior in all the geographical conditions of defeat, advance into a territory so extensive cannot be regarded as conquest. Has advance into the South proved practically to have promoted the work of subjugation? How often have we pressed forward into the Valley of Virginia to abandon it again, even to the line of the Baltimore and Ohio Railroad? How often have we gone forward in immense breadth from the Potomac, sweeping onward to Gordonsville, and yet is not our dominion in all Eastern Virginia confined, after all, to the circle of certain earthworks on the Lower James? Has advance from Vicksburg been conquest? What permanent result has been accomplished toward subjugation by advances from Memphis? The forward movements beyond the Mississippi have left the work of conquest in Louisiana undone beyond a narrow circle of posts around New Orleans! Our marches onward through Arkansas, sweeping everything before them, have resulted in placing the Confederate, to-day, absolute masters of the State. The lines that swept into Florida have accomplished nothing towards its conquest. Hunter's movements in South Carolina have left that State still free. Burnside's campaign in North Carolina has done very little in permanent result toward the accomplishment of the tremendous work of Southern subjugation.—New York Paper.

THE SEIZURE OF THE 'GEORGIA.'

(From the Liverpool Daily Courier.)

THE most erroneous statements have been circulated with regard to the seizure of the Georgia by the Niagara. These errors have been promulgated by Federal agents and sympathisers, evidently for the purpose of allaying the excitement which the outrage has occasioned, and, if possible, to prejudice in the public mind the position of her owner, Mr. Edward Bates. The perfect good faith and candour with which Mr. Bates has acted in reference to the Georgia is the best answer to these misstatements. The more fully the facts become known the more unwarrantable will appear the seizure of the vessel; and it is, no doubt, the knowledge of this circumstance that has prompted the circulation of the errors in question. It has been asserted in some quarters that the seizure was made with the cognisance and sanction of the British Government. This is simply untrue. The commander of the Niagara has acted solely on his own responsibility, and in accordance with the orders of his Government. It has also been alleged that Mr. Bates was not a bonâ fide purchaser, and that the vessel was still intended for the Confederate service. These statements, cum multis aliis, are likewise mere fiction.

But it is needless to go through all the specious misrepresentations. They will be best refuted by a simple ungarnished explanation of the facts. Mr. Bates has nothing to conceal as to his connection with the Georgia, because all his dealings with her have been characterised by the same rectitude and frankness which have raised him to the first rank among Liverpool shipowners. He is well known to have scrupulously avoided any partisanship in the American war, and has never had the slightest interest in the blockade business. To suggest that he intended to use the Georgia for the benefit of the Confederates is contrary both to fact and experience. When seized she was on a peaceful mission, fitted out as an ordinary merchantman. She bore the English flag and was registered at an English custom-house, and was therefore entitled to all the privileges of a neutral trader.

The history of the Georgia since she came into the Mersey may be told with the utmost candour, and is briefly this:—As she had ceased to be useful as a man-of-war, she was offered for sale by the Confederate Government, who had previously dismantled her and removed all warlike weapons and stores. Having entered into negotiations for her purchase, Mr. Bates communicated with the custom-house authorities as to the manner in which they would regard the vessel. Mr. Price Edwards, the collector, acting on instructions received from London, informed Mr. Bates that he would be able to obtain a register for the ship when he applied for it. Upon this assurance—and Mr. Bates would have had nothing to do with the vessel unless he was assured that she would be registered as a British ship—the purchase was completed on June 2nd last; the necessary formalities were gone through to the satisfaction of the collector of customs, and the Georgia was accordingly registered on June 30 as a British ship, in the name of Mr. Bates.

The new owner had therefore taken all proper precautions to see that his title was indisputable, and careful scrutiny left no ground to suppose that the slightest difficulty would occur. Negotiations were then entered into between Mr. Bates and the representatives in England of the Portuguese Government, who were desirous of engaging a steamer to proceed to Lisbon, and thence to the Portuguese settlements on the West Coast of Africa. These negotiations resulted in the engagement of the Georgia upon terms which are explained in the charter-party. We have seen the original charter-party, dated July 28, and may thus summarise its chief clauses:—

The agreement is between Edward Bates, owner of the good screw steamship called the Georgia, of 648 tons gross register and 200 horse-power; and Mr. F. J. Van Zeller, on behalf of the Portuguese Government. It provides that the said vessel or steamer, being tight, staunch, and strong, and in every way fitted for the voyage or service, with the full complement of officers, seamen, engineers, and firemen, adapted to a merchant steamer of her class and tonnage, shall be placed under the directions of the said charterer, or merchant, or his assigns, to be by him or them employed for the conveyance of lawful merchandise, except sugar, molasses, or any article injurious to an iron ship—of course twenty tons each of sugar and molasses or any quantity of copper the ship can carry is not objected to—as follows:—From Liverpool to Lisbon, and from thence to Cape de Verds, principe S. Thomé, Vanguella, Loando, Massamada, Ambriz, and return to Lisbon, calling at the above ports on the return to Lisbon. There are the usual stipulations as to hire and management, and the agreement proceeds:—'The vessel to be consigned to the Companhia Luzitana at Lisbon, and to their agents at all the ports of call, free of commission or charges of whatsoever kind, owners taking down bulk-heads in after-cabin, except last; making saloon an open one; berths 'tween decks aft to be taken down by owners, and the charterers allowed the use of material forming same to put up berths for twenty second-class passengers; after-cabins to be properly painted a light colour; vessel to be ready for delivery to charterers on or before August 1 next, or sooner if ready: the coal bunkers in the hold available for cargo if required.' The charter-party also sets forth that it is 'distinctly understood and agreed between the parties that the owner does not provide any servants, stewards, or any other party to wait upon the passengers or any one connected with the charterers,' and that the 'owner only provides provisions and water for his own crew; passengers or their servants or followers are to be found in everything eatable or drinkable, or in any other way (save as specified to the contrary), by the charterers.'

This document on the face of it indicates an ordinary mercantile transaction, and is the strongest refutation of the allegation that Mr. Bates was engaged in any doubtful enterprise, in which the Portuguese Government was made a decoy-duck. In fulfilment of the charter-party the vessel was got ready for sea, and took on board 434 tons of coal belonging to the Portuguese Government. This was the only cargo embarked, and Mr. Bates had nothing of his own on board except the usual ship stores and provisions for the crew. The Georgia's name was never changed, as there was not the least desire to conceal her original character, and she was registered as the British ship Georgia. She was placed under the command of Captain Widdycombe, and her crew were shipped for a commercial voyage in the usual course of business. It is said that Captain Widdycombe is an old blockade-runner. This is a gross misrepresentation. For the last sixteen years he has been in the uninterrupted employment of Mr. Bates, and exclusively engaged in trading between the Mersey and India and China.

The Georgia was ready to sail on the 5th, and the circumstances attending her detention are generally known. But the official correspondence between Mr. Bates and the Portuguese authorities throws considerable light on the manner in which the former regarded the threatening attitude of the Niagara on her visit to the Mersey. So convinced was he that the Federal frigate would not dare to seize a British merchantman that he characterised the report as 'old women's talk,' and professed his readiness to send the ship to sea notwithstanding the threats of the Federal cruiser. In accordance with this determination, Mr. Bates—who had full confidence in the power and will of Great Britain to support her authority over her own mercantile marine—did actually despatch the vessel as soon as he had the orders of the Portuguese Consul-General to that effect. The following communications speak for themselves, and may be relied upon as genuine, as we copy from the originals, which have been placed at our service without reserve:—

(Telegram.) Portugal, Aug. 8, 1864.
Edward Bates, Liverpool, to Consul-General, London.

I have just received orders to let Georgia sail on receiving your orders. Please send them at once.

Van Zeller, London, to Edward Bates, Liverpool.

Send steamer to sea at once.

Portuguese Consulate, 42 South John Street,
Liverpool, Aug. 8, 1864.

E. Bates, Esq., Liverpool.

Sir,—As I have to inform my Minister of the precise time of the departure of the steamer Georgia, I request you to inform me by writing of same as soon as she sails.—I remain, sir, yours respectfully,

ALVARO CARNEIRO GERALDES,
Acting Consul for Portugal.

The subsequent history of the Georgia is soon told. She sailed from Liverpool on the 8th inst., and proceeded on her voyage under the British flag; but off Lisbon, on the 15th inst., she was seized by the Niagara, which was cruising about for the purpose of intercepting her. The Georgia is now on her passage to Boston, Massachusetts, in charge of a prize crew. It is a novel thing for a British ship, with a bonâ fide British register on board, and admittedly engaged in legitimate commerce, to be forcibly taken possession of, and sent into a prize court, upon the shallow pretext that at some former period, and while under different ownership, she was engaged in hostilities against the Federal States. Neither Mr. Bates nor the Portuguese Government can submit to this audacious appropriation of their property. It rests with the British Government to set Mr. Bates right; his property has been seized in violation of all lawful authority, and as his injury will be immediately laid before the Foreign Office, the Government must take prompt measures not only to recover the ship herself, but also to obtain suitable compensation for the injury.

THE M'CLELLAN RESOLUTIONS.

THE following resolutions were adopted at the meeting held in New York on August 10:—

Whereas, The line of policy adopted by the chief magistrate of the nation is in opposition to the plain injunctions of the Constitution and his own inaugural declaration, and, under the specious plea of military necessity, he has commenced a system of direct encroachment upon the rights of the States and the people in making arbitrary arrests—in striking down the freedom of speech and the press, and abolishing the right of habeas corpus where rebellion does not exist—in a fanatical attempt to force an equality social and political between races naturally different—in disfranchisement—in holding the electoral vote of States subject to his personal ambition, in defiance of the authority of Congress—and has created a general distrust of his ability to carry the nation safely through the arduous conflict in which it is now engaged; And

Whereas, What is now wanting to settle this war, is the election of a President who will administer the Government in the spirit of its founders, and afford an opportunity for the people of the South to return to the Union with rights under the Constitution; Therefore Resolved, First. That the only hope for remedying existing evils is in a change in the Administration, and an abandonment of its policy.

Second. That the salvation of the country now depends on the determination of the people to elect the men of their choice, and it is incumbent upon and the paramount duty of members of party conventions to ignore all disputed questions of policy, and, in the selection of candidates, to regard the plainly-expressed wishes of the masses they are delegated to represent.

Third. That success in the election, in opposition to the powerful combinations of this administration, depends upon the popularity of the candidate with the army, and the final selection must, therefore, fall on one of the great soldiers who has distinguished himself in defence of the principles upon which the government was founded.

Resolved, That in Major-General George B. M'Clellan we recognise those sterling qualities which characterise the true patriot, soldier, statesman, and gentleman, and which will ensure an administration alike elevating to the nation and creditable to the civilisation of the age; and while we would not disparage the claims of his brother soldiers, we but reiterate the voice of the million which comes upon the wings of the wind from every part of the land, when we declare him the embodiment of the hopes, as he is the choice of the American people.

Resolved, That our sympathies are deeply enlisted for our brave soldiers in the field, and that we long for the return of the day when, by ballots instead of bullets, we can maintain the Constitution and the Union, and restore to our country the inestimable blessings of an honourable peace.

Resolved, That we earnestly recommend the friends of M'Clellan to hold immediate meetings in every city and county, and give expression to their views as to his nomination by the approaching convention, or by the people, and that they assemble in mass convention at Chicago on Saturday, 27th instant, at 12 o'clock, noon, to take such action as may best unite the conservative elements in the coming campaign.

TO OUR FRIENDS AND SUBSCRIBERS.

THE INDEX was established in May 1862, in the darkest hour of Confederate fortunes, by earnest friends of Southern Independence, with the distinctly expressed object of being the representative, in English journalism, of a gallant and struggling people appealing to the world not only for political, but still more for moral recognition. Since accepting this great trust, THE INDEX has unceasingly laboured, by the combined aid of English and of Southern writers, to enlarge and extend the common ground upon which two nations may cordially meet, which need only to understand each other in order to cherish the warmest mutual appreciation and lasting friendship. The chief and almost the sole difficulty has been, and is still, the callous indifference of the British Government on the one hand, and, on the other, the perplexity, to the European mind, of the unsolved and unprecedented problems involved in the management and education of four millions of the African race, intermingled with a population of the highest Caucasian type. This difficulty could be met only by a liberal fairness to every shade of honest opinion, by an inflexible adherence to truth under all circumstances, and by a bold avowal of convictions, even though ill received. THE INDEX does not claim to be neutral, but it claims to be independent in the highest sense of that word. It is because it must reflect and appeal to, at one and the same time, the public opinion of two countries as yet only imperfectly acquainted, that this somewhat unusual self-description is called for.

Thanks to arrangements now in successful operation, by which the Letters of regular Correspondents and Newspapers from all parts of the Confederate States are received within from twenty-five to thirty days from their date, THE INDEX is always enabled to present the very Latest Direct News from the South, as well as a faithful reflex of the tone and spirit of the Southern Press.

All communications intended for publication should invariably be addressed to 'the Editor of THE INDEX, 13 Bouverie Street, E.C.,' and unless authenticated by a responsible name, can receive no attention.

Advertisements should be sent and Money Orders made payable to J. B. HOPKINS, INDEX Office.

THE INDEX.

THURSDAY, SEPTEMBER 1, 1864.

The War News.

THE worst is known about Mobile, and it was contained in the brief telegraphic announcement from General MAURY. In all probability FARRAGUT'S success will end with his first day's triumph; and the siege of Mobile, if the war lasts long enough, will become as famous in history as that of Charleston. But it must be allowed that the Federal commander did his work skilfully and gallantly. The navy of the North has had few opportunities of earning laurels; but we venture to say that its exploits, few as they are, far surpass the achievements of the land forces; and it has happened to Admiral FARRAGUT, a Southerner by birth, to have been its leader on both the occasions on which its services have been most valuable to the Federal Government—the capture of New Orleans and the passage of the sea-defences of Mobile. The entry into Mobile harbour was effected on the 5th ult. Almost at daybreak the Federal line was formed, the monitors leading, and the wooden vessels following in pairs. Every means that could be employed to strengthen them against the fire from the forts was adopted, and the experience gained at New Orleans was not thrown away. When nearly abreast of Fort Morgan, on the right of the harbour, the leading ships of the squadron slackened speed, the rearmost closed up, and then a concentrated fire from the whole squadron was poured upon the garrison of the fort. Covered by this tremendous fire, the squadron steamed past to engage the small Confederate flotilla, which bravely bore up to the encounter. One monitor, the Tecumseh, struck upon a torpedo, was lifted bodily out of the water, and sank with her crew. The rest pushed on to the attack. It was eight o'clock when the Federals passed Fort Morgan, and the fight lasted two hours. At the close the Selma had been captured, the Morgan and the Gaines had been driven under the guns of Fort Morgan, and the Tennessee still held out. At length the whole strength of the Federal fleet was turned against her; one vessel after another struck her at full speed, or, muzzle to muzzle, poured in her broadside, and she lowered her colours, but not until her brave commander and more than half her crew were struck down. The Tennessee was a river steamer hastily converted into an ironclad; yet, almost unaided, she kept a Federal fleet of some fifteen vessels at bay for two hours. When the fight was over, the Hartford and Oneida were beached to prevent their sinking; the Chickasaw was riddled and disabled; the Philippe was burnt; and the Tecumseh had gone to the bottom with her crew. There is no more gallant struggle on record than that of this brave little Confederate force confronting the immense superiority of the enemy, and daring a manifestly unequal fight for the honour of its flag. It would have been well if the commanders of the land defences had shown equal spirit. The entry was nothing. With the guns of Fort Gaines and Fort Morgan playing upon them, the Federal vessels would have found it as hard to get out of Mobile harbour as to enter it. But on the 8th the astounding news was telegraphed to Richmond, that Fort Gaines, with its tried garrison of 600 men and provisions for six months, had surrendered, and that Fort Powell had been blown up. We say nothing of the latter mischance. The direct passage having been effected, it mattered little whether Grant's Pass was left open or not, and probably the commander of Fort Powell acted wisely in withdrawing his troops. But for Colonel ANDERSON there is no excuse. We put out of the question the allegation of treachery; but we cannot acquit him of a want of judgment or of a pusillanimity almost amounting to treason. At the worst he might have hoped to hold out a fortnight or a month. He had the example of Fort Morgan and of Sumter before him. But from the moment that he found himself isolated, the Federal fleet in his rear and the Federal land forces on Dauphin Island threatening an assault, he seems to have decided that it was useless to fight, and he capitulated—not with the honours of war. For the honour of the Confederate army, an enquiry into this disgraceful surrender is imperatively demanded. But FARRAGUT'S work is not ended with the capture of Fort Gaines and the destruction of the Confederate flotilla. Fort Morgan still held out at the latest date; it was strongly garrisoned and provisioned for six months; it had successfully resisted a combined land and sea attack. FARRAGUT will be lucky if he can reduce it with his two remaining monitors. And when Fort Morgan is reduced, FARRAGUT will be still thirty miles from Mobile. Ten miles from the city is the bar of the Dog River, over which no vessels drawing more than eight feet of water can pass. From this point to the city his light-draught vessels would have to encounter heavy batteries at every half-mile, to raise obstructions, and to avoid torpedoes. The probability is that FARRAGUT will remain content with the reduction of the outer forts, and that he has no more notion of capturing Mobile than DAHLGREN has of occupying Charleston. In both cases 50,000 men would be needed. At the present rate of expenditure, the Federal Government can hardly afford a tithe of that number.

FARRAGUT'S success at Mobile, unproductive of results as it is, is yet the only advantage the Federals have had to boast of for months. We cannot recall a war in which the tide has flowed so evenly on one side for so long a period. The latest news at all points is unfavourable to the Northern armies. GRANT'S spasmodic diversion on the northern bank of the James River has resulted in defeat and retreat. A flourish of trumpets from Mr. STANTON for a day or two deceived the Northern public, but in forty-eight hours it was known that GRANT had only added another bloody list of casualties to the record which has already stamped him as the 'butcher of Illinois.' And now another disastrous repulse has to be recounted. GRANT is fertile in surprises, but they invariably fail. He despatches two corps d'armée with colours flying twenty miles down the James River, brings them back at night, and launches them against the Confederate entrenchments. Of course, they are repulsed with heavy loss. Beaten on the north of the James River, he tries the Weldon Railroad, but instead of surprising the Confederates, his army is itself surprised, attacked, and routed with a loss of 3,000 men. Meantime EARLY'S corps operates as freely as if there were no such person as GRANT in existence. The last account from the Shenandoah Valley is, that SHERIDAN, who was to carry everything before him, has been badly beaten by EARLY, and compelled to cross the Potomac, with heavy loss in men and matériel, and that the Confederate General with 50,000 men is once more upon the frontier of Maryland. And the North is thoroughly bewildered. LEE is ubiquitous; he despatches 20,000 men to EARLY; another 20,000 to Hood at Atlanta; he beats the Federals at Deep Bottom; he routs them on the Weldon Railroad; he draws a year's supplies from the Shenandoah, from Maryland, and Pennsylvania, and yet GRANT or President LINCOLN still hopes to capture Richmond. In the meantime matters are becoming as desperate at Atlanta as they are at Petersburg. SHERMAN makes no progress, and HOOD is reported to be assuming the offensive. On three occasions, in as many weeks, he has been the assailant; on each he has achieved the main object of his attack. He has been heavily reinforced, the Georgia militia have disposed of SHERMAN'S cavalry, and it may safely be affirmed that his operations are not now directed so much to the retention of Atlanta as to the destruction of SHERMAN'S force. We hear of General WHEELER successively at Dalton and eleven miles from Chattanooga; another Confederate force is spoken of at Cleveland. More than one cavalry fight has taken place on SHERMAN'S line of communications, terminating doubtfully for the Federals; and we confidently expect that this invasion of Georgia, conducted as it has been in the face of all military rules, will terminate in disaster.

The Tide Turning.

OUR New York correspondent gives a graphic and we feel convinced a strictly truthful account of the despondency which has seized upon the popular heart at the North, of the comparatively feeble interest which attaches even to such successes as the naval victory off Mobile, and of the hourly growing and strengthening desire for peace. We have always prophesied that if once the tide turned, it would set as rapidly and resistlessly in the opposite as in the former direction. This prophecy we based upon our knowledge of the Northern character. With a people so impressible and excitable as that of Federal America, where everybody takes an eager active part in politics, public opinion does not develop slowly as in older and more sedate communities, but in its action rather resembles the ignition of a powder magazine. On the other hand, we knew, as every one must know who has studied the physiology, so to speak, of the American war, that the tide would never turn until some event occurred outside and independent of the war, until the popular mind received some such shock as physicians in certain diseases administer with a view of producing a violent reaction. The recognition of the Confederate States by the Powers of Europe would have been such an event; and it is for this, apart from considerations of justice, that we so strongly recommended that measure while there existed a reasonable prospect of it. Fortunately, the machinery of the American Government, adapted to a quadrennial revolution, has provided another, and in many respects a more promising, chance. The approaching Presidential election is precisely such an event as may serve for the signal of a salutary reaction.

Thus far the symptoms are, upon the whole, hopeful. Newspapers of all parties, including those who have the credit of quickest intuition and most unscrupulous subservience to shifting public opinion, vie with each other in taking up the cry for peace. Public and private correspondence from every part of the Federal States reecho it. What is even more significant is, that Mr. LINCOLN himself and his advisers are charged by their opponents with manœuvring to steal for party purposes the political capital to be made out of the new cry. That such a suspicion is even possible, proves that there must be, and is known to be, a vast amount of political capital in it, and political capital, in the United States, means the favour of popular majorities.

To this extent, we repeat, the symptoms are encouraging. But unless there is that public virtue in the United States which can deal with so great a question as with something nobler and higher than mere political capital applied to party tactics, the precious opportunity may again be lost. If Democrats and Republicans fight, not for peace, but for office, and the better impulses of the people's heart are prostituted to those base uses, then the reaction which should lead to health will only have weakened still more the prostrate body politic, and the chances of recovery will be farther than ever. There are, we grieve to say, some indications of this in the recent mass-meeting at New York to nominate General M'CLELLAN. The speeches made and the resolutions passed on that occasion have an ill-omened resemblance to the make-shifts of electioneering devices. There is not in them the clear ring of genuine patriotism and lofty purpose. The man himself, in whose favour the meeting was held, is not such a one as personifies a national policy, or from whose mental and moral attributes we should expect the salvation of a suffering country. If the North means to end this war with dignity and honour, there should be no Democrats or Republicans, no talk about future party ascendency, no counting of future votes in the Senate; there should be no parties other than that for peace opposed to that for war, no issue other than that comprised in those words.

There need be no loss of self-respect in yielding to necessity and fate. There may even be grandeur in doing so. The United States have been engaged in an undertaking in which no nation ever did succeed unassisted, and in which no nation could have succeeded. The Northern people themselves, had they known the conditions of success as they now are, would never have attempted it. What is more, even success could not now give what the war was undertaken for. If that success were attainable, a wise man and a patriot would prefer to have as friends, instead of subjects, a people with such a history as the last three years have given to the South. Yet the effort, unsuccessful and criminal as it was, has been made on so magnificent a scale that it retrieves failure from any possible humiliation. In doing, therefore, what Great Britain under similar circumstances was forced to do before, the United States have the consolation that they have gained military prestige in the eyes of the world instead of having lost it. Nor will the war have been altogether fruitless. It will have taught two people, who, under any circumstances, must live in close proximity, that mutual respect for each other's strength and power which they never could otherwise have had. It will, in fact, have rolled a score of petty wars, extending perhaps over several generations, into one, and thus secured the lasting peace of America, at least as between these two. True national dignity now commands to the United States an honourable peace: their true interests equally command it. The South has little to lose by continuance of the war: its worst trials and its greatest perils are over. It has so accustomed itself to a state of hostilities that that state has become its normal one, and it is no figure of speech that it could prolong the war for twenty years, each year with greater ease and at less cost and effort than the year preceding. Each year, also, the disproportion in numbers and resources between the combatants diminishes, for what is exhaustion to the North is self-development to the South. It is therefore not only consistent with national dignity, but imperatively demanded by the self-interest of the North, to make an honourable peace now. But to be honourable, this peace must rest on truth and good faith. They are deluded with paltry impostures, or in endeavouring to deceive others deceive themselves, who affect to believe that there can ever be any other peace between North and South than as between totally independent political sovereignties. If the North has not yet been taught sufficiently by experience to be willing for such a peace, then it had better postpone the thought of it till another Presidential election.

THE Georgia, formerly the Japan, was a merchantman converted into a cruiser. It was found that she was unfitted for belligerent purposes. In May last she came into the port of Liverpool, was dismantled, and offered for sale. Mr. BATES, a well-known Liverpool shipowner, offered to purchase her, but, before doing so, enquired of the Customs authorities whether they would grant a British register for the vessel. Upon receiving a satisfactory reply, Mr. BATES bought the Georgia, and, on June 30, she was registered as a British ship. Subsequently Mr. BATES entered into an agreement with the Portuguese Government, and the vessel was chartered to carry the Portuguese mails between Lisbon and the West Coast of Africa. At the end of July the Georgia was ready for sea, when Mr. BATES was informed by the Portuguese authorities in England that there was a report that the Federal cruiser Niagara intended to capture the vessel. Mr. BATES did not believe the report; and on August 5, pursuant to orders from the Portuguese Legation in London, the Georgia left the port of Liverpool for Lisbon, her only cargo being 434 tons of coal belonging to the Portuguese Government. When off Lisbon, on August 15, the Georgia, sailing under the British flag, having a British register, having all her papers in order, having left the British port with the knowledge and by the sanction of the British Customs, was seized by the United States ship Niagara and sent to Boston under charge of a prize crew.

Upon what grounds did the Niagara seize the Georgia? It will not be alleged that the sale to Mr. BATES was not bonâ fide. The charter-party with the Portuguese Government is evidence that the vessel was engaged in neutral and innocent business, and that there is no suspicion that the Georgia was intended either to make war on the Federal marine, or even to evade the Federal blockade. There are two reasons given to justify the seizure, and these we propose briefly to notice.

There is no rule in international law more clearly defined than that which declares that a ship engaged in an innocent voyage cannot be made responsible for any former delinquencies. A ship may be engaged in a contraband trade and violate a blockade twenty times, but if her twenty-first voyage is from a neutral port to a neutral port, the belligerent Power has no right to molest her. This principle has been repeatedly affirmed by American prize courts, and will not be called in question. Nor will it be disputed that in time of war, as well as in time of peace, ships may be transferred to a neutral flag, the only condition being that the transfer shall be bonâ fide—that is, that the ship shall pass absolutely into neutral ownership. But the Federals allege that this rule does not apply to the sale of ships of war in time of war, and they quote a decision of Lord STOWELL's as an authority. The case cited is that of the Minerva. This vessel was a ship of war belonging to the Dutch Government, and was chased by a British frigate into a neutral port. While in the neutral port the Minerva was sold to another neutral Power, came out under a neutral flag, and was captured by a British frigate. Lord STOWELL held that the vessel ought to be condemned; but it seems to us that the learned Judge, who insisted upon the right to transfer merchant ships under any circumstances, did not intend to limit the right of transfer to merchant vessels, but rather to deny the right of a vessel of war chased by a belligerent, and only escaping capture by taking refuge in a neutral port, making use of the asylum to evade the enemy. Now the Georgia was not chased or driven into the port of Liverpool, but she came there of her own free will. This, we think, is a very important distinction; and we do not suppose that a British prize court would deduce from Lord STOWELL's decision the principle that during a time of war a belligerent cannot transfer a ship of war to a neutral. Certainly the British Government has not so construed the law, or it would not have granted a register to the Georgia, or, to take another case, it would not have granted a register to the Gibraltar, lately the Sumter, a vessel which is at this time reported to have been chartered by the British Government.

The other reason assigned in justification of the seizure of the Georgia is that there is an Order in Council, published by the Customs authorities, forbidding such transfers. If we are rightly informed, this Order in Council was not published until after Mr. BATES had bought the Georgia, and it is evident that those who promulgated the order—the Customs authorities—did not think that it prevented the legal transfer of the ship, or they certainly would not have granted a British register; nor can we suppose that the United States Minister in London deemed the transfer a violation of that Order, for, if so, why did he not protest against the sale, which, so far from being concealed, was openly paraded? On other occasions Mr. ADAMS has been vigilant enough to protest, on suspicion almost unsupported by a show of evidence, against what he deemed an intention to violate the law of this country. We must not lightly assume that Mr. ADAMS lent himself to a disgraceful trick for the purpose of spiting a British shipowner, of insulting the British flag, of treating the British register with contempt, and of getting possession of a ship which had at one time been a source of terror and annoyance to the merchants of the United States. Mr. ADAMS did not doubt the validity of the sale, or he would have protested against it. But we need not enter into these details. Let us assume that the Order in Council forbids the sale of the Georgia, and that though the Customs gave Mr. BATES a British register, they did not thereby condone his offence. This Order in Council is a municipal law, and its violation is not a crime against any foreign Power, and does not give any foreign Power a right to exact reparation. It is for the British Government, and for the British Government only, to uphold and maintain its municipal laws. There is, for example, an Order in Council forbidding the sale of munitions of war to either belligerent, yet it is notorious that munitions of war are sold in immense quantities to the Federal Government, and are shipped from British to Federal ports. Does any one suppose that, under the authority of this Order in Council, a Confederate cruiser would be justified in seizing a British mail packet because part of her cargo consisted of a battery of guns belonging to the United States Government? It is not likely that the Federals will defend the seizure of the Georgia on the pretext that her sale was a violation of the municipal law of this country, but they will rest their case on the ground that the sale of a ship of war in time of war to a neutral is a breach of international law. Our impression is that Lord STOWELL's decision in the case of the Minerva does not support, and much less establish, such a doctrine.

Suppose, however, that the transfer of the Georgia was a breach of international law, it does not follow that the Federals have adopted the legal remedy. This, be it remembered, is not merely a question of a vessel sailing under the British flag, but it is the question of a vessel sailing with a British register. In the most formal manner possible the British Government has constituted the Georgia a British ship, and therefore, if any wrong has been done the United States, the remedy of the Government of the United States was not against the property of a British subject, but against the British Government. The proper course would have been, so it seems to us, for the United States Government to have demanded compensation from the British Government, and, if that had been refused, to have made reprisals. We know not how Mr. BATES may be advised, but we think that he ought not to appear as defendant before the United States prize court, but that he must look to his own Government for the restitution of his vessel or for compensation for her loss.

We confess that the seizure of the Georgia has surprised us. Assuredly it is the United States, and not the Confederate States, which have a vital interest in treating a neutral register as an instrument of unquestionable validity. Instead of regretting we should have cause, so far as the interests of the Confederates are concerned, to rejoice if the seizure of the Georgia is declared and accepted as a legal act. It would at once subject the transferred marine of the Federal States to the power of the Confederate cruisers. We lately published a list of vessels transferred from Federal to British owners, but which are heavily mortgaged to United States firms. No lawyer will deny that such transfers would be pronounced void by a British prize court. Why then have not the Confederates tried the question? Why have they submitted to these fraudulent transfers? The Confederate cruisers have been restrained by the consideration that these fraudulently transferred vessels have a British register, and have thought that instrument a sufficient protection. If the seizure of the Georgia is declared legal by the United States prize court, and is accepted as a legal act by the British Government, then the Confederate cruisers will have a precedent for seizing ships which they rightly or wrongly may deem not lawfully transferred despite their British register. They will have a right to judge and execute judgment regardless of the British register. Our opinion is that the seizure of the Georgia is an illegal act. We shall be glad, for the sake of the Confederates, to learn that we are wrong, and that the seizure of the Georgia is held to be legal by the United States prize court, and is accepted as a legal act by the British Government.

M'Clellan as a Candidate.

THE events of the American war have never been more exciting than they are at this moment. In Virginia, in Georgia, before Mobile, on the banks of the Mississippi, at the mouth of New York harbour, in the border States, throughout the vast theatre of the war, the strife is raging with unabated fury. Yet the spectators as well as the actors are weary of the drama, and long for the fall of the curtain. Indeed, there is a dreary sameness about the main events that is nearly intolerable. The 'Illinois Butcher' makes a new movement and sacrifices five or ten thousand men; the Federal Generals are bolting at the intimation of the northern advance of the Confederates; Federal soldiers are raiding, plundering, and committing atrocious cruelties; SHERMAN is sowing Yankee dead broadcast in Georgia; Charleston is being shelled as it has been for upwards of four hundred days; FARRAGUT is going to play 'The Siege of Charleston' at Mobile. And so the game goes on, with no other result than so many killed and wounded; and with the certainty that, though the war should last for twenty years, the North will not be able to conquer or subjugate the South. For a moment the battle of Petersburg, or a Confederate ram fighting a whole Federal fleet, engrosses attention, but only for a moment, and people turn to the signs of peace, and speculate upon the immediate termination of hostilities.

A fortnight ago we pointed out the indications of a speedy peace, and the latest advices from America, with one exception, tend to confirm our judgment. It is daily more apparent that the arms-bearing population of the North is too exhausted to carry on an aggressive war upon the scale of the last three years, and the call of Mr. LINCOLN for more troops is answered by increased briskness in the negro trade, and by the enhanced price of black food for powder. The most sanguine Northerner sees that the prolongation of the war involves national bankruptcy. The exploits of the Tallahassee show the Northern merchants that so long as the war goes on their ships can trade only at a risk that involves a positive loss. Peace meetings are held, but Mr. SEWARD's bells are silent, and so-called treason goes unpunished. The New York Daily News is no longer the solitary organ of peace. The Herald and the Tribune call for an immediate suspension of hostilities. What is then the cloud that somewhat darkens the fair prospect? It is not that the people will not accept peace on the only possible terms, but it is that their party leaders for party purposes are holding up a vision of a peace which will never be realised because based on impossible conditions.

In itself the great M'CLELLAN gathering in New York was a peace demonstration. The people met to protest against the unconstitutional acts of Mr. LINCOLN; but their chief charge against him was not that he had violated the law and trampled on the rights and liberties of American citizens, but they denounced him because, in spite of the enormous sacrifices of men and treasure, he has failed to conquer a peace. If Mr. LINCOLN had put an end to the war, he would have been supreme, and so notorious is this that it has been generally admitted that a single great triumph during the present campaign would have secured his reelection. On the other hand, General M'CLELLAN received the support of the meeting, not on account of anything that he has done to dazzle the populace, but from the repeated assurances of his supporters that if he is chosen President the war will be over.

It may be so, but it depends upon what platform he is elected; and if he is to carry out a war policy, so far as peace is concerned it matters not whether LINCOLN or whether M'CLELLAN is chosen for President.

The resolutions adopted at the M'CLELLAN meeting are as devoid of a policy as a royal speech can be. Mr. LINCOLN is denounced with sufficient bitterness, but a doctrine is introduced the most pernicious and fatal that can be offered to a free people. The third resolution declares that success in the election 'depends upon the popularity of the candidate with the army.' What is this but a declaration that the civil power exists no longer, and that the future President is to be a military dictator? The chief of a State, no matter by what name he is called, will rule by the army if to the army he owes his elevation. Probably, the promoters of the M'CLELLAN meeting inserted the third resolution without due consideration, but we can hardly frame such an excuse for the tone of the last resolution, in which all men are exhorted to agitate for the nomination of General M'CLELLAN 'by the approaching Convention or by the people'—which means, if it has any meaning at all, that should the Chicago Convention nominate some other candidate the friends of M'CLELLAN must still do what they can to secure his election. But these things only show the weakness, the vacillation, and let us add the cowardice, of the 'War' Democracy. They dare not go in for war—they are too timid to come out on a peace platform. It is possible, we might almost say probable, that this want of frankness will ruin the party and give the victory to the Black Republicans, who are few in number, but who are strong because they avow a policy and have to contend with a foe whose policy is a mere negation.

The supporters of General M'CLELLAN are seeking to persuade the people of the North that, if a constitutional President is chosen, the war will end by the restoration of the Union. Now it is incredible that these professions can be sincere. No man of ordinary intellect in America, who is at all acquainted with the political state of the country, can believe in the restoration of the Union. The Black Republicans indulge in no such dream. If it had been possible to restore the Union, we see no reason to doubt that New England would have spared no effort to accomplish it, for the New Englander is too keen-sighted not to perceive that it would be vastly better to govern flourishing States than conquered and desolated provinces. The policy of extermination was determined on because a reconstruction of the Union could not be brought about. Nor are the leaders of the Democratic party more sanguine than the Republican leaders, but they hope to obtain peace by a crooked and tortuous policy. Hitherto they have signally failed; but experience has not taught them wisdom. At the time of the election of Governor SEYMOUR, the war Democrats talked about peace and yet of fighting for the Union, and the party was completely broken up. It was urged on their behalf that they really wanted peace on the only terms peace could be had, but that their safety and their success necessitated a policy of deception, and that they should pretend to favour the restoration of the Union, if not by constitutional means, then by force of arms. The device was seen through, and the Democratic party lost its hold on the affections of the people. Again it has a chance of saving the country, and, so far as we can see, there is cause for anticipating that the same timid policy will be pursued, and if so, the triumph of the Republican party is a foregone conclusion. Just now there is an impression in the North that the task of conquering the South is hopeless, and that nothing remains except to negotiate a peace. At this imminent crisis the M'CLELLAN party comes forward and declares that the despair is uncalled for, and that what is wanted is not a change of purpose, but a change of men.

We do not say that the South is unwilling to accept an armistice and to negotiate terms of peace; but we do say that it is inconceivable that any sane man should believe for one instant that peace can be made on any other terms than those of separation. Independence has on the part of the South been the sole object of the war. For independence she has made efforts and sacrifices almost beyond credence or conception. What is there in her present position to induce the belief that she is about to acknowledge herself defeated and to submit to the Northern yoke?

But, this condition being fulfilled, we do not deny that there is much plausibility in the suggestion that a compact may be entered into that will secure to the North most of the substantial advantages of Union, and it is certain that, with or without such a treaty, immediate peace will secure to the North very excellent terms. It is very curious to observe that, although differing on almost every other point, the Northern and Southern presses are agreed as to the general principles of foreign policy. It was supposed that secession would have made the South the ally of Europe, but, strangely enough, European Powers have managed so to offend both sections, that, if peace is made now, neither North nor South will be pledged to any European Power. England and France are more than ever unpopular in the North, and Canada and Mexico are looked upon as countries to be one day subjugated by Northern armies. Well, has the South any particular cause to feel grateful to England or France? At all events, such is not the sentiment of the Southern people. Therefore, if peace is made now, the North may reasonably boast that the Monroe doctrine is not endangered by the formation of another Confederacy, and that because the South has left the Union she has not become the ally of Europe. But, as we said a fortnight since, peace cannot be made, however desirable and however desired, until the North recognises the fact of Confederate independence. There is an opportunity for putting an end to the strife under more propitious circumstances than could have been anticipated, but the golden opportunity will be lost if the Northern people are led to believe that the Union can be restored.

The Democratic party is now on its trial, for the second time, to prove whether or no it possesses the statesmanship, the moral courage, and the public virtue to save the country. The first time it failed ignominiously; there is, unfortunately, too much reason to fear that it will repeat its follies and its failure. Certainly it will be an ominous sign if the party which professes to denounce Mr. LINCOLN'S usurpation selects as the exponent of its principles the man who was Mr. LINCOLN'S chief and willing instrument for trampling out the constitutional existence of Maryland.

PEACE IN AMERICA.

THE following document is being extensively circulated:—

The People of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland, to the People of the United States, Greeting:—

We are of the same race, and many of you are our brothers. Can we not, therefore, come to you as peace-makers, and address you as friends? We would ask you, Has there not been of strife and bloodshed, and misery and suffering, enough? and is it not time to cease the cruel war in which you are engaged? We believe there is not a Christian man or woman amongst us whose heart does not respond affirmatively to this question. With this conviction we wish to speak to you as plain men, using plain language. We have admired your free institutions, and have gladly witnessed your rise as a people to eminence in wealth and political power. You are of the Saxon blood, and we hoped that you would make the New World renowned for true greatness. You promised to become one mighty people and a great nation, famed for the liberties of its citizens, the triumphs of peace, and the conquests of its commerce. We felt that you were doing honour to the 'Mother Country.' When, therefore, this unfortunate war began, our hearts were more inclined towards you than towards your sister States, because we believed with you that the action of the South was but the work of a faction. The events of the struggle, however, have convinced us that a more united people than those of the Southern States never rose up in defence of their rights.

When you asserted that Secession was the work of disappointed ambition, and promised to quell it within sixty days, we accepted your assurances in good faith, and looked for the speedy restoration of peace. We did not wish to see the American Union broken up. But so far from this promise being fulfilled (and your efforts to accomplish it have been great), peace and the restoration of the Union are apparently more remote than ever. Surely there must be many now among you who share with us the conviction, that it is utterly impossible to subdue the South, or to restore the American Union as it was in the past days of the Republic. You have tried sufficiently, and found the gulf between you and the seceded States to widen with the effort that is made to subdue them. Is it not time then to pause, and after calmly reviewing all that you have accomplished, the distance which you have travelled from your well-known landmarks, and the difficulties and dangers that are yet before you—is it not time, we ask, that you should take counsel together as to the best means of restoring peace? We cannot forget that the question of peace or war was never submitted to you for your serious consideration before hostilities had actually commenced;—that they came upon you little by little;—and that both Government and people found themselves plunged into this fearful contest almost unawares; nor have you as yet had an opportunity of consulting together in general Convention, for the purpose of making known your opinions and wishes about the war or any of the vast issues growing out of it.

The war has changed (for the present, at least) the character of your Government. What has become of the freedom of speech, your free press, and the inestimable right of habeas corpus? What, permit us to ask, are the Southern people doing beyond following the precepts and example taught and practised by your fathers and theirs, when they withdrew their allegiance from the mother-country, and asserted their right to establish a Government of their own? The Declaration of Independence, which you hallow and celebrate every fourth day of July, asserts, as self-evident, the right of the Southern people to set up a Government of their own.

But we would ask, suppose you should, at the end of another three years and a half, succeed in subduing the South and restoring the Union by force of arms, might you not then find out, when it was too late, that those pillars upon which rests your form of government had been violently torn down, and that your own liberties had been buried in the ruins? If you will run the parallel between the South now and the colonies in 1776, and compare the course pursued by the North now and the mother-country then, we think you will discover some striking resemblances; and among them, that with you now, as with the crown then, rests the privilege of giving peace to the American continent. Why not then, without further delay, recognise the duty which attaches to your high privilege? We appeal to you in the name of religion, humanity, justice, and civilisation, and believe that we shall not appeal in vain.

Peace be unto you.

FROM A CONFEDERATE CORRESPONDENT.

PARIS: August 30.

IN my last letter to you I expressed the opinion that the sympathies with which the clerical party have thought fit to honour us would tend greatly, in the eyes of the Liberal classes, to the injury of the Southern cause. The following fact will, I think, support this opinion.

The Union is here the organ of the clerical party; it is a well-edited journal, and its political influence is considerable. During thirty years past, under the various names of Quotidienne, France, Echo Français, and Univers, it has been the organ and the representative, in the French press, of the doctrines of the party which it serves. Unfortunately these doctrines are no longer favourably received; they proscribe liberty, and teach that the Government of Rome is the true type of really legitimate Governments. These ideas, the remnants of a past which the French and American revolutions have destroyed, are no longer adapted to our times, they are in direct contradiction to those professed by us in America, and are altogether repugnant to the liberal classes;—well-informed Conservatives themselves reject them.

Now this journal, the Union, in a series of articles on the subject of monarchy in Mexico, has recently expressed certain opinions which, although not unfavourable towards the South, are nevertheless radically false, and calculated to estrange all liberal minds from our cause. The writer of these articles imagines that an obstinate contest is being carried on in America between the monarchical and republican principles, between the policy of Christopher Columbus, 'who discovered a world for the faith,' and that of Monroe, 'whose desire is that America should be for the Americans.' The defenders of the republican principle are the Northerners—the Yankees; those of the monarchical principle are the Spanish Americans and the Southern Confederates, whose Congress 'declared, a few days since, that as soon as the war shall terminate, provided public opinion should show itself in favour of monarchy, it would see no hindrance to its establishment.'

After this strange exposition of facts the Union exclaims, 'From whence proceed these monarchical aspirations in the South and these Yankee Republican ambitions in the North?' They are the result, according to the Union, of America being peopled by two races, one devoted to Catholicism, the other to Protestantism. It is necessary, therefore, that Europe should choose between Catholicism and monarchy on the one part, and Protestantism and a levelling policy on the other. There are no medium conditions; choice must be made between the policy of Christopher Columbus and that of Monroe.

You may easily judge of the effect produced by such articles as these. I do not think I shall be far from the truth in saying that the Southern cause is greatly injured by them. A friend of mine, a journalist of Democratic principles, who played a political part in 1848, but who is nevertheless warmly attached to the interests of the South, said to me some time since: 'Have nothing to do with the clerical party, their sympathies are dangerous to you; if it were to become known that you had connected yourselves with those people, so far as public opinion goes you would be completely lost.' Without attaching implicit faith to these exaggerated remarks, I certainly think we should have everything to gain if the Liberals could be convinced that there is no desire for monarchy in the South, even if in this we should lose the support of the clerical party.

The Finance, a journal published at Brussels, and one of the most important of those French periodicals whose pages are devoted to the consideration of financial questions, devotes a long article in its last number to the subject of the Federal finances. According to this journal, the German bankers have been the largest subscribers to the loan of $200,000,000 opened by Mr. Fessenden. It also appears that a great mistake has been made in estimating the amount of the American funds invested in Holland and Germany at only thirty or forty millions sterling; according to the Finance, the amount of the investments is nearer 100,000,000 than 30,000,000 sterling.

'The Cabinets of Berlin and Vienna,' says this journal, 'did not anticipate this, and it has painfully surprised them. Not to speak of the very probable bankruptcy awaiting the United States Government, and the disturbance which will be caused in Germany by the cessation of the payment of interest representing such considerable sums, Prussian and Austrian statesmen see clearly that these investments are so many resources taken from their future and approaching loans.'

According to the Patrie and the Pays, the capture of the Georgia by the Niagara has touched on a point in law which cannot fail to produce diplomatic difficulties. The Patrie is of opinion that the somewhat hasty proceedings on the part of the Federal vessel are not sanctioned by the Law of Nations. The Pays goes still further, and remarks that English jurisprudence furnishes a precedent which condemns the capture of the Georgia as illegal. The precedent here referred to is that of the Serpa, a Brazilian ship sold in good faith by her owners, afterwards captured by the English navy, and finally given up by the British Government on her being claimed by Brazil.

The French journals have published the text of the address from the English people to those of the United States, and have expressed it as their wish that this ardent appeal for conciliation and peace should meet with a favourable consideration.

The principal editor of La France, M. Cohen, has written, on this occasion, one of the best articles hitherto published relative to the American question. The following are some of its leading passages:—

Can it be that light has not yet dawned on this great nation of America—a nation whose sound judgment and practical intelligence have been to us a source of admiration? Can it be that the last four years of contentions, of disasters, of powerless efforts, of miseries and of tears, have failed to convince her of the impossibility of the reestablishment of union between the North and the South? Is it not evident that the Secessionists are resolved rather to bury themselves beneath their ruins than to submit, and that to the original and fundamental causes of separation which for so long beforehand announced an inevitable rupture, to the divergence in manners and institutions, the antagonism of interests, even to the opposition of the races, are now added feelings of hatred which the war has created between this hostile brotherhood?

Is it not therefore folly to imagine that, even supposing the armies of Lee and Beauregard were vanquished, implacable feelings of resentment such as these could likewise be subdued? And what blind infatuation could induce the Northern States to create, and maintain by force, subject to their rule, an American Poland, whose inevitable outbreaks would perpetuate the horrors of civil war?

No! the illusion is no longer possible; the idea of reducing and governing the South must be at once abandoned. In this war of extermination the Northern armies waste and perish, and the Government of Washington is compelled to acknowledge that their heroic opponents are not rebels, but a people, a nationality, boldly defending its independence, and prepared, at any cost, to protect its threatened autonomy.

M. Cohen then expresses his astonishment that the principle of modern right which admits the freedom of every nation to choose the form of government best adapted to itself, should be trampled under foot by society, whose duty, on the contrary, is to uphold and respect such a principle. The loss suffered by the United States in this war is not that of territory, neither is it simply the loss of millions of money or of thousands of citizens; it is far more than this—it is the principle of their moral and political greatness. He thus continues:

They have lost the notion of those great liberal truths by which their republic has been elevated to so high a degree of power; they have compromised for ever the liberties of which they were so justly proud. Once they were a free democracy, now they are a bloodthirsty dictatorship; once they were a nation, they are now an army; once they were a hive of remarkable industry, now they are a camp.

How long is this stubborn self-will to continue? How long will they persist in closing their eyes against the evidence of actual facts?

The editor of La France speaks approvingly of the address proposed by the English people, and is of opinion that if this eloquent manifestation of public opinion were supported by the efforts of one of the great European Powers, prompted to its assistance by feelings of laudable humanity, we might then hope to see those feelings of hatred which now fill the American breast removed, and succeeded by others of an altogether opposite and friendly character.

The Temps thinks otherwise; it notices certain rumours according to which the Emperor is about again to employ his influence in the promotion of peace in America, and states that if a proposition of the kind were made, it would have little chance of being accepted.

The Presse has devoted a long and interesting article, from the able pen of M. Chatard, to an account of the battle of Petersburg. This article contains the most complete and stirring recital of Grant's last defeat which has yet appeared in the Parisian press. M. Chatard describes this sanguinary battle with that strict impartiality which is always observed by him; and although he expresses himself somewhat severely against Grant, whom he represents as marching for four months from disaster to disaster, still I doubt if the most devoted partisan of the North could find any statement in this article to which objection could be made.

The excellent writer of articles on American politics in the Constitutionnel, M. H. Marie-Martin, has published the programme adopted by M'Clellan's partisans at New York. M. Martin is not deceived as to the value of this demonstration, and is careful to state that those who took part in it were but a fraction of the Democratic party, who are desirous of peace, and who will make known their programme to the Chicago Convention.

The Patrie publishes an article explanatory of the mechanism of Presidential elections, and a monograph on the city of Mobile.

The Progrès de Paris draws a sad picture of the moral condition of the United States, and shows how great has been their downfall owing to their ambition, which has caused them to forget those Democratic principles to which they owed their extraordinary prosperity.

The three articles above mentioned are from the pen of our active friend, M. Felix Aucaigne.

SENTENCE ON A BALTIMORE LADY.—A military commission held in Washington has sentenced Mrs. Mary E. Sawyer, of Baltimore, to imprisonment with labour until the termination of the war. Mrs. Sawyer was charged with 'corresponding with the enemy, and assisting parties within our lines to correspond with the enemy, and of furnishing letters of a contraband character from within our lines into those of the enemy.'

BITTER SARCASM.—The Boston Courier says: 'One of the most bitter sarcasms upon the Government that we have seen lately (none the worse if unintentional) is the opening sentence of a double-leaded editorial in Tuesday's Tribune: "We have most cheering news from Mobile, and, as it comes on Rebel official authority, it cannot be doubted." The rebel "official authorities" owe the Tribune a handsome acknowledgment for the compliment.'

GREENBACKS.—The New York Daily News on August 19, publishes the following paragraph in its commercial intelligence:—'The decision in the California Courts that all contracts must be settled in gold, deals a severe blow at the legal tender bubble, and greenbacks fell to 37½ cents per dollar. The uses that the Chase legal tender may be applied to are gradually declining. The debts due by the people when the war commenced have been largely reduced at the expense of the creditors, and the mass of paper may be before long repudiated by the Courts.'

THE CONFEDERATE CAUSE IN IRELAND.

FROM AN OCCASIONAL CORRESPONDENT.

DUBLIN: Aug. 29.

THE lovers of peace—to say nothing about fair-play—may at length congratulate themselves that the Federal recruiting-sergeant has begun to find his occupation gone in Ireland. This desirable consummation has been but slowly brought about, and many were the difficulties encountered by the way. These, however, have been happily surmounted; and it is most gratifying to add that Catholics and Protestants, the pulpit and the press, are now uniting their efforts in the cause of peace.

The letter of His Holiness Pius IX. to Archbishop Hughes of New York (the publication of which in the first instance inflicted the first serious check upon the exodus from Ireland) is now being reproduced by the committees of various political societies, and the most effective means are being used to give to it all the publicity it so entirely deserves. Copies of that remarkable document are to be found on the doors of Catholic places of worship, and not a Sunday passes but the epistle of His Holiness may number its readers by many, many thousands. In one conspicuous instance it forms a portion of the subject-matter of a large placard—the remainder of the 'publication' consisting (1st) of an argumentative paper called a 'Caution to Irish Emigrants;' (2nd) a letter contributed to the Irishman by the late W. S. O'Brien (being a powerfully written answer to the orations of 'General Meagher of the Sword'); and (3rd) an address from Mr. John Martin, stating and explaining to his countrymen the arguments that have convinced him that Ireland ought, by every means in her power, to endeavour to bring the war to an end by the recognition of the Confederate States as an independent nation. The tone and spirit of these various writings, and the beneficial effect they are calculated to produce upon the public mind, can be best judged of by the following introductory passage:—

TO EMIGRANTS FROM IRELAND.

The majority of you seek America with the hope of bettering your social condition. On your arrival in the port of New York you may expect to be immediately solicited to enlist in the Federal army for the restoration of the Union, and for the pretended liberation of the negro. What will the liberation of the negro benefit you or yours at home or abroad, that you should risk your lives for his so-called 'freedom?' What benefit or credit will redound to you from the reestablishment of the Union, that you should sell yourselves for a few pounds in hand to the men who would raise themselves to military rank, pay, and promotion, by making your dead bodies the stepping-stone of their ambition? Read; and from the letters of John Martin and W. Smith O'Brien learn that the war of the Northern Yankees against the Southern States is a most unjust, most bloody and inhuman war. Read; and learn from the letter of our Holy Father Pope Pius IX., that this war of the North against the South is the direst, most destructive, and most dismal of all the evils that could befall a people or a nation. Read attentively that epistle of His Holiness, in which he urges and commands Archbishop Hughes of New York to omit nothing 'he can undertake or accomplish' as a Bishop to stay the war and restore peace; and then ask yourselves if you can with a safe conscience despise this entreaty of the Holy Father, or lend yourselves to counteract his injunctions by enlisting in or aiding a war which the Pope has so unqualifiedly condemned.

But even a more remarkable proof of the unanimity with which persons of the highest influence and of opposite parties are working together in the cause of peace, is to be found in the efforts that are daily made to procure signatures to the 'Appeal,' recently put in circulation, from the 'People of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland to the People of the United States.' That appeal addresses itself to the ties of kindred, to the past history of the United States, to the long continuance of the civil war, to the empty character of the results, to the waste of human life, and to the amount of loss and misery caused by the conflict; and entreats the people of the North to consider their position, and to make peace with the Southern States.

In a leading article commending that address to the favourable consideration of its readers, the Irish Times says:—

Let all who read and approve of it affix their names to it: the signatures of two or three millions of men, far from the fury of the strife, cannot but have weight even with the fiercest. Means will be taken to secure for all an opportunity of signing the 'appeal' at the Rotunda, in the porticoes of houses of worship, and in the public streets. We have far greater reason to desire that peace should prevail in America than England has. If one of her branches of trade to the Southern States has suffered, a dozen others have prospered; but there are, or were, three millions of the Irish race settled in America. The soil of Virginia, and Mississippi, and Georgia, absolutely steams with Irish blood. . . . . When kings and cabinets stand aloof, perhaps the voice of the people from whom Northerners and Southerners have more or less purely sprung, may be listened to with respect and with effect. A people can best address a Republican Government and a Republican multitude. In such a case there can be no offence, no selfish motive. It is humanity appealing to humanity and entreating that the worst form of war should be closed in an honourable peace. This popular movement has been begun simultaneously in London, Liverpool, Manchester, and Glasgow; it begins to-day in Dublin, and will commence shortly in Cork, Queenstown, Belfast, and other Irish towns.

The Cork Examiner upon the same subject has the following:—

The honesty, the integrity, the ability of the Northern States are now being more and more largely enlisted in the cause of peace. Political reasons induce some to moderate the expression of their convictions on this head, but every indication points to the belief that it only needs a grand occasion—an encouraging crisis—to induce even the most powerful leaders of American parties to enrol themselves under the banner of peace. This, therefore, is a time when friendly voices from this side of the Atlantic may make themselves heard with effect. And if the voice of the people of England is likely to be heard with complacency, with how much more readiness ought not the friendly utterance of the Irish people to be listened to! We are not merely the mother-country addressing what was once our revolted colony. We are addressing our own nearest and dearest of kindred. We Irish have been among the saddest sufferers by this war, as many a desolate hearth-side, many a roof-tree deprived of its prop, can testify, both on this and the other side of the Atlantic. If there were virtue in this war, Irishmen were among those who made the most desperate sacrifices for it; if there were misery—as, alas! how much—Irishmen have borne more than their fair share. An address from the people of this country, couched in the language of friendship and brotherhood, ought to appeal with peculiar force to the people of the United States; and we trust that every man in Ireland will lend the weight of his name to the persuasion of that document.

The Dublin Evening Mail, with its strongly marked Confederate sympathies, has scarcely patience to treat the address in a spirit of conciliation to the North. It remarks:

We solicit the reader's attention for the interesting document in support of the peace movement which we publish to-day. As an address from the people of Great Britain and Ireland, it has been prepared with a regard to both classes of opinions represented among us, and professes, accordingly, an original sympathy for the North, and former confidence in its success, which we, for our own part, never entertained. We have consistently held opposite sentiments, and the event has warranted the judgment we formed. Whatever arrangements may be concluded between North and South, they will ever henceforth remain two nations, for many and obvious reasons stated by us and others three years ago. The peace now desired will be brought about only by the North admitting the complete independence of the South, and the arguments of this address in sustainment of that course are irrefragable.

The address is also given in extenso, with favourable comments in the editorial columns, in the following journals:—Dublin Morning News (leading Catholic organ), Dublin Evening Post, Belfast Newsletter, Waterford Mail, Wicklow News, Drogheda Conservative, Limerick Chronicle, &c. &c. It was read in the various churches in Queenstown on Sunday last, and the congregations were affectionately and solemnly invited to sign it. Sheets for signature have been placed in the Chamber of Commerce of this city, the Exhibition, the principal hotels, newspaper offices, shops, the offices of young men's societies, Trinity College, &c. Thus the anticipation of the Irish Times, that the document will be signed by 'two or three millions of men,' is in a fair way of being more than realised.

A PRECIOUS DOCUMENT.—Mr. Adams, the United States Minister in London, acknowledges the receipt of the following resolutions presented to President Lincoln:—'Resolutions unanimously adopted by the executive of the Union and Emancipation Society, July 4, 1864:—Moved by Mr. Thomas H. Barker; seconded by Mr. J. G. Edwards, and resolved—"1. That the executive of the Union and Emancipation Society, in meeting specially convened on this 4th day of July, 1864, desire to record their profound gratitude to Almighty God for the vast progress and signal success attending the great struggle for freedom and nationality by the loyal citizens of the Federal Republic of America. 2. That they heartily rejoice in the just Nemesis that has recently overtaken the piratical rebel steamer Alabama, built for gain by an English shipbuilder, in an English port, in evasion of statute law, in defiance of all the claims of political neutrality, international good faith, and commercial honour; that they also record their devout thankfulness that, through the persistent and successful interposition of the British Government, the rebel steam rams have been prevented from entering upon their intended career in aid of the slaveholders' confederacy. 3. That this executive are not unmindful of the horrors of warfare, even when conducted under those military rules and limitations adopted by civilised belligerents; but that they have been intensely shocked by the ruthless and barbarous massacres by the Confederates at Fort Pillow and elsewhere, when the chances of war gave them unchecked power over their captives; and especially do they execrate the systematic and cold-blooded cruelty towards the Federal prisoners at Richmond. 4. That we have received with profound satisfaction the glad tidings that the base and cruel Fugitive Slave Law has been repealed by Congress, believing that this just though somewhat tardy act marks another step in the progress of legislation on the subject of slavery; and that it but anticipates and assures the speedy passage of that crowning act of justice, by which slavery shall be made for ever impossible under the Federal Constitution. 5. That they rejoice exceedingly in the great and significant fact of the unanimous and enthusiastic renomination by the National Union Convention of Abraham Lincoln for the Presidency of the United States, and his acceptance of the said nomination with its noble platform of advanced anti-slavery principles, including the amendment of the Constitution, so as utterly and for ever to exclude and exterminate the system of human bondage from every foot of territory beneath the Federal flag. 6. That they earnestly believe that the great bulk of the people of the United Kingdom, so far as their knowledge of the facts of the case enable them to form an intelligent opinion in respect to the merits of the struggle now going on in the United States, deeply sympathise with the loyal citizens and soldiers in their patriotic efforts to suppress the most wicked and reckless rebellion of which history has any record. 7. That this executive pray for the speedy establishment of the great American republic, on the firm and lasting foundation of justice and freedom, union and peace."—(Signed) J. H. ESTCOURT, Chairman.'

CREDIT OF THE FEDERAL GOVERNMENT.—The New York Daily News says: 'The forcible seizure by the Administration of six hundred tons of ice from the Knickerbocker Ice Company, in this city, is a significant act, and our citizens would do well to ponder its full meaning. It is common enough to impress horses, mules, corn and provender, near the scene of military operations; but when goods are seized by force of arms at a distance from the actual scene of hostilities, it is because the credit of the Government is at so low an ebb that its promises to pay will not be taken.'

LANCASHIRE OPERATIVES IN THE FEDERAL ARMY.—A gentleman of Manchester on a visit to the Confederate States writes: 'Numbers of Lancashire operatives are now to be found in the Southern hospitals and prisons, and also dead or dying upon the battle-field. It is customary for many of the Federal soldiers, before going into battle, to put their names and addresses in their pockets.'

[CONCLUDING NOTICE.]

THAT the manufacturers, and even the merchants and speculators of Lancashire, were long and obstinately incredulous regarding the imminence and the extent of the dread calamity which menaced them, is sufficiently apparent from the very slow rise of the price of cotton during the spring and summer of 1861. It was known to all that the industry of Lancashire depended on the supply of American cotton; that from any considerable reduction in the quantity obtainable from the Southern States of the Union must result a rapid enhancement of price, a great convulsion in the trade, and an ample field for lucrative speculation; and yet, at the close of a period of unexampled prosperity, when money was plentiful among the manufacturers, and when the probability of an interruption to regular trade from the immense stocks of goods in hand might seem to invite speculation, the price of cotton rose with remarkable slowness under circumstances which threatened a total suspension of communication with America. The ordinary price of middling Orleans had been 7*d*. After the fall of Fort Sumter, while the North was arming, and while the border States were seceding—when Mr. Lincoln had actually begun by an aggressive attempt a war of conquest, involving of necessity the most gigantic undertaking upon which a nation ever entered—when it was already apparent that war was to be, and that the North, if it could not vanquish the South, could certainly blockade its coasts so strictly as to make the export of cotton a costly and hazardous, if not a practically impossible, operation—even then middling Orleans was not worth 8*d*. in the Liverpool market. Manassas followed, and the war in Missouri and in Western Virginia; and M'Clellan prepared for a long war by collecting and drilling a great army at Washington; the Southern ports were blockaded; and the Southern factors wrote instructions to the planters not to send their cotton to these ports, where it would be in danger and a source of danger; still Manchester could scarcely believe that the Union was really dissolved, and that the two sections so long at feud were at last at war. Cotton had not reached much more than 1*s*. in December 1861, although by that time it had become plain that, till the South were either crushed or recognised, no more American cotton would reach the English market. The source of this perverse and unfortunate disbelief in obvious facts seems to have been that astonishing ignorance which, when this journal first came into being, withheld from Englishmen all means of estimating the character and conditions of the contest, and blinded them to the strength and resolution of the South, while it filled their minds now with visions of negro insurrection, and now with dreams of amicable reconstruction. We have observed that the course of the market showed that relief was for a long time expected only from Northern victory; that each Federal success, seeming to bring nearer the imagined goal of the war—Southern submission—reduced the price of cotton, while each Confederate advantage, as postponing the issue it could not avert, tended to raise the price. It was quite in keeping with such expectations that the price should rise with a slow deliberation that argued little belief in the duration of the war or the efficacy of the blockade, and that, in the winter of 1861-62, middling Orleans might still be bought for a shilling.

The operatives understood the position clearly—as well as any one understood it. They knew that the American war was the one great cause of their distress. They knew that, despite certain dishonest pretensions of the Federal agents in the press and in the House of Commons, it was to the ambition of the North alone they owed their wretchedness; that the South would willingly sell them cotton, if she were allowed in any form to receive the equivalent for it. They did not blame the manufacturers. They did not blame the Government, content to leave to professional statesmen such questions as the validity of blockades and the legality of captures. Nor did they, for a long time, severely blame their real enemies. At first their sympathies went with the North, as with a democracy of men untainted with the sin of slavery. It was only by degrees that they learned that the North was at least as guilty in that respect as the South—only by degrees that they learned to admire the gallantry with which the chivalry of the South defended their homes and altars against overwhelming odds, and to abhor the cowardly brutality of Pope, and Milroy, and Butler. The insolence of the Yankees towards England and their cruelty towards the negroes, the moderation of the Southerners in council and in war, and the loyalty which spoke volumes for the condition and past treatment of the slaves, completed their conversion. Even now there is a strong Abolitionist party in Lancashire, but at present the sympathies of the people are Southern. At no time, however, except immediately after the Trent outrage, would a forcible intervention have found favour among them. They had too strong an interest in it not to feel that their honour would be implicated—that they would be charged with having interfered not to do justice, but to get cotton. This generous pride alone prevented Lancashire from putting upon the Government a pressure which it could not have resisted, and forcing the warmest friends of the North into reluctant recognition of the South. At any time the people of Lancashire have had it in their power at once to get cotton and to gratify the sympathies of the Southern party among them; at no time have they lifted a finger for the purpose. Precisely because their interests were so deeply involved, they have in this case alone left the foreign policy of England to be shaped without action or interposition on their part.

On New Year's Day, 1862, when for a moment it seemed possible that the cotton famine might be averted by a just and necessary war, forced upon us, whose interest it was to fight, by those whose every hope hung on keeping the peace, the condition of the people was already one of depression and suffering. Half-time had been very general for several months, and many mills were actually closed. As yet there were no relief committees, and those of the operatives who had been longest out of work were falling upon the parish. The Lancashire operative has always something in the way of property; his humble home is often well and neatly furnished; his family are amply clad; he has not unfrequently money in the savings-bank or shares in a cooperative store; a well-paid mechanic or overlooker may own his own cottage and two or three others. All these fruits of industry and thrift were spent to keep their owner from the workhouse; his property was sold, his savings drawn out, his home stripped of its ornaments, his Sunday clothes pawned, and at last his children were 'clemming,' and with a cruel pang the honest man presented himself at the door of the workhouse and asked for food. This was a painful and a cruel thing. It demoralised the people, by bringing down the thriftiest to the level of the most improvident—the only difference being that the one became a pauper earlier than the other. It tortured the hearts of men who were guilty of nothing—not even of being too numerous. It threatened, by reducing the working class of Lancashire to the ordinary condition of working men, without savings or property of their own, to undo the work of fifty years, and interrupt the social progress of the county at the most hopeful point in its history. There were, moreover, cases of actual starvation. The people were very proud; pauperism was very humiliating; guardians, used to deal with hereditary and professional mendicants, were harsh and rough, and wounded the applicant's feelings to the quick; and men died of hunger rather than ask for food at their hands, or, asking it and being bidden to sweep the streets, went home hungry and locked themselves in to 'clem to death.' This could not be endured; and in the worst-afflicted district private charity began to organise means of relief. The Relief Committee of Wigan was formed on January 3, 1862. Similar organisations sprang up elsewhere, making it their object to supplement the working of the Poor Law and atone for its deficiencies. They kept many thousands 'off the parish;' they sought out those whom even starvation could not induce to ask for charity; they collected and distributed whatever funds could be obtained from the humanity and the wealth of the immediate neighbourhood. The Lord Mayor, supported by some of the most influential citizens of London, had set on foot a committee, through which enormous sums were collected from all parts of the empire, and transmitted to the local committees; a central body, established at Manchester, and comprising the principal merchants and manufacturers of Lancashire, attracted to itself the main stream of public bounty, and thus, by rendering itself the principal channel of distribution, became also the centre of direction and control. This committee was presently enlarged by the adhesion of the chief landowners of the county, who already, in a meeting held at the house of Lord Ellesmere, had contributed a very considerable sum for the relief of Lancashire.

Under the direction of the Manchester Committee the system of relief was reduced to regularity and order. In each town a committee comprising the principal citizens, clergymen, and landowners, distributed among the sufferers by the cotton famine the funds subscribed by a sympathising realm and a pitying empire. Not only from every part of England, but from every corner of those dominions on which the sun never sets, money flowed in to the relief of Lancashire distress, and was distributed, through the central agency at Manchester, in proportion to the necessities of the different towns. The leader of this benevolent movement, the chief director of the energetic labours of the Lancashire philanthropists, the mediator between the suffering operatives and their countrymen, was one whom the former had diligently been taught to regard as a political enemy, but who, in the hour of their need, remembered only that he was the greatest landowner, the oldest noble, and the natural chief of Lancashire. Not all his public services, great as they have been, have done half so much to fix his memory in the hearts of his countrymen as the part he played during the misery which the American war entailed upon his native county. While the cotton famine is remembered, and while the remembrance continues to bind together, as they never were bound before, the rich and the poor, the employers and the employed, the tenants and the proprietors of Lancashire, no name will hold so high a place in the grateful esteem and affection of all as that of the Earl of Derby.

It could not be supposed, however, that private charity could feed a starving county for any length of time, or that local resources could permanently sustain the burden of a national calamity. Throughout 1862, the subscriptions of the public and the poor-rates of the various unions bore the burden of supporting a people deprived of all employment by the sudden stroke of a public misfortune. There was more liberality and less waste than has ever before characterised charitable efforts on a gigantic scale; and for a considerable time the rates and the relief funds were sufficient to their burdens. But it was evident that this could not long be the case, and that eventually Parliament must make some provision adequate to the magnitude of the necessity. Accordingly, after considerable discussion among themselves, the representatives of Lancashire determined on the plan they would recommend to the Government. They asked no grant of public money; they asked no contribution from the Consolidated Fund to the treasury of the embarrassed unions. They asked and obtained two boons—a rate in aid and a power to borrow. Overburdened parishes were allowed to exact the assistance of the union; overburdened unions were empowered to lay a portion of their load upon the county to which they belonged. And unions were allowed to borrow from the public Treasury, on strict conditions as to interest and security for repayment, funds sufficient for public works, drainage, repairs of roads, and so forth—which were not only of use as means of employing the workpeople ejected from the factories. This was all the aid that Lancashire received from the Imperial Treasury, and all that Lancashire men condescended to ask.

The question of employment was the worst perplexity of those to whom the care of Lancashire was intrusted. Several considerations concurred to make this question both important and difficult. In the first place, it had given rise, at a very early stage, to a dispute between the distressed operatives and the Poor Law Boards. The guardians considered it their duty to exact labour from all able-bodied applicants for relief; and they had no labour to offer but such as, having usually been assigned to paupers, had come to be regarded as a badge of pauperism and degradation. The operatives revolted against street-sweeping and oakum-picking, as the usual occupation of a class upon which they looked down with honest and well-merited contempt. They had another objection to stone-breaking; it bruised their hands, and destroyed that softness and sensibility of the fingers which is necessary to cotton-spinning. The guardians had been obliged to yield, with the full consent of the Government, to these not unreasonable demands, and the operatives received support without doing work. Idleness demoralised them so terribly, that there were not a few who, when the tide began to turn, were found to prefer the dole of charity to the earnings of labour. The Relief Committees, from the first, were aware of this danger and did their best to counteract it. Secondly, serious alarm was felt for the consequences of allowing thousands of factory girls, accustomed to work in independence, to roam the streets in a state of idleness. This difficulty was met by the institution of sewing-schools, under the direction of benevolent ladies, which absorbed the whole of the unemployed female population which could not find suitable occupation at home. During winter a good many of the men were also collected in schools, the dole of the Relief Committee being made contingent on their attendance. In March 1863 a portion of the operatives of Staleybridge and Ashton rose in riot against an attempted exaction of greater diligence in their work and a threatened reduction of their charitable allowance, so completely had they learned to think themselves entitled to the support which at first they had received with gratitude as the free gift of the country. And the labour difficulty was not finally settled till the Public Works Act, passed in June 1863, supplied the local authorities with funds for the express purpose of employing the operatives; and the gradual diminution of the pressure, after that period, enabled some of the Relief Committees first to contract, and afterwards to suspend, their operations. The effect on the character of the people, of wages received for nearly two years unearned by real productive work, has not yet entirely passed away.

It ought to be borne in mind that, in the worst of their misery, the wretchedness of the operatives was never so great as that of many countries whose sufferings under famine, war, or pestilence, have made far less impression on the world at large. It was not the actual misery endured, but the contrast between past prosperity and present penury, which distinguished the Lancashire Cotton Famine. The allowance of the Relief Committee made the family of an operative as rich as that of a Dorsetshire peasant in full employment; but the former had been accustomed to a life which to the latter would have seemed luxurious. In all substantial matters he had fared almost as well as his employer; he had been fed, and lodged, and clothed, wholesomely, amply, and comfortably; he had been able to save without pinching, and to indulge in luxury without extravagance; and from that state of ample competence he descended to one of bare sufficiency of food and frequent insufficiency of fuel and raiment. In that transition he probably suffered more than the peasant, accustomed to privation, suffers from an increase of the penury which is his normal condition. It needs no exaggeration of their actual sufferings, no concealment of the amount of relief extended to them, to command our sympathies for the people of Lancashire in the severe trial whose history is here recorded, or our admiration for the heroic and Christian patience with which, for the most part, that trial has been endured.

MR. LINCOLN AND THE NEW YORK PRESS.—The New York Daily News of August 20 writes: 'Yesterday Mr. John Mullaly was arrested by a United States Marshal on the complaint of Mr. E. Delafield Smith, United States District-Attorney, for an alleged opposition to the draft through several articles published in the Metropolitan Record and New York Vindicator, of which Mr. Mullaly is editor and proprietor. We have read the articles referred to in the complaint, and find in them no evidence of an intention to excite the populace to resistance. They are confined to an assertion of the unconstitutionality of the conscription law, and an appeal to the Governor of this State to protect the rights of the people through the recognised tribunals and his legitimate executive action. The right to question the constitutionality of an Act of Congress cannot be denied to the citizen, and it is a part of the duty of a public journal to discuss without reserve the propriety and legality of measures that affect the public weal. It is too late in Mr. Lincoln's reign, and too near the period of his discharge from office, to attempt to intimidate the press of New York. If it could be done, it would of course give Mr. Lincoln a great advantage in the Presidential campaign, and we are not surprised that the experiment is about to be tried.'

THE WAR IN THE REAR.—Some of the irregular horse of the 'Military District of Southern Kentucky' range over a very wide extent of that region; and, in the fulness of their dominion there, sweep up with impunity to within a few miles of Louisville. The war in the rear is growing in Kentucky to very serious dimensions, and may be made, by a Confederate advance into that State from Pound Gap, to close in fatally on the rear of General Sherman. The concentration of all our strength at two principal points may give us, before long, a disastrous proof of the difficulty of conquering a country where our advance becomes exposed to a war in not only the front but also the rear.—New York Paper.

* The History of the Cotton Famine, from the Fall of Sumter to the Passing of the Public Works Act. By R. ARTHUR ARNOLD. London: Saunders, Otley, & Co. 1864.

THE RESIGNATION OF THE HON. C. G. MEMMINGER.

THE following correspondence has passed between President Davis and Mr. Memminger in reference to the retirement of the latter from the Secretaryship of the Treasury:—

Treasury Department: Richmond, June 15, 1864.

His Excellency the President:

Sir,—You have been aware for several months past of my desire to withdraw from my present official position, and of the reasons which restrained me from so doing. With an earnest purpose to devote to the service of my country, during the perils which surround her, whatever faculties I may possess, I had nevertheless perceived that the enormous burdens imposed on the Treasury by a war on so vast a scale, and the difficulty of sustaining them, had given rise to discontent and distrust in the ability of the officer administering the financial department. To these elements of dissatisfaction was added another arising from essential differences in the plans submitted by the head of the department and those adopted by Congress.

In this condition of things it would seem to have been proper to have resigned my office as soon as Congress had passed its judgment against the plans which I had submitted.

Two considerations, however, prevented. The first was a repugnance to any act which could be misconstrued into an abandonment of a post of duty assigned to me during a struggle in which I felt that every citizen owed to his country whatever sacrifice or service was demanded of him. The financial plan which was finally adopted by the last Congress had been uncertain until the end of the session. It was not matured until the two Houses had referred the matter to committees of conference, and it became a law only on the last day of the session. The machinery which was required for its operation was complex and extensive, and, by the terms of the law, just forty days were allowed to carry it into complete effect. No new head of the department, however competent, would have been able to acquire sufficient knowledge of office details in time to have carried out the provisions of the Act. The public good, therefore, demanded that I should not leave my post during this period.

The second consideration which prevented was the unwillingness I felt to leave you in opposition to your desire, while you honoured me with such confidence as you have manifested, and while our whole energies were still taxed by the great and varied responsibilities attendant upon the office in which Providence has placed you.

These considerations now no longer govern. The first is at an end. The funding of the currency has been nearly completed, and the entire machinery required by the plans of Congress and finance is now in full operation. No interest will suffer by my now giving place to a successor. The second consideration is, that I yield to the conviction that justice to myself and the public requires me to insist on the acceptance of the resignation which I now tender, in the hope that you will be successful in choosing a successor whose views shall harmonise with those of Congress, and who may, on that account, be better able (none can be more earnestly desirous) than I have been to do valuable service to our country.

I confess, sir, that I cannot, without deep emotion, separate from you and my colleagues in the Cabinet. Neither can I do so without bearing my testimony that never, in the utmost freedom of confidential intercourse, have I heard one word or suggestion indicating aught but a conscientious and disinterested desire to do what was best for our country. It has been my hope that, ere our official connection terminated, our country would be in full fruition of the peace and independence for which she has paid so costly a price, and that you, sir, would have enjoyed, in the spectacle of her happiness and prosperity, the only reward you seek for the ceaseless cares and labours devoted to her service. Though this may not now be, I shall not cease in private life to give my warm cooperation in whatever may conduce to the consummation so ardently desired.

I need scarcely add, Mr. President, that, while desiring to be relieved at as early a period as may be practicable, my services remain freely at your disposal until you shall have selected my successor in office.

With heartfelt wishes for your health, happiness, and prosperity, I remain, with the highest respect and esteem, your obedient servant, C. G. MEMMINGER.

Richmond, Virginia: June 21, 1864.

Dear Sir,—I have received your letter of the 15th inst., stating the grounds on which you deem that justice to yourself and to the public requires you to urge my acceptance of your resignation.

Some months since you expressed a desire to retire, for the reason that, in your belief, the public service would be promoted by the appointment of a successor whose views of financial policy accorded better than your own with the legislation then lately adopted. I knew the extreme difficulty of conducting the Treasury Department during the pending struggle. I was aware that any officer, however competent, must probably fail to escape the animadversions of those who are ready to attribute to inefficient administration the embarrassments due to deficiency of resources and the want of legislation best adapted to the existing circumstances. The experience acquired by you in the organisation and management of the Department could not be immediately replaced, and for these reasons I was satisfied that the general welfare would be injuriously affected by your withdrawal at that time. You have now, at least, the consolation and satisfaction to know that your personal wishes were surrendered to a conviction of public duty.

Recent events do not warrant me in refusing your renewed request that I should accept your resignation. The regret you express at the prospect of our official separation is sincerely shared by me. From your entrance on the duties of your office I have observed and appreciated the cheerful and unremitting devotion of all your faculties to the public service, and do not fail to remember that it was at the sacrifice of private inclinations that you continued to fulfil the arduous duties of your post. The offer you make of your services until your successor can assume office, is in the same patriotic spirit, and is accepted as thankfully as it is generously tendered. At as early a period as practicable I will endeavour to comply with your request to be relieved.

With my grateful acknowledgments for your past assistance, and for your very kind expressions of personal regard, be assured of the cordial esteem with which I am, your friend,

JEFFERSON DAVIS.

Hon. C. G. Memminger, Secretary of Confederate States Treasury, Richmond, Virginia.

GRANT'S LAST MOVEMENT.

THE Washington correspondent of the New York Daily News writes as follows under date of August 18:—

'From the glowing and bombastic accounts put forth by the Administration in reference to Butler's canal on the James River, and the recent movement of Grant's army to the north side of that river, the public might be led to suppose that an attack was to be made upon Richmond from that direction. But I am assured, upon the very best authority, that nothing of the kind was or is contemplated. So far as Butler's canal is concerned, it is a humbug of the first water, and will amount to nothing at all, one way or the other. The rebels have command of the James River down to the upper end of the bend, and, indeed, they have some strong batteries planted below that end. But their command of that part of the river will enable them to concentrate upon the west end of Butler's canal, if it ever reaches that end, such a terrific fire as to prevent the completion of the work, if they desire to do so. It is believed, however, that the pretended digging of the canal is only a stratagem, and a very shallow one at that, to deceive the enemy.

'As regards the movements of the army to the north side of the James river, it is said to be done in order to draw the Confederate troops away from Petersburg, and to ascertain their real strength at Richmond. The reported capture of Drury's Bluff was a most cruel hoax. Nothing of the kind was either attempted, or even contemplated. The movements on the north side of the river have only demonstrated how strong the Confederate works defending Richmond from that direction really are; and how hopeless any real assault upon them would be. It is well known that they are weaker there than at any other point on the line. But weak as they are, they are a great deal stronger than the works at Petersburg, and a great deal more difficult to carry. That fact was abundantly demonstrated by the attack that has just been made. In this attack the whole of the Second Corps, the very élite of the army, and a large portion of the Tenth Corps, were actively engaged. Whatever was possible for any troops in the world to effect would have been accomplished by them. Yet all they did do was to ascertain that the Confederate position, against which they advanced, was entirely too strong to be taken. The knowledge thus gained, too, has been very costly to us. Our loss was heavy, amounting to over two thousand, and this of our very best troops. The movement was intended, too, to be a surprise, and in this it utterly failed. The expedient of sending the troops on board of transports down the river, instead of up, with the bands playing gaily, did not deceive the Confederates. When our troops were landed and advanced to the assault they found the Confederates in front of them, as usual, in full force. In a word, the whole movement has been a failure, and a most costly one. If our troops remain where they are they can effect nothing towards Richmond, as the defensive positions held by the Confederates will be defended by additional bodies of troops, which on Sunday and Monday were being withdrawn from Petersburg for that purpose.'

AFFAIRS FINANCIAL AND COMMERCIAL.

WEDNESDAY EVENING.

MONEY AND DISCOUNT MARKET.

THE money market has not been in a very quiet state, and apprehension is expressed that the rate of discount may ultimately have to be advanced. For the moment, however, such a contingency is barely possible, and, with gold going into the Bank, some parties are sanguine enough to think a reduction may follow. If the quotation can be maintained with steadiness, without movement one way or the other, it will be so much the better for all parties. There are, nevertheless, symptoms of dear money looming in the future, when the Bank of Amsterdam finds it essential to carry the rate to 5 per cent. A few failures in the mercantile world also indicate that trade has experienced some strain through the late high rates, and, if this shall prove the case, the last two months of the year will be fraught with mischief. While the principal bankers and bill-brokers are working at nearly ½ per cent. below the official minimum, there must be a strong pull to carry the quotation beyond 8 per cent. A further rise may take place at the end of October if, as is supposed, the remittances eastward shall rapidly increase. But all this difficulty may be surmounted by an exhibition of confidence which has before been shown when a shock has been approaching. Full values for money must rule with calls payable on banks, finance and credit companies, and when these come actively into force, the beginning of the end will be apparent. On the Stock Exchange short loans, which recently only commanded 3 and 4 per cent., are not now obtainable under 7 and 8 per cent., capital having been taken thence by Messrs. Glyn, and other bankers, to pay the current railway dividends.

BULLION AND SPECIE MOVEMENTS.

The bullion market maintains its improved character, and there is very little alteration to notice in the state of business. Again there have not been any withdrawals this week on foreign account, and the amount sent into the Bank is 276,000*l*. The arrivals of specie have been unusually large, a considerable portion of which, it is expected, will also find its way into Threadneedle Street. The amount received is 1,513,700*l*., of which 1,468,621*l*. is from the West Indies and the Pacific, and the remainder from New York. The Delhi steamer, which has just left for the East, takes out 441,550*l*., of which 27,900*l*. is gold and 413,950*l*. silver. The gold ships from Melbourne now at sea are the Wellesley, with 95,000*l*.; the Norfolk, with 31,500*l*.; and the Garrawalt, with 113,000*l*. The silver market has been moderately active, and prices are slightly advancing. The present quotation for bar is 61½*d*. per oz. There have been very few Mexican dollars in the market lately, and the nominal price is 62*d*. per oz.

THE CREDIT FONCIER AND THE CREDIT MOBILIER COMPANIES.

The reports of the Crédit Foncier Company and the Crédit Mobilier Company have just been conjointly issued, preparatory to the meetings to be held on September 5, and are of a most remarkable character. That of the Crédit Foncier states that the net profits for the five months and three-quarters since the commencement of operations (after paying off the whole of the preliminary expenses, amounting to 10,000*l*.), have been 42,219*l*., or at the rate of 180 per cent. on the paid-up capital. The profits of the Crédit Mobilier are stated to be 42,614*l*., or at the rate of 205 per cent. per annum. A fusion of the two companies is to be proposed, with an issue of new shares at a premium of 2*l*. 13*s*. 4*d*. per 20*l*. share, to double the present subscribed capital of the two concerns.

HOME AND FOREIGN SECURITIES.

The Stock Markets throughout the week have shown increased depression, and prices for the English securities have steadily declined. For this there really does not appear any exciting cause, and it must be mainly attributed to the general stagnation in business. The dealers just now appear to be perfectly apathetic, and nothing of a speculative character is exhibited. The closing price of Consols this evening was 88½ to 88⅝ for money, and 88⅝ to 88¾ for the account, which, as compared with Wednesday last, is a fall of ⅜ per cent. Exchequer Bills remain without change at 25*s*. to 15*s*. dis. A rather better feeling, however, prevails in the Foreign Stock Market, and some of the securities which are more particularly affected through political influences show an improvement; but otherwise prices are comparatively steady. There has been an improvement of ¾ per cent. in Greek, of ⅛ per cent. in Spanish Passives, and of ⅛ per cent. in Mexican—the closing quotations being: Greek, 23¾ to 24¼; Mexican, 28½ to 28¾; Spanish Passives, 31⅛ to 31⅜; ditto Certificates, 13⅜ to 13⅝; Turkish Six per Cents. of 1854, 90 to 91; and those of 1862, 70¼ to 70½.

CONFEDERATE COTTON LOAN.

The market has been uninfluenced this week by the several instalments of news received from the American continent—the transactions have been probably limited—the closing price 80 cash, in expectation of the drawing to take place on Thursday (this day). The quotation, ex. dividend drawing, is 75 to 76.

AMERICAN SECURITIES.

The stagnation in the market for American Government and railway securities appears to increase, and the occasional reported successes of the Federals fail to give the slightest strength to the market. The brokers will not look at these securities now, unless under positive instructions. The only dealings recorded this week have been in Virginia State 6 per Cents. at 28½; Erie, $100 shares, all paid, at 41; Illinois Central, $100 shares, $90 paid, at 44, 44¾, 45, and 46 dis.; do. do., all paid, 52, 51¼, 51, 50, and 49½.

MERCANTILE SUSPENSIONS.

The suspension is announced of Messrs. Gunther, Muller, & Co., of Mincing Lane, in the oil and seed trade, with liabilities estimated at between 40,000*l*. and 50,000*l*. The failure is said to have been caused by losses sustained through houses in Hamburg and Amsterdam.—The failure is also announced of Messrs. Born & Co., general merchants, of Mincing Lane, with liabilities estimated at about 60,000*l*.

MEETINGS OF PUBLIC COMPANIES, ETC.

An extraordinary meeting of the Ottoman Financial Association has been held for the purpose of confirming the resolution passed at a previous meeting, to increase the capital to the extent of 1,000,000*l*. by the issue of 20,000 new shares of 50*l*. each; 10,000 to be at first issued to applicants in the Ottoman Empire, and the remaining 10,000 to be retained, to be issued at the option of the directors. The resolution was agreed to, and also another altering the articles of association.—At the half-yearly meeting of the proprietors of the General Steam Navigation Company the usual dividend at the rate of 10 per cent. per annum, free of income-tax, was agreed to.—At a meeting of the Indian Tramway Company the report, which was adopted, stated that the late subscriptions for the issue of further capital not having reached the amount required, it is recommended that the same be returned.—The London Bank of Scotland has held a special meeting for the purpose of confirming the resolution for voluntarily winding up the company, appointing the directors as liquidators, with authority to transfer the assets of the company to the Mercantile and Exchange Bank, and to carry out the proposed amalgamation. The resolution was agreed to.—At the first ordinary general meeting to-day of the European Bank, a balance-sheet was presented, embracing the period from September 1, 1863, to May 31 last, from which it appears that the gross profits for the nine months of its existence were 32,411*l*., and that, after deducting the expenses of management, providing for bad and doubtful debts, and rebating undue bills, the net profits were 19,035*l*. The directors have already paid an interim dividend of 15*s*. per share, and they now propose an addition thereto of 2*s*. 6*d*. per share, free of income-tax, thus making together rather more than 16 per cent. per annum on the mean capital worked during the nine months. The report was unanimously adopted.

RAILWAY SECURITIES.

The market for British railway securities still continues very dull. Business, which is otherwise exceedingly slack, has been materially interfered with this week, by the preparations for and settlement of the half-monthly account. There is but little desire manifested by the dealers to operate to any extent, and prices generally exhibit a further decline. As compared with last week there has been a fall of 1½ per cent. in Midland; of 1¼ per cent. in South Eastern; of 1 per cent. in Great Western, Lancashire and Yorkshire, London, Chatham, and Dover, London and North-Western, and Metropolitan; and of ½ per cent. in Caledonian, Great Eastern, and North Eastern (York). But on the other side there has been an improvement of 4 per cent. in West Midland (Oxford); of 1 per cent. in Great Northern; and of ½ per cent. in North and South Western Junction. There has not been much doing in foreign railway shares, or those connected with the British possessions, and prices remain heavy.

PROGRESS OF ENTERPRISE.

The prospectus has been issued this evening of the Graham's Town Fire and Marine Insurance Company, with a capital of 250,000*l*. in 25,000 shares of 10*l*. each. At present it is not intended to call up more than 1*l*. per share, a deposit of 10*s*. per share being required on application, and 10*s*. on allotment. The company has been established to meet the growing local wants in these branches of assurance business. The companies already in existence at the Cape are doing large businesses, and paying dividends varying from 20 to 50 per cent.

THE COURSE OF THE PRODUCE MARKETS.

Dear money continues to check transactions in produce generally, and buyers show no disposition to depart from the cautious line of policy which they have pursued for some time past. Whilst inactive, however, the markets, as a rule, are free from any serious depression, as supplies, although freely offered, are not forced off. The deliveries from warehouse are still favourable, and prevent any undue accumulation of stocks, notwithstanding that imports for some time past have been upon a liberal scale. The grain trade throughout the country, as well as in Mark Lane, has become firmer, partly from the moderate supplies coming on offer at the moment, and partly from a disposition to view present rates as moderate, and consequently safe. These remarks apply more particularly to wheat. Oats and all feeding stuffs are especially firm, in consequence of the protracted drought. Oilcake is in steady demand and very firmly held. The best New York brands of linseed in barrels are quoted 11*l*. 5*s*. to 11*l*. 10*s*., and best bags 11*l*. Linseed is firm from the same cause, but at the moment transactions on the spot are not extensive. The provision trade is moderately active with an upward tendency in prices. Irish bacon has risen 2*s.* per cwt., and American short middles, rib in, are more in request at 43*s.* to 44*s.* per cwt. Navy provisions are still neglected. Fine butters have advanced 2*s.* to 4*s.* per cwt., but are not active, whilst anything ranging from 100*s.* to 110*s.* commands a very ready sale. Lard of all imports sells steadily. Petroleum moves off in small quantities at 2*s.* 1*d.* per gallon for American on the spot, and 2*s.* 2*d.* for future delivery. For crude the price is 18*l.* per tun. Rosin maintains its value at 26*s.* to 34*s.* for French, and 31*s.* to 42*s.* for American. The oil markets in general keep dull. Linseed is further depressed, the demand for cake causing a large production. To-day 35*s.* 9*d.* was the closing quotation. Rape oil is also offered on easier terms, say 46*s.* for foreign pale and 43*s.* for brown. Palm oil has risen to 36*s.* 6*d.* to 37*s.* owing to the rapid enhancement in tallow, which, in consequence of the drought, has gone up to 42*s.* 9*d.* for old Y.C. and 44*s.* for new on the spot, 44*s.* 9*d.* for the last three months' delivery, and 45*s.* 6*d.* spring. The metal market has become rather dull. Scotch pig-iron has declined to 57*s.* 10½*d.*, and spelter to 24*l.* 15*s.* per ton on the spot. Copper, on the other hand, is firmer. With prompt, Straits tin is quoted 103*l.*, and Banca 104*l.*

LIVERPOOL, Wednesday, August 30.—Our cotton market remains very quiet, and business continues limited, the dealings being chiefly confined to the supply of immediate wants. Prices have not been particularly steady; but whilst, on the one hand, there is at present no desire to purchase except under necessity, still, on the other hand, there is little disposition to force sales. The sales this week have amounted to 31,000 bales, of which 8,500 were taken on speculation and for export. The total sales this year to the present time have been 1,819,540 bales, and to the same time last year 1,512,014 bales. There have been imported this year 1,419,141 bales; last year the number was 990,131 bales. The trade have taken this year 1,126,212 bales, and in 1863, 842,658 bales. The exports this year have been 373,711 bales; last year they were 290,376 bales. There have been taken on speculation this year 311,414 bales, and in 1863 344,272 bales. The estimated stocks at the present time are 206,663 bales, and at the same period last year they were 247,112 bales. The closing quotations this afternoon were: for American descriptions, 28½*d.* to 31¼*d.*; Pernambuco, 31½*d.* to 32*d.*; Maranham, 31½*d.* to 32*d.*; Maceio, 29½*d.* to 29½*d.*; Bahia, 29½*d.* to 29½*d.*; Egyptian, 30*d.* to 30*d.*; Smyrna, 23½*d.* to 23½*d.*: Surats, 15*d.* to 27½*d.*; Bengal, 15½*d.* to 17½*d.*; Scinde, 15½*d.* to 17½*d.*; China, 18*d.* to 20½*d.*

There has been some improvement during the week in the Manchester markets, both as regards business and prices, although, as regards the latter, the alteration has not been very material. In shipping yarns there has been rather more doing, but not to the extent that was anticipated after the favourable telegrams received yesterday from India. The enquiry for yarns has been good, but it has not resulted in extensive dealings. Still it cannot be said that business has not improved. For home-trade yarns the market is also steadier, but spinners are showing a disposition to operate at previous quotations. The cloth market also shows signs of improvement, but, as in the case of yarns, manufacturers are disappointed that the Indian advices have not led to more business. It was anticipated that buyers would have been very active, but they are evidently holding back in anticipation of lower prices, and they seem quite indisposed at present to make satisfactory offers. A few transactions have taken place in light T cloths, shirtings, and madapollams, to meet immediate requirements, but the offers for larger parcels have been made at too low rates to be likely to be accepted by holders. The closing quotations are as follows:—$\frac{7}{8}$ Grey Printers, according to quality, from 8*s.* 9*d.* to 16*s.* 9*d.*; $\frac{9}{8}$ Grey Madapollams, 7*s.* 10½*d.* to 10*s.* 4½*d.*; $\frac{3}{8}$ Grey Printers, 12*s.* 1½*d.* to 18*s.* 6*d.*; $\frac{5}{4}$ Grey Shirtings, 13*s.* 3*d.* to 27*s.* 6*d.*; Water Twist, No. 20, 2*s.* 3*d.* to 2*s.* 10½*d.*; No. 30, 2*s.* 8*d.* to 3*s.* 2*d.*; No. 40, 3*s.* 1*d.* to 3*s.* 7*d.*; Mule Twist, No. 20, 1*s.* 11*d.* to 2*s.* 9*d.*; No. 30, 2*s.* 4*d.* to 2*s.* 11*d.*; No. 40, 2*s.* 6½*d.* to 3*s.* 4*d.*; No. 50, 2*s.* 11*d.* to 3*s.* 6*d.*; No. 60, 3*s.* to 3*s.* 8*d.*; No. 70, 3*s.* 2*d.* to 3*s.* 10*d.*; No. 80, 3*s.* 6*d.* to 4*s.*; No. 90, 3*s.* 8*d.* to 4*s.* 2*d.*; and No. 100, 3*s.* 11*d.* to 4*s.* 9*d.*

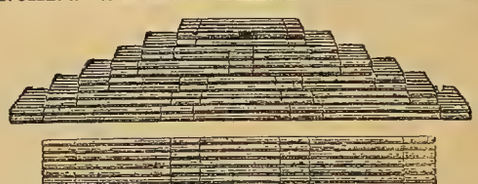
DUNCAN'S PATENT RATAN CANE SPLINTS.



THESE Splints are introduced and recommended to the Faculty for the great advantages which they possess above others,—viz., their comfort, coolness, and durability, as well as the facility with which they may be applied to the fractured limb.
As cleanliness is an important consideration, these Splints possess that quality pre-eminently, as they may be readily washed without the slightest fear of injury.
They are especially adapted to the constant usage of the General Hospital, and the movements of an Army on Service, as they cannot easily be injured. For Colonial practice they are recommended for the same reason.
They have been submitted to, and have received the approbation of, the Principal Medical Officers of the Army Medical Department.
The Splints cannot be injured by moisture; and are manufactured either with or without pads.

Financial Aspect of the United States of America.

SOME few years ago it was the custom of certain English statesmen to make unpalatable fiscal comparisons between the Governments of the United Kingdom and the United States of America. Such comparisons tended not only to create dissatisfaction in the minds of a certain section of the tax-paying community, but also assisted to swell that mighty volume of American emigration which finally leavened the Northern States with no less than forty-eight per cent. of an alien population. Nor were the statements then made without apparent foundation. The United States were young, had a wide and prolific territory intersected by large rivers and watered by two oceans, and only wanted the industry of man to make them another Paradise. For seventy years they had continued to march in the van of progress, unencumbered with the taxation and state debts of the kingdoms of the Old World. On June 30, 1860, the public debt of the United States amounted only to $64,769,699, or about $2·16 per head of the entire population. When President Lincoln came into power, in March 1861, the public debt was $76,159,667, or about $2·42 per head of the entire population. His determination, however, to coerce the South and to maintain the Union by force of arms has added, within three years and a half, the enormous sum of $1,600,000,000. The increase of such debt has been officially stated as follows:—

Federal debt, July 1, 1862		$495,244,526
Ditto	December 1, 1862	727,512,755
Ditto	September 30, 1863	1,222,113,560
Ditto	July 1, 1864	1,686,956,638

Already has the debt attained the proportion of $84·35 per head of the present population of the North; and, if Mr. Chase's estimate of Federal debt for 1865 be realised, the burden on the head of each citizen will attain to $111; whilst, if the war should continue until 1866, nothing can prevent the war debt from rising to $140 per head. Supposing the efforts of the peace party of the North to be crowned with success, and the war to cease with the present campaign, it will not be an exaggeration to put down the Federal debt at $2,000,000,000. Such an amount of debt, if funded, to bear interest at the rate of five per cent. per annum, would make an annual charge on the Northern States of $100,000,000.

The interest of the war debt, however, will not be the only burden hereafter to be borne by the Northern people. It is hardly to be expected that the military and naval establishments of the country can safely be reduced at once, if indeed ever, to their normal footing before the war. Even without new wars, and even with the South as an ally instead of a rival, the future of America is so pregnant with big events that, under the most favourable circumstances of peace, a considerable standing army and an efficient naval force will probably be indispensable. Assuming, then, an army and navy to be retained which will secure the material interests of the Northern States, it will not be difficult to estimate the approximate fiscal burdens of the Federal Government. It will be no unreasonable estimate to place the future peace establishment of the Northern States at $300,000,000 a year, viz.:—

Civil List	$10,000,000
Foreign Intercourse	2,000,000
Miscellaneous	20,000,000
Interior Department—
Indians, Military and Naval Pensions	20,000,000
War Department	100,000,000
Naval do.	48,000,000
Interest on Public Debt	100,000,000
	$300,000,000

To meet this expenditure the North will have four sources of income, viz. Customs, Internal Duties, Sales of Public Lands, and Miscellaneous Items, whose united yield will approach $160,000,000, viz.:—

Customs	$70,000,000
Internal Duties	80,000,000
Land Sales	1,000,000
Miscellaneous	9,000,000
	$160,000,000

The deficiency to be made up will be about $140,000,000, which can only be met by obtaining loans of money at home or abroad, or by doubling the taxation paid by the people. If recourse be had to the former method, it will only tend to depreciate existing stocks of American securities; whilst doubling the taxation of the people can only be enforced by a strong Government, to which the people as yet are unaccustomed. Well may the more thoughtful of American citizens shudder at a continuance of the war, whilst they almost equally dread a return of peace, because of the dangers which will then arise, and which may threaten with political and social convulsion the Northern States themselves. Possibly it may change the political destiny of the whole American continent. But that is in the future.

As yet we have but glanced at the debts and dangers which threaten the Federal Government. Let us turn for a moment to the States which form the Northern Republic. Europeans are apt to forget, even if many of them know, that there is a State as well as a Federal Government. Each State has a Legislature of its own, which makes laws and imposes taxation distinct from what is enacted by the Government at Washington. The State authorities can impose taxes for State government, justice, education, pauperism, &c., the total demands of which amount to a large yearly sum, hitherto cheerfully borne because of the lightness of the Federal burden. Whether the State taxes will be as easily raised in the future as in the past, time alone will determine. With the State Governments, as with the Federal Government, the war has materially increased both their taxation and debt. From the annexed statement the reader will readily infer the present financial condition of the Northern States.

Approximate amount of State debt . $144,038,435

Assuming the population of the States named to amount to 20,000,000, the local burdens average $3·3 per head, and the debts $7·2; or, in other words, the Federal and State burdens amount together, at the present time, to more than $40 per head per year, and the debts of the two to $91½. History offers no parallel to the recklessness which the Northern States have exhibited during the past three years and a half, and all to compel the Southern people to submit to a union no longer in harmony with their interests or their wishes. In common with all other wars, that of the United States will cast an additional burden not only on the shoulders of the Northern people, but on every other country which hereafter may trade with them. As we have stated, the Northern States purpose to raise a considerable portion of their taxation on foreign imports. Foreigners, therefore, must pay their share of Federal taxation, if they hope to do any business with them. What that business will be we are really at a loss to conceive. Seventy millions of customs dues will represent over two hundred million dollars of foreign trade at the present rates imposed by the United States tariff.

Before the outbreak of the present war the total exports of the United States had attained to $373,189,274, of which, however, $56,946,851 were specie and bullion; thus leaving 316,242,423 dollars' worth of domestic produce to be apportioned betwixt North and South. Of the last-named amount the South exported 226,000,000 dollars' worth of domestic produce, thus leaving to the North only $90,000,000. It will thus be seen that the North must at once double its foreign trade of 1860 in order to raise the customs dues accredited to it in its future fiscal arrangements. If the North fails to prosecute a vigorous foreign trade, and contents herself with high tariffs and exclusive dealing, her own citizens must pay the difference through the medium of increased internal taxation. In such a case the North would be doomed to new political and social convulsion.

When, then, the present war is over, the North will feel more than ever the effects of her unfortunate war with the South, and her call will be for statesmen, and not for warriors, if she would avoid the Charybdis which lies before her. Her best friends will be those who counsel her to walk in the paths of peace, and who advise her to make her tariffs in harmony with those of other nations. If peace counsels should prevail—if her citizens resolve on developing the rich resources with which Heaven has blessed their land, already extensive enough for the wants and subsistence of a population as dense as that of China—if they do this, and renounce their ideas of manifest destiny and universal dominion—it is possible that the North may not only become a great nation, but bear its burdens easily and without fear.

LETTERS FROM NEW ORLEANS.

NEW ORLEANS, LOUISIANA: August 16, 1864.

THE DEFENCE OF MOBILE—COLD RECEPTION OF THE FORT GAINES PRISONERS AT NEW ORLEANS—THE PELHAM CADETS—THE TERMS OF SURRENDER OF FORT GAINES—THE POSITION OF FORT MORGAN—CONFEDERATE MOVEMENTS WEST OF THE MISSISSIPPI, ETC., ETC.

MAJOR-GENERAL FRANK GARDNER, who defended Port Hudson so long and so gallantly, has assumed the chief command of the district of the Gulf, headquarters at Mobile. Every 'rebel' of the Crescent City rejoices at his appointment, and the utmost confidence now prevails that Mobile will soon be, if she be not already, in a position to 'laugh a siege to scorn.' It can be more easily defended on the water front than can Charleston, and the defences on the land side are said to be capable of resisting the attack of an army of 50,000 men if the works be fully manned. A sufficient force is now concentrating from Alabama, Mississippi, and Louisiana. There is little apprehension of the force from New Orleans attempting anything beyond the siege of Fort Morgan. It is too small to attempt a demonstration upon the city, though General Granger, who commands, may make feints towards the south-west side. At present his forces are occupied in garrisoning Forts Gaines and Powell, in guarding minor points, and in preparing for the siege of Fort Morgan, which they began to invest in the rear on the morning of the 9th inst. After General Granger had got into position, and the fleet had sent some half-dozen shells into the fort, the following joint demand for its surrender was made through a flag of truce:—

United States Flagship Hartford,
Mobile Bay, August 9, 1864.

Sir,—To prevent the sacrifice of human life, we demand the unconditional surrender of Fort Morgan.

D. G. FARRAGUT, Rear-Admiral.
GORDON GRANGER, Major-Gen. U. S. A.

To Brigadier-General Page, commanding Fort Morgan.

Headquarters, Fort Morgan,
August 9, 1864.

Rear-Admiral D. G. Farragut, U. S. N.:
Major-General Gordon Granger, U. S. A.:

Sirs,—I am prepared to sacrifice life, and will surrender only when I have no means of defence.

I do not understand that while being communicated with under flag of truce the Tennessee should be towed within range of my guns.—Respectfully, &c.,

R. L. PAGE,
Brigadier-General Commanding, C. S. A.

The reply has the ring of the true metal. 'That's so like Dick Page,' said a Federal naval officer to me upon reading the above, and so say all who know him. He certainly means fight, for he is 'prepared to sacrifice life,' as should be every commander similarly placed, unless he be a poltroon or worse, as was the commandant of Fort Gaines. The prisoners of that stronghold have been brought to this city. Their reception by the citizens must have smitten them to the soul, even if they be undeserving of the suspicions entertained of their fealty or courage. A scowl or a cold stare was their only greeting from the citizens; and the ladies, who have sought their highest pleasure in ministering to the wants of the prisoners hitherto brought to this city, feel mortified almost beyond control. They will do nothing for men whom they insist upon regarding as cowards or——well, I'll not repeat it; when ladies are excited, they are apt to be a little too voluble to be just. The following is a list of the officers who were surrendered with Fort Gaines:—

Colonel C. D. Anderson, 21st Alabama. Major C. B. Johnston, 21st Alabama. Major W. R. Brown, P. C. S. A., Texas. Assistant-Surgeon M. W. Du Bose, 21st Alabama, Mobile. Adjutant George Vedener, 21st Alabama, Mobile. Lieutenant R. E. Baker, P. A. C. S. Captain C. K. Sherman, P. A. C. S. Captain J. L. Culpepper, South Carolina. Captain F. W. Smith, 21st Alabama, Sumter county, Alabama. Captain Price Williams, Jr., Pelham cadets, Mobile. Captain M. Crenshaw, Pelham cadets, Mobile. Captain John F. O'Connor, Pelham cadets, Mobile. Captain J. Ernest Meicre, Confederate States marines. Captain A. S. Carrington, 21st Alabama, Mobile. Captain E. P. Spalding, 21st Alabama, Mobile. Lieutenant A. Northrop, 21st Alabama, Mobile. Lieutenant M. McInnis, 21st Alabama, Mobile. Lieutenant J. R. Y. Fendall, Confederate States marines. Lieutenant John F. Toulmin, 21st Alabama. Lieutenant J. L. Dove, Culpepper battery, South Carolina. Lieutenant R. E. Roper, Pelham cadets, Mobile. Lieutenant W. S. Badger, 21st Alabama. Lieutenant O. C. Derrahs, 21st Alabama, Mobile. Lieutenant E. A. Podmetz, 21st Alabama, Marengo county. Lieutenant J. Podmetz, 21st Alabama, Marengo county. Lieutenant M. E. Macartney, 21st Alabama, Mobile. Lieutenant T. N. Macartney, 21st Alabama, Mobile. Lieutenant John L. Rapier, Confederate States marines. Lieutenant T. J. Evans, 1st battery Alabama artillery, Marion. Lieutenant Warren J. Anderson, 1st battery Alabama artillery, Mobile. Lieutenant John M. Battle, 1st battery Alabama artillery, Mobile. Lieutenant Charles W. Sims, Lockhart's battery, New Orleans. Lieutenant G. B. Dantzler, 21st Alabama, Mobile. Lieutenant J. M. Mims, 21st Alabama, Montgomery. Lieutenant W. Demorey, 21st Alabama, Mobile. Lieutenant D. McCullough, 21st Alabama, Mobile. Lieutenant B. F. Allman, 21st Alabama, Mobile. Lieutenant David Woods, Lockhart's battery. Lieutenant M. Burke, 21st Alabama, Mobile. Lieutenant R. Baldwin, 21st Alabama, Mobile. Lieutenant W. H. Andrews, 21st Alabama, Mobile. Lieutenant John M. Danzey, 21st Alabama, Mobile. Lieutenant T. T. Herbert, 21st Alabama, Mobile.

The Pelham cadets compose a battalion of youths of 16 to 18 years of age. Private accounts state that it was the only force on the island (Dauphine) that made any resistance. They fought Granger's forces for three days, and were finally, by sheer dint of numbers alone, driven under the guns of Fort Gaines, outside of which they were forced to remain till the surrender. Colonel Anderson refused to receive them into the fort—why does not appear. So wags the popular tongue upon this unpleasant subject of Fort Gaines. Other stories even more damaging to the Colonel are afloat, but I have no desire to retail the gossip of the town. He may yet give satisfactory reasons for the surrender, but certain it is he made no fight so far as is known here, and this it is that the people cannot get over. According to the Federal accounts, the following were the terms of the surrender of Fort Gaines:—

On Sunday evening, August 7, General Granger had an interview with Admiral Farragut on the flagship Hartford, in relation to Colonel Anderson's proposition to surrender Fort Gaines. The result of the interview was the following reply to the rebel proposition:—

'Sir,—In accordance with the proposal made in your letter of this morning for the surrender of Fort Gaines, I have to say that after communicating with General Granger, in command of our forces on Dauphin Island, the only offers we can make are:—

'First.—The unconditional surrender of yourself and the garrison of Fort Gaines, with all of the public property within its limits.

'Second.—The treatment which is in conformity with the custom of the most civilised nations towards prisoners of war.

'Third.—Private property, with the exception of arms, will be respected.

'This communication will be handed to you by First Captain P. Drayton and Colonel Myer, of the United States Army, who fully understand the views of General Granger and myself.

'Very respectfully, your obedient servants,
'D. G. FARRAGUT, Rear-Admiral,
'GORDON GRANGER, Major-General, U.S.A.

'Colonel C. D. Anderson, commanding Fort Gaines.'

The above was sent off to the fort at a late hour in the evening. Soon afterwards the bearers returned to the flagship, bringing with them Colonel Anderson and a staff officer, when, after a protracted interview with the commanding officers, the terms were assented to in the following terms:—

'The above conditions and terms of surrender are agreed to by the undersigned, and the ceremony of turning over the prisoners of war, Fort Gaines, and all the public property appertaining thereto, intact, and in the same condition it is now, will take place at 8 o'clock A.M. to-morrow, August 8.

C. D. ANDERSON,
'Colonel, 21st Alabama Regiment, commanding Fort Gaines.

'Witnessed—P. Drayton, Fleet Captain; Albert J. Myer, Colonel and Signal Officer, United States Army.'

Doubtless, Fort Morgan is completely invested by this time. Besides the troops from General Granger's command which landed some five miles in the rear, a force of about 10,000 from Pensacola have also crossed towards Mobile Bay. Thus all communication will remain cut off unless General Gardner has a force to spare for the purpose of keeping open communications with the fort. General Page, however, is prepared to fight it out, and has cleared his decks for action by burning all the outbuildings and removing every obstruction behind which the enemy might find shelter in his approaches. The woods, for more than a mile from his outer lines, have also been cleared away. Commodore Farrand has assumed command of the remaining gunboats at Mobile. They consist of the Morgan (ironclad), 5 guns, which escaped; the Baltic (ironclad), 5 guns; the Crescent (cottonclad), 4 guns; and four small steamers carrying 10 guns. It is rumoured that there are four Clyde-built iron steamships, blockade-runners, now at Mobile. If so, they are effectually blockaded, and the best use they can now be put to is to arm and equip them for the Confederate navy. Lieutenant J. H. Comstock, of the Selma, was killed in the naval engagement; Lieutenant-Commander P. W. Murphy, Midshipman J. B. Ratcliffe, and the other officers are prisoners. The following is a list of the officers captured with the Tennessee:—

Admiral, Franklin Buchanan; Commander, James D. Johnson: Lieutenant, Wm. Bradford: Lieutenant, A. D. Wharton; Lieutenant, E. J. McDermot; Master, J. R. De Mahy; Master, H. W. Mervin; Fleet Surgeon, D. B. Conrad; Assistant-Surgeon, B. C. Bowles; First Assistant-Engineer, G. D. Lening; Second Assistant-Engineer, J. O'Connell; Second Assistant-Engineer, John Hayes; Third Assistant-Engineer, O. Benson; Third Assistant-Engineer, W. B. Patterson; Pay-Master's Clerk, J. H. Cohen; Master's Mate, W. A. Forrest: Master's Mate, Beebe; Master's Mate, R. M. Carter; Boatswain, John McCardle; Gunner, H. S. Smith.

All non-combatants are leaving Mobile for the interior, and all the arms-bearing population hitherto exempted from service have organised and armed for cooperation with the regular troops, so that now one of the city papers is able to announce that 'the entire line of works is manned, and even if we get none of the reinforcements that are on the way to the city, it can be held against all the available forces that the enemy can bring against it.' This was said more than a week ago, and since then reinforcements have arrived. Better still, General Gardner has taken command, and his defence of Port Hudson—which fell only because Vicksburg fell, and then was no longer of any use—proves him eminently the right man in the right place. He has remarkable ability for organising defence, has great energy, and the tact of winning the unquestioning and unquenchable devotion of his men. Besides, he is one of the best engineer officers in the Confederate service.

The movements of the Confederate forces west of the Mississippi and the boldness of the Confederates on this side are a puzzle, I have no doubt, to General Canby. West of the river they continue to threaten Morganzia, Louisiana, a fortified river post of great importance to the Federals in case of future operations up Red River. They are also in strong force in the Teche section; their pickets have approached within sight of the Federal garrisons at Vidalia, Donaldsonville, Plaquemine, Goodrich's Landing (all on the river), the posts on Berwick's Bay, and made feints of attacking each in turn. In East Louisiana the Confederate forces consist mostly of cavalry, from 3,000 to 4,000 strong, and they compel the garrisons of Port Hudson and Baton Rouge to hug their fortifications. Only a few days ago Colonel Jack Scott, who commands this force, visited and took off whatever he wanted from plantations within range of the enemy's guns; but he was scarcely interfered with. The garrisons are too weak, and are composed mostly of negroes. And this is General Canby's dilemma: the reinforcements which he has sent to Virginia and the force sent against Mobile have left him nearly destitute of the means of defence. Indeed, his chief reliance now must be upon the navy. Thus circumstanced, and anticipating a regular attack from the Confederates, but not knowing where it would be delivered, he resorted to the forced enrolment of all able-bodied residents, white and coloured; and such is the emergency that a failure to comply with the order promptly subjects the delinquent to forced labour on the fortifications. All here are looking for immediate offensive movements by General Kirby Smith's forces, but in what quarter none know. If it be feasible, he will doubtless cross the river to engage the column of General A. J. Smith, which is doubtless the one really intended for Mobile. General Forrest has thus far held this column in check, having beaten back its advance twice; and Governor Clark, of Mississippi, has issued his proclamation calling upon all capable of bearing arms to organise for immediate action. They are responding promptly, and going to the front to cooperate with the regular troops. General Smith has reorganised his forces, and made the following changes in the district commanders:—Major-General S. B. Buckner succeeds General Taylor in West Louisiana; Major-General J. B. Magruder takes command in Arkansas, and is succeeded in Texas by Major-General J. G. Walker. Generals Buckner and Walker, like Magruder and Smith, are graduates of West Point.

General Gardner has forbidden to all officers in his department the use of flags of truce except by permission from headquarters. Nor is any flag of truce from the enemy to be received without a like permission. The attack on Vidalia, Louisiana, west bank of the river, on the 22nd ultimo, was by General Polignac, who captured 900 negroes and killed 45 of the garrison. Several torpedoes have lately been found floating down stream in the bayous patrolled by the United States gunboats. The water on the bar is too shallow to allow of the gunboats coming within a mile or thereabouts of the obstructions in front of Mobile. John Robert Murray, Master's Mate of the Confederate States gunboat Selma, and son of Mr. Thomas Murray, a prominent citizen of New Orleans, was among the killed in the recent engagement. The father, who is one among the thousands of refugees from this city now in Mobile, is so devoted to the cause of the South, that, if he had a dozen sons, he would freely sacrifice them on the altar of their country.

Ringgold Barracks has, in addition to Laredo, Brownsville, and Eagle Pass, been designated as a point at which cotton may be exported across the Rio Grande into Mexico, under the regulations hitherto established. Cotton will not be allowed to be exported from any other ports than those designated above. A manufactory of artificial limbs has been opened at Houston, Texas—pretty good evidence of the enterprise of these 'barbarous slave-owners.' The Act of the Confederate States Congress, passed at the late session, 'to organise a corps of scouts and guards to facilitate communication with the Trans-Mississippi Department,' has been carried into effect with complete success. Only the aged and infirm of the registered enemies in this city are being sent across the lines. The first of the able-bodied 'enemies' who reported themselves ready to leave agreeably to orders, were put in prison. The others took the hint, and, without reporting, slipped across the lines between night and morning. Some 500 are estimated to have gone. General Canby's order for all able-bodied citizens to enrol under the stars and stripes will reinforce Mobile to the extent of 1,500 to 2,000.

The desecrated Catholic churches in Northern Virginia, at Jacksonville and St. Augustine (Florida), at Jackson (Mississippi), in Northern Alabama, Tennessee, and in numerous other parts of the South overrun by the enemy, afford melancholy proof of the intense bigotry and Vandal fanaticism of a majority of the Federal soldiery. The Catholics of the North have not been deceived in this matter. There 'Know-nothingism' took its rise, and it was owing to the generous sentiments of the Southern people and the enlightened policy of their statesmen that it did not become a settled and cardinal principle in the general policy of the Republic. Even while the Catholics, native and adopted, were rushing in thousands to the battle-field in 1861, a leading New York journal, the Times, declared that 'Popery, like slavery, was doomed.' And now since the 'fighting Irish' have nearly all been killed off, and the potent voice of the great Archbishop of New York is hushed in death, the mask is thrown off. The saintly Bishop Elder, of Natchez, Mississippi, has been arrested and placed in durance among the Federal negro garrison at Vidalia, Louisiana. He would not comply with the order of the commandant at Natchez to pray for the President of the United States, and this is his only offence. The prayer forms no part of the prescribed devotions of his church, and he was therefore fully justified in refusing compliance with an order interfering with the freedom of religious worship guaranteed by the Constitution and laws of the United States. I beg pardon, for Mr. Thaddeus Stevens, of Pennsylvania, says it is treason to talk now of the Constitution. Natchez is in the archiepiscopal diocese of New Orleans, and perhaps our venerated Archbishop Odin may be the next victim.

FROM AN OCCASIONAL CORRESPONDENT.

NEW ORLEANS: August 13, 1864.

For the past week the public pulse in this city has been much depressed by the late Federal successes at the entrance of Mobile Bay, but begins now to recover its tone after a careful view of the circumstances.

That the immense Federal fleet which made their entrance past Fort Morgan should have succeeded in passing in with the loss of only one vessel, and that from torpedoes only, is not remarkable. That their combined force should afterwards have captured the Confederate ironclad Tennessee and the little wooden gunboat Selma, should have caused the loss of the Gaines and have run off the Morgan, also small wooden craft, is not at all to be wondered at.

The Federal fleet was composed of four double-turreted ironclads of the largest monitor class, and fourteen of the largest wooden regular ships of war in the American navy. At the head of these were the Hartford, Brooklyn, Richmond, and Monongahela, carrying the heaviest metal in the Federal navy. The Tennessee alone could compete with any one of these, and yet she carried only 6 guns to the Hartford's 26 9-inch broadside and 200-pounder pivot-guns, the others being proportionately well armed. The other little Confederate vessels combined could not compete with the weakest of the Federal ships.

Nevertheless, Admiral Buchanan, with a chivalrous courage which must gain him immortal renown, sallied out from under the walls of Fort Morgan, where he was comparatively safe, and attacked the Federal fleet, which had passed beyond the reach of the guns of the fort. David with his sling attacked eighteen Goliahs, and being less favoured than him of old, he fell.

It is the opinion of the Federal officers engaged, and so expressed in the papers, that if the Tennessee had remained at the fort and awaited her opportunity to attack the Federal vessels at a disadvantage, they might have finally been entirely prevented from gaining any advantage by their entry into Mobile Bay. Yet, if Admiral Buchanan had effected his purpose, had destroyed the immense Federal fleet, how transcendent a victory would his have been! The valour and intrepidity which undertook such an enterprise outvies all comparison.

There is much conflicting opinion as to the necessity of the surrender of Fort Gaines. If the Federal story be true that there were provisions there to last a twelvemonth and an abundance of ordnance stores, the readiness with which 800 men surrendered after firing but two shots is by no means favourable to their constancy or courage; but the circumstances, when developed, may show a different state of things. The Federal account says that Colonel Anderson, commanding, declared that the moment the Federal fleet passed in he knew it was all up with him, as the fort had been constructed without defences on the inside towards the bay. If so, the mistake may have been with the engineers and the commanding generals, and not with the post commandant or his subordinates. The prisoners, at all events, are here, but as yet there has been no communication with them. It is satisfactory to know that the garrison of Fort Powell succeeded in getting away, though it is claimed that they left their guns, unhurt, in the hands of the enemy.

It is not believed that Fort Morgan will be so easily taken. Cut off as it is at the present moment from all succour and support, it may be finally starved out, but it will not be yielded up with its stores of ammunition and provision all intact. These will be expended ere it becomes the prey of the spoiler, if he do not, some of these fine days, find himself the unfortunate possessor of an empty nest, the birds flown and their eggs broken and addled. Nay, as impossible things are sometimes done now-a-days, maugre Admiral Buchanan's failure to effect them just now, it may be possible that the garrison of Fort Morgan may outlive all efforts to capture them or it.

Notes on Events of the Week.

AMERICA.

ON August 18, the 5th Federal corps, under General Warren, took possession of a position on the Weldon Railroad, about three miles below Petersburg. In the skirmishing the Confederates lost about 350 killed, wounded, and missing, but captured about 200 prisoners. Next day the Federals were attacked and driven back with a heavy loss in killed and wounded, and the Confederates captured 'over two thousand prisoners, including Brigadier-General Hayes, and a number of stands of colours.' We have no later accounts from the South, but according to the Northern accounts Warren was reinforced, and regained the position on the Weldon Railroad, and up to the 25th resisted all the efforts of the Confederates to dislodge him. Grant's cavalry was said to be operating on the Danville Railroad.

There has also been severe fighting at Deep Bottom, and it is stated by the Northern correspondents that Grant's losses for the week on the Weldon Railroad and at Deep Bottom were 12,000.

On August 21, the Confederates defeated Sheridan near Charlestown, and drove him to Harper's Ferry, with the loss of 1,000 men. There are reports that General Lee has decided to make a northward movement, and that a part of Early's forces were across the Potomac.

THE Confederates were holding Sherman in check before Atlanta. Hood has been largely reinforced. The Confederates under General Wheeler cut the Chattanooga and Knoxville Railroad, near London, on the 21st.

THE official despatches of Admiral Farragut contain the correspondence in reference to the surrender of Fort Gaines. Colonel Anderson proposed the surrender. The steamer Nashville has been sunk across the channel of Mobile Harbour, so that the city cannot be approached. According to the Richmond Despatch a Federal force from Pensacola was advancing towards Mobile. This force consists of 10,000 men.

ON August 18 a body of Federal cavalry was defeated at Granville, Florida, by Colonel Dickson. The Confederates captured 150 prisoners and one cannon. They rescued 100 negroes kidnapped by the Federals.

General Forrest has made a raid into Memphis, and retired with some booty. The Tallahassee burned twenty-two fishing vessels off the North Cape of Prince Edward's Island on August 25. The Empress, from New Orleans, was fired into at Gaines' Landing, between Vicksburg and Memphis, by a Confederate battery, and it is reported that some of the passengers were killed and wounded.

THE Baltimore correspondent of the New York World, writing on August 19, says that the Southern people expect and are prepared for a long war. After making a large deduction for the losses of the present campaign, he estimates the total effective force of the Confederates at 275,000 men; and adds that, 'by carefully husbanding their strength, by keeping in the field armies of only moderate size, by depending upon discipline and good generalship, and not upon mere brute force, and by a proper system of recruiting, their armies have not only been kept full, but they have, and will have for years to come, a sufficient population to keep on foot a force equal to the above.' As to arms and ammunition, he says: 'There are now at Richmond, Charleston, Savannah, Wilmington, Atlanta, Macon, and at several other places, foundries, and gun manufactories, and arsenals, where cannon, muskets, swords, pistols, gunpowder, cannon-balls, shells, fixed ammunition, percussion caps, &c., are made, as good as any we use, and in quantities sufficient to supply the wants of the Southern armies for years to come. When the town of Rome, in Georgia, was captured by General Sherman some months ago, the evidences of this fact were found in profusion even in that little inland place, and pains were actually taken by the Administration to suppress the facts at the time, because they afforded such strong and incontestable evidence of Southern enterprise, ingenuity, and skill.' Respecting the production of coal and iron, he writes: 'There is scarcely a ridge of mountains in the South where the presence of iron-ore has not been discovered; while in Virginia, Georgia, North Carolina, and Alabama, there are inexhaustible beds of coal. The coal mines in the counties of Goochland, Fluvanna, Cumberland, Buckingham, and Campbell, and the iron mines in the counties of Nelson, Amherst, Bedford, Montgomery, and Franklin, in Virginia, are now being worked to an extent tenfold as great as ever before, and with most remunerative results.'

GENERAL FRANK GARDNER has been appointed to the chief command of the District of the Gulf, which command, a despatch from Mobile says, he assumed on August 17. After the surrender of Port Hudson, General Gardner remained a prisoner in the hands of the Federals until August 4, when he was exchanged. Our New Orleans letter gives full details of the defence of Mobile, and of the military situation in Louisiana.

THE success in running the blockade is not more conspicuous than the daring displayed by the captains of the blockade-runners. On the eve of the fight the Denbigh left Mobile with a cargo of cotton, steamed unmolested through and past the Federal fleet, and arrived safely at her destination. The Mobile papers announce that immediately before the commencement of the fight the Red Gauntlet, with a valuable cargo, ran the blockade and came safely into port.

THE Hudson Gazette gives an account of a private auction at New York on August 1, at which a young negro was sold as a substitute. The Gazette says: 'The lad, who was a good-looking, robust young darkey, was started at $600, and ran up to $1,000, at which sum he was knocked down to a lawyer.'

THERE has been some excitement in New Jersey on the discovery that the Federal army surgeons have been branding recruits. It appears 'that a young man, C. R. Beach, of Rockany, had been drafted and examined by Dr. Whittingham, who pronounced him fit for military duty, and held him to service—the usual time being given to procure a substitute or pay $300 commutation. His township, meanwhile, offered $400 bounty, and Beach concluded to pay his commutation fee and then volunteer for one year, thus making $100 by the operation. Upon being examined, however, by the same surgeon, he was rejected as a volunteer, and branded with a large cross upon his back, the longest mark being about four inches in length, the shortest over three inches, and each half an inch in breadth.' It came out that Dr. Bennett, an assistant of Dr. Whittingham, had branded Michael Lapsley, of Orange, under similar circumstances. The doctors were arrested by the authorities to save them from the personal violence threatened by the enraged citizens, and were afterwards released on parole.

SENATOR WILSON has written a letter to the Boston papers in which he says, 'No public man connected with the Administration is in favour of an armistice.' This denial does not produce any impression, as Republican papers still support the proposition of an armistice. The latest newspapers received from the North represent the peace sentiment as still rapidly developing. The nomination of the Chicago Convention was looked forward to with much anxiety. It is also said that it has been proposed to Mr. Lincoln and to General Fremont that they should withdraw from the Presidential contest, in order that a candidate may be chosen on whom the party can unite. General Fremont will do so if Mr. Lincoln will withdraw.

THE Northern papers report the discovery of a conspiracy in Indiana for taking that State out of the Union. It is said that the Secretary of State, the Attorney-General, and other State officers are concerned in it. If we can credit the reports of Mr. Lincoln's agents, we must conclude that the Union party in the West is a very small minority.

BISHOP M'CLOSKEY, of Albany, has succeeded to the Archiepiscopate of New York, vacated by the decease of Archbishop Hughes. He was installed on August 20 at St. Patrick's Cathedral. The ceremony is described as very grand and impressive. The Archbishop delivered an eloquent and feeling address, beginning and ending with the words, 'Peace be to you.'

WE copy the following from a recent number of the Atlanta Appeal. Comment is needless, but we may observe that Mr. Iverson is a well-known and much-respected citizen. 'A body of Yankees went to the residence of Mr. W. Iverson, who lives about sixteen miles north of Decatur, Georgia, on last Saturday, and, after destroying his effects to their hearts' content, laid hands on his daughter, about sixteen years of age, and, by force, one after another, satisfied their hellish lust. Her father attempted to take her from them. They then set on him with clubs, which soon disabled the old man, and he has not been able to turn himself since, and, in all probability, will die of his injuries. This beautiful and virtuous young lady expired before they left. The Yankees came back next morning and dug a hole near the well in the yard, and put the corpse in and covered it.'

A GENTLEMAN, named Frank W. Willis, was shot in Nashville by a negro soldier, because he was walking within four feet of some military stores. The correspondent of the Chicago Times thus describes the occurrence:—'Willis was at the time outside of the line, but he replied to the guard, "Excuse me, I wasn't aware that I was on your beat," and stepped still closer to the curb-stone. He passed by, and then the nigger deliberately raised his musket and fired. The ball entered the unfortunate man's side and came out in front near the navel. He fell immediately, and the nigger leaned his chin upon his gun and watched the man as coolly as if it were a dog that had been shot, for a few minutes, and then reloaded his gun. Some persons among the crowd that collected took Willis to Hospital No. 19, near by, and had the surgeon in charge examine him. He was then bleeding freely, and the surgeon said it was impossible to save his life. After lingering for two or three hours in great agony, Willis died, a victim to the infernal policy of arming niggers and placing them in positions of trust or importance.' The negro was placed under arrest for a few hours and then released, and resumed his duty as guard. The popular feeling, however, was so strong, that the Federal commander sent away the negro regiment.

THE Atlantic Monthly gives an account of a visit to Richmond of Colonel Jaques and Mr. Gilmore, written by the latter. We suppose the interview with President Davis is not an invention, but it is hardly necessary to remark that the report of a long conversation from memory by a partisan is utterly unreliable. Accuracy is impossible, and a one-sided view is unavoidable; though in this case Colonel Jaques and Mr. Gilmore represent themselves as getting much the worst of the argument. Being asked how peace could be brought about, the President is reported to have replied: 'In a very simple way. Withdraw your armies from our territory, and peace will come of itself. We do not seek to subjugate you. We are not waging an offensive war, except so far as it is offensive-defensive—that is, so far as we are forced to invade you to prevent your invading us. Let us alone and peace will come at once. . . . We are not fighting for slavery. We are fighting for independence, and that or extermination we will have.' Colonel Jaques, according to Mr. Gilmore's account, suggested peace 'with union, emancipation, no confiscation, and universal amnesty.' The Colonel also suggested that, if peace were not made now, the people of the North will insist upon hanging all the Confederate leaders. The President did not deny the bloodthirsty spirit of the genuine Yankees, but replied: 'Well, admitting all you say, I can't see how it affects our position. There are some things worse than hanging or extermination. We reckon giving up the right of self-government one of those things.' Colonel Jaques also said that the Northern people do not yet feel the war. We should not have judged so from the price of gold, the unpopularity of the draft, and the general desire for peace.

MR. STANTON has ordered the release of Mr. Howard, the author of the forged proclamation. Henceforth Mr. Howard will be careful not to anticipate Mr. Lincoln's calls.

ANOTHER difficulty has arisen in reference to Mr. Lincoln's draft. New York and Boston claim to be credited with the men they have contributed to the navy. If this claim were allowed, the former city would be free from the last call.

THE citizens of Kansas and Nebraska are obliged to organise for defence against the Indians, who continue their depredations. Business has been stopped in the principal towns.

A COURT-MARTIAL at Washington has found Ex-Surgeon-General Hammond guilty of peculation in the matter of supplies for the sick and wounded soldiers.

ON August 27, gold was quoted at 250⅝. The improvement in the money market was ascribed to the conviction that the war was nearly over. In anticipation of peace, neither victory nor defeat has much influence on the value of Government securities.

ENGLAND.

VISCOUNT PALMERSTON is as remarkable for his ubiquity as for the diversity of his intellectual and moral talents. His last appearance was as a representative before his constituents, as a jovial guest at a country race dinner in the West of England. Now he comes before the public as a Minister of State paying honour to the memory of a great colleague, and the venue of his performance is laid in the city of Hereford. Lastly he turns up as a tourist revelling in the scenery of North Wales, as a landed proprietor inspecting his slate-quarries and projecting new works and new railways. No one, however, of the incidents of the Premier's vacation so deserves a passing notice as the ceremony over which he presided in the capital of the cider county. Our readers will perhaps remember that the late Sir George Cornewall Lewis, who held successively under Lord Palmerston the offices of Chancellor of the Exchequer and of Secretary of State for the Home Department and for War, represented the county of Hereford in the House of Commons. The inhabitants of the city and county had determined to celebrate the memory of that estimable and patriotic statesman by the erection of a statue to his memory. Having carried out their resolution, they next invited the noble Premier to perform the office of unveiling the statue. Saturday, September 3, was the day fixed for the ceremony, and from all parts the gentry, farmers, and tradespeople gathered to witness the scene, to hear Lord Palmerston speak, and to pay a tribute of respect to the deceased statesman. His Lordship entered the city at noon and was carried in procession amidst the shouts of the people, the peals of bells, the sound of music, and the waving of banners. At St. Peter's Square an address was presented by the Corporation to his Lordship. After the reply, the Premier took up his position on the left of the statue, and the Chairman of the Committee briefly explained the reasons why the county of Hereford had thought fit to commemorate the career of Sir G. C. Lewis. At the close of the speech Lord Palmerston unveiled the statue. It is by Baron Marochetti, and represents Sir George in the act of addressing an assembly. The figure is in bronze, of the height of 7 feet 6 inches. On the pedestal is the following inscription:—'Sir George Cornewall Lewis, a wise and honest statesman, a profound scholar, a kind and warm friend; M.P. for the county of Hereford from 1847 to 1852; chief steward of the city; Chancellor of the Exchequer from 1855 to 1858; Home Secretary from 1859 to 1860; Secretary for War from 1860 to 1863. Born 1806; died 1863.' Lord Palmerston then stood forward to address the meeting. He first commented on the practice of celebrating by posthumous honours the memory of great men, and the principle on which the practice proceeded. It was an expression of admiration agreeable to its authors, and it was an incitement to the living to emulate the greatness of the dead. He then turned to the qualities of Sir G. Lewis as a statesman, a man of learning, and a friend. As a statesman he had discharged with unvaried success the highest duties. In finance he commanded the confidence of the whole mercantile community; as Secretary of State he earned the esteem of all concerned in the departments. In the House of Commons he was bold in the defence of his opinions and his measures, and yet he never converted a political antagonist into a personal enemy. Yet while engaged almost all the active part of his life in the performance of public duties of greater or less importance, and all requiring great devotion and time, he acquired more varied, more extensive, and deeper knowledge of all kinds than has often fallen to the lot even of those who have nothing else to do but apply their minds to its acquisition. Sir George Lewis was one of the most learned men in private life, as well as one of the most active in public duties. His great object was to ascertain truth. The love of truth was a quality possessed by him in a greater degree than by almost any one whom it had been the fortune of the speaker to meet. His career was a career to be imitated by all, even by those who might not possess those qualities which enabled him to arrive at the summit attained by him. Imitation of great excellence, even not resulting in equal distinction, was the course to fit every man to be a useful member of the community, and to earn the goodwill of his companions in life. After the ceremony the noble Lord took luncheon at the palace of the Bishop of Hereford, and then drove to the station. There an immense concourse of people crowded to bid him good-bye, to shake his hand, and to cheer enthusiastically. At all the stations on the line where the train stopped, people had come together to receive him with congratulations.

THE Prince and Princess of Wales, on Thursday last, attended at the renowned Braemar gathering at the Castle of Mar. Crowds of spectators came from all parts of the country to witness the skill and power of the Highlanders at racing, putting the stone, throwing the hammer, tossing the caber, &c. Viscount Macduff commanded the men of Fife, and Captain Farquharson, of the 60th Rifles, was at the head of the Farquharson clan. The men presented a splendid appearance when drawn up in line to receive the royal visitors, the tartans and the long pikes calling up the recollection of a thousand romances of Highland warfare. The Earl of Fife and Colonel Farquharson received their Royal Highnesses, who, in spite of a pouring rain, remained as spectators to the close of the games. In the evening a grand ball was held at the castle, in which the visitors and men of the clans took part. The Prince and Princess of Wales left Abergeldie on Saturday for Dundee, where they embarked for Denmark.

THE house No. 17 in Barbican, in which the poet Milton resided just before his appointment as Latin secretary to Cromwell, is now being demolished to make way for the construction of the Metropolitan Railway from the Victoria Street Station to Finsbury Circus.

THE famous steam ram Scorpion, known to the legal and political world as El Toussom, has just achieved her trial trip. Her example will speedily be followed by the Wyvern, formerly El Monassir. With 200 tons of coal on board, the Scorpion drew 13 ft. forward and 14 ft. 9 in. aft. So excellent were her steering powers that she made a complete circle in five minutes. At full power, with all four boilers at work, the mean of her two runs was 10·490 knots, the engines making 70 revolutions, and the pressure being from 18 lbs. to 20 lbs. At half-power, with two boilers at work, the mean of two runs was 9·745 knots, with 60 revolutions of the engines, and a 15 lb. pressure.

The sister ships have a length on the water-line of 224 ft.; beam, 42 ft. 6 in.; depth, 20 ft.; measurement, about 1,890 tons. Their engines are 350 horse-power. The ordinary hull is of iron, and over this is a coating of 10 in. of teak and armour plates 4½ in. thick. Each vessel carries two turrets, plated with 5½ in. of iron. Each turret is to carry two guns of 12 tons weight. The vessels had suffered some injury from long exposure in the river, but the mischief was speedily repaired under the care and by the vast resources of Messrs. Laird's building-yards.

THE county and borough prisons of England and Wales show a return of 129,527 persons as their inmates at some period or other of the past year. In this calculation those who have been in prison more than once are counted as distinct individuals in each case. Of these 95,000 were males, and again of these male criminals 23,249 were classed as mechanics and skilled workmen, 4,598 as soldiers and sailors, 4,322 as factory workers, 2,538 shopkeepers and dealers, 1,532 shopmen and clerks, 251 in professional employments, and 1,164 domestic servants. The remainder were denominated 'labourers,' or as of no occupation. There were 34,487 females, of whom 16,800 were described as of no occupation. Ireland owned 15 per cent. of the criminals, and yet Ireland has but 3 per cent. of the population of England. Women are clearly less liable to fall into crime than men; but it seems that when once they have taken the fatal step they have less ability to recover their lost position. Indeed, 42 per cent. of the women had been previously convicted, while of the men only 32 per cent. had already suffered punishment. Again, 2,773 of the women had been in prison ten times before; but only 1,173 of the men. About 6 per cent. of the criminals were under sixteen years of age. Happily, however, the efforts at juvenile reformation have been so far successful that the decrease in this class of offenders is conspicuous. Only about 5 per cent. of the whole criminal mass showed any pretensions to skill in reading and writing, while 35 per cent. were utterly incapable of performing the mechanical efforts of knowledge. The case is widely different in convict prisons, the bolder offences against the law being executed by more skilled persons. It may be remarked that, of the 512 convicts in Pentonville Gaol, no fewer than 370 were single men—a fact which speaks volumes for the wholesome restraint of matrimonial responsibility. It is also a curious fact that one half of that body of criminals had been attendants at public worship.

THE operations of the harvest in England, and the demand for labour caused thereby, have detained the Irishmen on this side of the Atlantic, and saved many a stout arm from joining the ranks of the Federal army. The number of emigrants under the Act to the United States for the past month has been 7,188, of whom 6,765 were steerage passengers; while 463 persons sailed in ships not under the Act. 683 persons sailed for Canada, 294 to New South Wales, and 1,097 to Victoria.

THE total value of corn of all kinds imported during the first six months of this year into Great Britain is 6,866,674*l.*, of which 4,811,312*l.* represent the value of the wheat imported. In the first six months of 1863, the value of corn imported was 10,638,591*l.*; and in the first six months of 1862, 12,465,428*l.* For the former year the value of the wheat imported was 5,548,152*l.*, and for the latter year, 8,733,095*l.* Of the wheat imported during the six months of this year, that from the United States was of the value of 1,858,730*l.* The superiority of the harvest in England last year to those of the two preceding years was sufficiently great to check the importation to the extent demonstrated.

CEYLON sent us, in the first six months of this year, 31,123,703 lbs. of coffee; other British possessions, 3,264,180 lbs.; Brazil, 4,626,471 lbs.; Central America, 7,771 lbs.; other countries, 2,041,259 lbs.; making a total of 41,063,384 lbs., the whole quantity exceeding in value one million sterling. The supplies were somewhat less than those of the year 1863, but greater than those of the year 1862.

THE report of the Commissioners of Inland Revenue for the year ending the 31st of March last has been published. The excise duties amounted to 18,409,107*l.*, being an increase of 1,091,711*l.* on the returns of the year 1863. The increase on spirits was 292,808*l.*, and on malt 702,828*l.* In stamps the net receipts were 9,312,916*l.*, being an increase of 346,113*l.* on the receipts for the year 1863. The net returns of the land and assessed taxes were 3,230,054*l.*, being an increase of 86,093*l.* on those of the year 1863. The property and income tax fell from the amount of 10,482,588*l.* in 1863 to 9,101,994*l.*, but inasmuch as the tax was reduced from 9*d.* to 7*d.* in the pound sterling from April 1, 1863, the return is eminently satisfactory. Cotton mills closed during the present stagnation of the trade were exempt from the tax. The latest assessments are those for the year 1862. In the several districts of the metropolis the increase under Schedule D of the value of the profits of trades and professions was very great, exceeding, in fact, 2,200,000*l.* Liverpool, Bradford, Sunderland, and Newcastle shared in this prosperity, but there was a remarkable falling off in Bury to the amount of 156,000*l.*, in Rochdale 113,000*l.*, and in Manchester 80,000*l.*

THE race at Doncaster for the Great St. Leger Stakes founded in the year 1776, when Lord Rockingham led off with Allabaculid, four years before the institution of the Epsom Derby and three years before that of the Oaks, will be contested on Wednesday next, September 14. At the present moment the first favourite for the great event is General Peel, who has within the last week supplanted Blair Athol in popular favour. General Peel, by Young Melbourne, dam by Orlando, the property of Lord Glasgow, won the Two Thousand Guineas Stakes at Newmarket in the spring, defeating Mr. Ten Broeck's Paris in splendid style. This performance, coupled with the magnificent appearance of this truly noble specimen of a race-horse, promoted him to the position of first favourite for the Derby. In that race, however, he succumbed to the superior endurance of Blair Athol; but his brilliant struggle for victory afforded the hope that on the more level plain of Doncaster his grand sweeping stride might work revenge on the stout son of Stockwell and Blink Bonny. General Peel has not run since the Derby, and the desire of his owner for victory is such as would emanate from a true sportsman. The horse was trained during the spring and summer by Thomas Dawson; but after the Derby he was committed to the charge of John Scott, of Whitewall. The odds against the horse are 9 to 4. Blair Athol, against whom the odds are about 11 to 4, ran his maiden race at Epsom, when he secured the blue riband of the turf in a style worthy of the son of Stockwell, the noblest of his kind, and of Blink Bonny, the winner of both Derby and Oaks. His next appearance was at Paris, where he was defeated, to the inexpressible delight of every true Frenchman, by Vermouth. He returned to Ascot and defeated Ely. At York, however, on August 25, he was beaten for the Great Yorkshire Stakes by the Miner, a colt by Rataplan, out of the renowned Manganese, and the property of a 'country parson' and good sportsman. In that race Ely was third, running at even weights with the Miner. Ely, however, conceding 3 lbs., had defeated the Miner two days previously by a head. The odds against the Miner for the Great St. Leger are 9 to 1. Baragah is the next favourite at 11 to 1. He is by Stockwell out of Mowerina, the dam of West Australian, and, as the second string to John Scott's bow, is believed by some of the learned sportsmen to be capable of achieving one of those grand coups by which the Wizard of the North has become immortalised. The odds of 100 to 6 are laid against Ely, an admirable horse, by Kingston out of the Bloomer, and the winner of the Prince of Wales Stakes at Ascot. Of the rest, John Scott has another string in Claremont, by De Clare, the property of Mr. Bowes, the winner of the Great Northern St. Leger, but probably destined to be content with one such prize. The odds against this horse are 33 to 1. These are the horses in whom the prospect of victory may seem to reside. Prophecy is not our province. The stout heart of Blair Athol may prevail over the more speedy General Peel, and it is not without reason that the public is induced to think that the Miner must succumb to the valour of both. It is difficult to conceive that Baragah is able to overthrow his stable companion, and Ely may be supposed to have had enough racing already during the season. The men of Yorkshire would hail Lord Glasgow's triumph with much delight, but the state of the betting is enough to show that it is no easy matter to choose between the prowess of General Peel and the stoutness of Blair Athol.

MÜLLER, the alleged murderer of Mr. Briggs, was arrested at New York on August 24. He protests his innocence, and declares that he purchased the hat and watch found on him (said to be those taken from Mr. Briggs) in London. It was supposed that he would be immediately surrendered by the authorities, and that he would be brought over to this country by the steamer due the end of the week. It was possible, however, that formal difficulties might cause some delay.

CAPE OF GOOD HOPE.

The Dean of Cape Town, the Archdeacon of the Cape, the Archdeacon of George, the colonial Chaplain, the Principal of the Diocesan Collegiate School, and about sixty resident clergymen, missionaries, and principals of colleges, have addressed a protest in reference to Bishop Colenso to the Metropolitan and the Bishops of the Church in South Africa. The protest sets forth that 'the undersigned having understood that there was a probability that Bishop Colenso would return to Natal and attempt to resume the exercise of episcopal functions in that diocese, notwithstanding his deposition from his office by the Metropolitan, did thereby enter their protest against any such attempt on the part of Bishop Colenso, and did declare that they could not recognise him as a Bishop of that Church, or hold communion with him in case of his return.'

In an answer to this protest, Bishop Colenso derides his adversaries as styling themselves as 'of the Church in South Africa,' and not of 'the Church of England.' He points out that the influences usually brought to bear in the obtaining of signatures to such documents destroy their value; and he remarks that three of the clergy were but catechists a year ago, men of limited education, and merely ordained to meet the urgent necessities of a colonial diocese. The Bishop further affirms that one missionary was threatened with expulsion by the metropolitan in case of a refusal to read 'the so-called sentence of deposition.' The Bishop then subjoins a list of those clergymen who have not protested—who, no doubt, were unwilling to anticipate Her Majesty's decision on the case, or to renounce 'the Church of England' with its laws and liberties for 'the Church of South Africa.'

INDIA.

The Official Gazette contains Sir Charles Trevelyan's minute on the introduction of gold currency into India. The proposal to adopt the English sovereign as a legal tender for 10 rupees has been sanctioned by the Governor-General in Council, and awaits the approval of the Secretary of State.

The report that the Ameer had been treacherously captured by his brother Afzul Khan is unfounded. The combatants, in fact, have come to terms, and it was expected that Afzul Khan would accompany his brother to Cabul.

The telegraph line between Deesa and Erinpoora was completed, and that between Ajmeere and Sojut was in a forward condition.

The Amber Witch had been despatched from Bombay to pick up the broken cable of the Persian Gulf line.

The Governor-General will leave Simla for Lahore early in October, and will return to Calcutta in November.

A great impulse had been given to trade by the news of peace being probable between Denmark and the German Powers. Three fresh banks had been started in Bombay since the departure of the last mail.

THE CONTINENT.

FRANCE.

ONE of the most magnificent relics of the pious and liberal ages which we usually call 'dark' was the Abbey of Cluny, in Burgundy, belonging to the order of St. Benedict; it possessed a revenue of 120,000*l.* a year, and had 600 religious houses dependent on it. The abbot's residence in Paris was a palace, erected on the site of an old Roman villa, not far from the present Panthéon. Of all the splendours of this ancient house there remains now nothing but the name; the Musée Cluny, a collection of the most remarkable Gallic and early French relics, and of many interesting memorials of the age of Francis I., assembled within the walls of the quondam abbatial palace in the capital, is all that is now left to remind us of the proud abbey. The mother abbey was thoroughly rebuilt in 1750 on a magnificent scale; the parks and gardens belonging to it were worthy of a sovereign's residence; the church of the abbey might have been a cathedral. 1789 came, and with it the Revolution; the monks were expelled, the church almost entirely destroyed, the abbey itself completely gutted; the walls alone were left standing, being strong enough to defy the revolutionary hammer. It is now proposed to restore this building to life, by turning it to a use that shall be somewhat analogous to that to which it was once consecrated. It is to be the central establishment of the training colleges of France, the expenses of which will be defrayed by a fund now raised in each department for the same purpose, though on a more restricted scale. The agricultural pupils of the college will have the opportunity of putting their theories into practice on the large domains around the old abbey. The monks' dormitories will accommodate 300 pupils, even with the enlarged ideas of modern times on ventilation. Of the church, one transept is still left, which, with a little restoration, will form a worthy chapel for the institution. Thus an ancient and illustrious house, whose name belongs to the history of modern civilisation, will be restored to an intellectual life not unworthy of the intentions of its first founders.

M. and Mme. d'Erlanger, having been civilly divorced by the tribunal of Frankfort, required the sanction of the Church for their separation. An advocate was employed in Rome to plead before the cardinals, the judges of the congregation. The usage of this court is that the advocates for the parties shall plead before each of the twenty cardinals separately in the Latin language, after which the body of the tribunal assemble and exchange ideas on the subject. This laborious process usually occupies several years. In this instance it has been satisfactorily concluded in only ten months, and the requisite bull of divorce has been granted. The French papers now announce that the divorced wife, Mlle. Lafitte, is about to be married to M. Cordier, Conseiller d'État.

The owners of balloons have not been very fortunate this year. The English aeronaut, Mr. Coxwell, saw his balloon destroyed by the bacchanals of Leicester. M. Nadar, of French renown, has been obliged to bring an action against MM. Godard, the constructors of his monster balloon, for 'cabbaging' some 800 or 900 square yards of silk. It appears from the statement of the prosecutor that he delivered to them 6,837 yards of silk for the formation of his balloon. When it was finished he had it measured by a skilful mathematician; and lo! nearly 1,000 yards of silk were unaccounted for. The two brothers Godard were condemned to six months' imprisonment and 100 francs' fine for the embezzlement, besides 8,425 francs damages for the loss of the property.

At the banquet given to the King of Spain at San Sebastian, specimens of all the best wines of France, Burgundy, Champagne, Médoc, and Sauterne, were produced, in order to give the royal guest an idea of the excellence of the French vine. The King, who, as it appears, sticks to his port, did not show himself very enthusiastic about any of them, until he tasted the Sauterne, of the growth of Pichard-Lafaurie, 1858. So struck was he with this, that he straightway desired to take a couple of pipes of it home with him. Unluckily there was only half a pipe left, for which he paid the neat sum of 240*l.*, being at the rate of about 1*l.* a bottle in the wood. The only French wine which has lately approached so high a price was the tun of Château d'Yquem, for which the Grand-Duke Constantine of Russia paid 800*l.* in 1859.

The Emperor, accompanied by Prince Napoleon, Prince Humbert of Italy, and the Prince Imperial, visited the camp at Chalons on the 30th ult. He was received with the usual illuminations, festivities, and grand reviews. The illuminations were especially good, as an allowance of money had been made to the camp to be devoted to this special purpose, and it was therefore a point of honour with each corps not to be surpassed in an effective disposition of their allotted sum. As described by the correspondent of a French journal, the display thereby occasioned put to shame even the splendours of Parisian illuminations. The evening was closed by the ever-interesting tattoo-beating by torchlight. At eight o'clock the bands, drums, and trumpets of every division in the camp assembled before the Emperor's tent. The evening gun was fired, and instantly they all burst forth into music; after remaining in their position for a few minutes, they defiled off, division separating from division, then brigade from brigade, and finally battalion from battalion, each with its own accompaniment of torch-bearers. The sight of the streams of fire continually splitting up into smaller rivulets, and the sound of the bugles dying away in the distance on every side, is described as something quite unique in military effect. On the following day a review was held, at which the Emperor with all his illustrious guests was present. In the evening they all appeared quite unexpectedly at the camp theatre, and enjoyed the rough military jokes to the full.

Few regulations are a cause of so much vexation to the community as the by-laws of the railway companies against smoking; they are often an insufficient protection to the non-smoker, and always a source of annoyance, if not of extortion, to the smoker. In France, by-laws of the same nature have long existed, but the general habit of the public and of the officials has been to ignore them; and smoking has been so generally connived at, that those who dislike the weed have a serious grievance. In consequence of the many complaints made to the Administration on the subject, a very sensible circular has been published by M. Béhic, Minister of Public Works, addressed to the various railway companies. He first observes on the existence of the by-law, then on the regular infraction of it; and he draws the conclusion that it would be absurd to insist on a law so entirely contrary to the wishes of the people. He therefore suggests that it should never be enforced except upon the actual complaint of a traveller annoyed by smoking, and then that it should be made to operate with the greatest stringency.

DENMARK.

At a recent sitting of the Landsthing, the President of the Council stated that the Government, while desirous of the negotiations being brought to a close as early as might be, would endeavour to save as much of Slesvig as possible, and at the same time to preserve the political and national independence of those parts of the country irretrievably lost. Herr von Bluhme added that success in this respect was uncertain, that he had little hope, and that all the means that could be made use of had already been employed.

The political committee of the Volksthing recommends the adoption of the following resolution:—'The Volksthing expresses its confidence that in concluding peace the Government will support the natural and sacred right of the populations to determine their own future by means of free voting by districts or by communes.'

The Conferences at Vienna are at a standstill. The delay is still attributed to the Danish representatives. A good deal of grumbling is heard, and broad hints have already been given that, unless some sort of basis for discussion is speedily found, the Germans will give notice of the resumption of hostilities on the 15th inst. According to the terms of the armistice, six weeks' notice must be given of a resumption of arms. The Prussian journals state very pointedly that no troops will be removed from Jutland until peace is actually concluded.

GERMANY.

It is not very easy to understand the present state of the Austro-Prussian alliance. That it stood firm so long as the armies were in the field opposed to an enemy is very intelligible; that the respective parties should have discovered that their interests must clash at certain points is also a matter which need create no surprise. But when we find general expressions of the warmest confidence qualified by the enumeration of a mass of details on which there is disagreement—when again we find in one official statement a declaration of perfect and unreserved unanimity, and in another a sentence of the haughtiest remonstrance addressed to the same Power—we may fairly be puzzled to find a clue to the imbroglio. The official journals continue to assert that the concord between Austria and Prussia with regard to the conduct of the war and the consequent negotiations is complete. Yet in the choice of a candidate for the sovereignty of the Duchies, in the management of the army of occupation, in the formation of the temporary Government, and in the settlement of the destinies of those territories, it appears that there is a most perfect disagreement. Again, while on this subject the understanding between the two parties is supposed to be perfect, Herr von Rechberg has not been slow, in addressing the Prussian Government on another matter, to speak in almost comminatory terms. The subject of the despatch is the entrance of Austria into the Zollverein on the terms of the new Franco-Prussian treaty. The Austrian Minister stipulates for certain conditions, and concludes by saying: 'If the Prussian Government refuses to accept our proffered negotiations, we shall most unwillingly be forced to see in such conduct a breach of their treaty obligations towards us; and we could not but see that such a proceeding would be utterly incompatible with the relations of federal amity which exist between the two Governments.'

The Baden races took place on the 1st instant. The weather was not very favourable; in fact, they were inaugurated by a pelting morning's rain. However, the company was both numerous and illustrious, including the King and Queen of Prussia, Prince Charles of Prussia, the Prince and Princess of Hesse, the Archduke Victor of Austria, the Crown Prince of Wurtemberg, the Duke of Hamilton, the Duc de Morny, &c. Five races were run on the first day, of which we need only particularise one as likely to interest English or foreign readers—that, namely, known as the 'Continental St. Leger' of 400*l.*, added to an entrance of 20*l.*, half forfeit, for three-year-old colts and fillies, the second to receive 60*l.* out of the stakes, weight 8 stone 2 lbs.; horses born and trained on any part of the Continent out of France allowed 6 lbs.; distance about 1 mile and 7 furlongs. Twenty-three horses were engaged for this event, but the appearance of the dreaded Fille de L'Air and Vermouth reduced the affair to a match between these two. On the fall of the flag, Vermouth went away with a slight lead, which he lost, however, by hugging the outside of the circular racecourse too closely. He regained his position when about a quarter of a mile from home, and the two then raced in. A fine struggle ensued, in which the mare was successful by a head, Vermouth's condition not being exactly suited for so hard a fight.

BELGIUM.

We have before spoken of the constitutional difficulty which lately occurred in Belgium in consequence of the refusal of the Conservatives to make up a quorum in the House of Representatives. This conduct on the part of the Opposition was caused by a motion brought forward by a Liberal, M. Orts, for the immediate augmentation of the members both of the Senate and of the Chamber, although the period fixed by the Constitution for the revision of their numbers had not then come round. The Liberals having now obtained a clear majority in the House by the late elections, M. Orts has again brought forward his motion; but the consideration of it has been adjourned, by the consent of both sides of the House, for an indefinite period. On the 3rd inst. M. Coomans, a Conservative, asked the Government a question on the subject of the foreign legion formed in Belgium to accompany the Empress of Mexico to her new dominions. He also proposed a resolution expressive of the regret of the House that the Belgian Government had authorised the formation of a corps destined for a foreign service. This question and the accompanying resolution were singularly embarrassing to the Government, who were very nearly forced to plead guilty to the charge. At last a sort of compromise was effected by the passing of an order of the day taking especial notice of the declaration of Government that it had neither taken part nor would hereafter take part in the formation of any such corps. In the course of the debate the Minister of War was obliged to confess that out of the 74,000 men of whom the Belgian army is composed there were over 16,000 deserters.

A Catholic Congress has been held at Malines, at which many of the chiefs of the Ultramontane party, both in France and Belgium, were present. The Bishop of Orleans, in his address to the Congress, stated that his visit was occasioned by the deplorable defeat of the clerical party in the elections in Belgium. 'The hour of adversity,' he said, 'is the hour for salutary counsels, generous resolutions, and faithful friendships.' His address was devoted to the subject of popular education. The sole idea which he enforced upon the audience was, that secular education was not only indissolubly connected with religious, but that it must always be communicated by the priesthood. One of the speakers at the Congress, who was received with very great enthusiasm, urged that a great nationality of faith ought to be organised in the world, of which Rome should be the centre, the heart, and the head. Differences of race, or the rights of kings, were of no importance: the sole sovereign should be, he said, the Pope.

In spite of the objection which the good burghers of Antwerp feel to fortifications, a vote of 5,000,000 francs towards completing a new line of defences around their city has been carried by 54 to 48 votes in the Chamber of Deputies.

SWITZERLAND.

The riots at Geneva have not yet settled down. Arrests continue to be made, and fresh troops have been despatched from Berne for the preservation of public order. Among the persons arrested are M. Fontanel, formerly State Councillor, and M. Fazy, the leader of the Radical party and the prime mover of the late violent scenes. The latter gentleman has, in consequence, thought it advisable to leave his country. He has addressed a letter to a local journal, saying that he has been forced to retire in consequence of threats of assassination, but that he will continue to observe the movements of the party of reaction.

The Federal Council of Switzerland have declared valid the election of M. Chenevière, the annulment of which by the Bureau of Election caused the late disturbances.

ITALY.

The envoy sent to the Italian Court by the Emperor Maximilian has presented his credentials, and was very favourably received by the King. This fact has caused some heartburnings among the thin-skinned journalists of Vienna, who are indignant that an Austrian Archduke should, in his capacity as Emperor of another country, acknowledge a kingdom which the Emperor of Austria still refuses to recognise. They also foresee grave difficulties in the adjustment of the religious question in Mexico, now that the Emperor has sent a Minister to the Power which has bereft the Holy See of its most valuable temporal possessions. There are other writers, however, who are fully aware of the absurdity of these views, and who have completely exposed them; showing that the late Archduke Maximilian can no longer be considered to have any identity of interest with the Empire of Austria, and that in any case the recognition of Italy by Mexico cannot be a matter of the smallest moment either one way or the other to the Austrians.

SPAIN.

The journals of Cadiz, Valencia, and Barcelona advise the Government to erect a fortress in the Chincha Islands, saying that they are the legitimate property of Spain.

We extract the following curious story, which tends to weaken our confidence in the perfection of that civilisation on which Spain has been lately complimented. An officer, rejoicing in the title of 'Inspector of Vigilance,' Pedro Plaza by name, received a visit from a gentleman who offered him the sum of 12,000 piastres to connive at the accomplishment of a certain act for which the assistance of some person in authority was required. The proposal was simply to murder a certain rich and childless old man, after first extracting from him a will in favour of the perpetrators of the crime. The Inspector of Vigilance determined to probe the affair to the bottom; he therefore agreed to the proposition, and had several interviews with one Ibarrola, the principal agent in the plot, in the course of which the names of all the persons concerned were revealed to him. When he had discovered everything, he ordered the whole party to be arrested; ten persons were captured, tried, and condemned to various terms of imprisonment.

RUSSIA.

Scarcely had the Russian fleet arrived in Cronstadt from its cruise in the Atlantic, before the officers belonging to it received orders from the Emperor to present themselves to General Cassius Clay, the American representative, and thank him for the brilliant reception given to the Russian squadron in the ports of the United States. Mr. Clay, in answer, said that he was proud to express the sentiments of esteem and admiration felt by the American people for the Emperor Alexander, 'the liberator of his people and the comforter of humanity.' Mr. Henry Burgh, Secretary of Legation, then explained what the sympathies are which unite so warmly the Federal States of America with Russia: 'they arise,' he said, 'from the fact that Russia and the United States are both walking in the same path, that of true civilisation.' On this extraordinary explanation we refrain from commenting: we are content to present it to our readers in its native brass.

THE PRINCIPALITIES.

The Prime Minister of Prince Couza has addressed a circular to the prefects, informing them that the amnesty lately granted to all political offenders must be so understood with regard to foreigners as to make them subject to immediate expulsion from the Principalities should they be found to be either interfering in internal politics or conspiring against foreign States. The chief cause for this modification of the amnesty is that emissaries of M. Mazzini and the revolutionary party in Europe have made Bucharest the headquarters for their projected invasion in favour of Poland. The people have presented an address to the Prince assuring him of their confidence and thanking him for his favours.

MADAGASCAR.

A fresh revolution has taken place in Madagascar; the Prime Minister Rainivounanihitriony has been displaced and, as some say, assassinated. This gentleman was the principal actor in the revolution which aided in the fall of King Radama II.; he has been succeeded in office by his brother Rainilairivouny. Raharla, the most enlightened man in Madagascar, has been installed at Tamatavi as governor; whereupon, say the French journals, the English Consul, Mr. Pakenham, immediately demanded the assistance of a man-of-war. It must be remembered that for some unknown reason the French nation has always chosen to impute to England every sinister motive and every unprincipled manœuvre in the extension of its influence in that island. They refuse to see that the cause of civilisation is absolutely ruined by the mistaken rivalry that they have chosen to create between the two countries.

FIGHTING ON THE NORTH SIDE OF THE JAMES RIVER.

The Richmond Examiner of August 17 gives the following particulars of the operations on the north of the James until that date. It will be observed that the unfortunate negroes are still driven to the front, and that they have been fearfully cut up:—

Five miles west of Deep Bottom, and nearer the city, is Chaffin's Bluff. From Chaffin's Bluff we have a line of works and defences which runs almost due north to the Chickahominy, at New Bridge. After leaving Chaffin's this line of defences crosses first the Osborne Road, then the Central or Darbytown Road; then, five miles further north, the Charles City Road; then the Williamsburg Road; and, lastly, the New Bridge Road. The Osborne Road, which may be said to be a continuation of Main Street, runs south-east from Richmond, following the course of James River. The New Market Road branches off from the Osborne Road two miles below the city, and runs to New Market, a mile and a half north of Deep Bottom. The Williamsburg Road leaves the city at Fulton's Hill, a point about three hundred yards north of the exit of the Osborne Road, and runs due east from the city to Bottom's Bridge, over the Chickahominy, and thence to Williamsburg. Two miles from the city the Darbytown road strikes off to the right from the Williamsburg Road, and runs by a south-east direction into the New Market Road a mile below Deep Bottom. Two miles further down the Williamsburg Road the Charles City Road also branches off to the right, and, at a point fourteen miles east by south of the city, runs into a cross road known as the Quaker Road, which leads from Turkey Bend, on James River, northwardly across Malvern Hill and White Oak Swamp Bridge to Bottom's Bridge.

On the Charles City Road, six miles from the city, and just beyond our outer works, is a point known as the White Tavern. This point, on Sunday and Monday, was the extreme left of our line. The enemy's dismounted cavalry on Monday moved up this road in heavy force. Our cavalry met them below the White Tavern, and about 10 o'clock A.M. a fight began, which lasted until late in the evening. In the course of the day we drove the enemy back about two miles, in the direction of Deep Bottom and Charles's Neck. Late in the evening, as we were pressing the enemy's cavalry, we came upon his infantry, who in turn forced us back about half a mile, when night put an end to the fight.

Early yesterday morning the enemy again advanced up the New Market Road, this time with cavalry, artillery, and infantry. His cavalry force was heavier than on the previous day, and his infantry, so far as ascertained, consisted of the Second, Ninth, and Tenth Corps, numbering together not less than 40,000 men. About 7 o'clock A.M. this immense force struck our cavalry and drove them back into our earthworks. Here our cavalry and a small force of our infantry held them in check for a considerable length of time, during which the enemy made several fierce assaults in heavy columns, the devoted negro troops of Burnside leading in every charge. The slaughter of negroes in these assaults exceeded anything that occurred at Petersburg on the memorable July 30. This was an unequal contest. The enemy's line overlapped us on the left, while they still engaged all of our attention by hurling heavy masses on our front. We were at length flanked on our left, and the enemy drove us from our position, taking, it is said, about a mile of our works. The fight was, however, kept up by our retiring forces until the arrival of reinforcements, when, after a desperate and bloody battle, we drove the enemy from our entire line. The battle proper began about 8 o'clock A.M., and was waged with varying fury until 4 o'clock in the evening.

The enemy's loss in this battle was very great, as we learn from a number of sources. We have heard no estimate of our loss. Brigadier-General Chambliss is reported to have been wounded and taken prisoner in the first onslaught of the enemy.

[Richmond papers of later dates announce that General Chambliss was killed.]

A Roman Catholic Bishop banished.—The Cincinnati Enquirer furnishes the following extract from a private letter, dated July 27, received in that city, respecting the arrest and transportation of the Catholic Bishop at Natchez, Mississippi, because he would not pray for Mr. Lincoln:—'You are aware that some time ago there was an order issued here for all the clergy to read prayers for the President of the United States in their respective churches on every Sunday, under pain, if not complied with, that the offenders were to be sent out of their lines, and their churches closed and taken possession of by the military. This order caused some correspondence between the Bishop and the General. Of course the Bishop could not comply with the order; the result was an order issued, yesterday, banishing the Bishop from Natchez, and requiring him to report by twelve o'clock to the Provost Marshal at Videlia, where he is to remain until the matter is heard from Washington. That part of the order that closes the church is, by order of the General, suspended. The church is opened, as usual. I went to see the Bishop early in the morning. I never witnessed such a sight as when the orphans came to bid their father good-bye. About eleven o'clock, the Bishop, Father Gremie, and Father Charles, got into a carriage, and Mr. Quigles, Mr. Owen, and myself stepped into another, and drove down to the ferry. When we reached Mr. Grant's store, I was surprised to see all the ladies, old and young, waiting for the Bishop to take a last farewell. We got to the ferry, but the boat was not over; so the ladies had time to get to the landing. They all gathered around the Bishop, and when the boat came and rang her bell to leave, they all fell on their knees, and for the last time, the poor Bishop gave them his blessing. Oh, I wish you could have witnessed that scene. I cannot describe it. We then got on the boat, and the Bishop reported to the Provost-Marshal. He was assigned quarters at the hotel for the present, until other quarters can be provided. The Bishop is to have the full freedom of the city of Videlia, but not to go out of the lines. He is not to hold other than verbal intercourse with any one.'

Shipbuilding on the Clyde.—The shipbuilding trade of the Clyde continues to show considerable briskness. During the past month several orders have been received for large vessels, in addition to a number of small steamers. The number of blockade runners being built is almost incredible, no fewer than seven having been launched last month. The total number of vessels launched during August was 22 of 17,000 tons, against 16 vessels of 13,000 tons on the corresponding month of last year.—Scotsman.

M'CLELLAN AS A CANDIDATE.

To the Editor of The Index.

New York: August 20, 1864.

Sir,—The friends of General M'Clellan at New York made on Wednesday the 10th their long-prepared demonstration to promote his Presidential prospects. The condition of public affairs and the state of the public mind towards the Administration combine with the political distractions among its own partisans to give transcendent importance with the Opposition to the nomination to be made at Chicago on the 29th. The chances of overthrowing Mr. Lincoln and his party have recently improved so much, that the sanguine among his adversaries are declaring that it only needs the judicious selection as a candidate of one who can unite all the elements of opposition upon one ticket to insure success. This may be true, although I do not see it quite so clearly yet; but in that selection of a candidate lies a supreme difficulty which may disappoint all their hopes. The union of the Opposition may be defeated by the ambition of impracticable candidates or the attempt to purchase success by compromises, which would make it valueless, and therefore discourage efforts. The near approach of the time for the nomination gives great activity to the operations of those who are striving to get control of the Convention for a favourite candidate or theory, and among these the most busy are the partisans of General M'Clellan. The extent and costliness of the machinery they have put in motion to produce an outside pressure in his favour on the Convention is a very suggestive sign that they are assured of the result. No name but his has been pressed with any concert or industry. Indeed, with the exception of M'Clellan's, there has been no persistent agitation of the name of any man for the nomination. The Convention has been appointed without previous pledges, to any extent worth mentioning, or instructions in favour of any individual. M'Clellan has been thought, up to a recent period, to be so largely the favourite that his nomination was conceded to be all but certain. Of late, however, there has been so manifest a change in the aspects of the war and the war questions, and in the popular disposition towards peace, that the prospects of General M'Clellan have sensibly declined, and these extraordinary efforts have been made necessary to strengthen him by bringing to bear upon the Convention a great outside influence supposed to represent a great public opinion. The meeting in Union Square was one of these demonstrations. It has been in preparation a long time, and was got up under the auspices of party leaders, who understand well the methods for drawing together large public meetings; and this was certainly a great success in the numbers which it gathered, and the popular response which it elicited to the political addresses of the orators. Very few of the prominent public men whose names were announced as among the speakers for M'Clellan attended; but there was a great deal of oratory to a very large and well-satisfied multitude, who applauded with incessant and enthusiastic cheers every denunciation of the Administration and of the President.

The undeniable success of the whole movement was in the astounding proofs which it elicited of the popular detestation of Mr. Lincoln and his party. The friends of M'Clellan understood this well when they contrived to bring out his name before the people on an occasion when indignant masses would be sure to come up in thousands and tens of thousands to express their abhorrence of the misrule, and corruptions, and tyranny of the last three years. It was essentially an Opposition meeting, to which the praises and prospects of M'Clellan were with the great multitude secondary means for helping them to express their abhorrence of the ruling powers at Washington, and to find the means of deliverance. There was one part of the proceedings in which I am sure very few of those present concurred, if, indeed, they understood the covert meaning of the words employed. In one of their resolutions urging the friends of M'Clellan to hold meetings everywhere, with a view of urging his name upon the Chicago Convention, they are invited to be active in securing his nomination by the 'approaching Convention,' or 'by the people.' This has given offence, as containing a threat to the Convention of running M'Clellan as an independent candidate of the 'Conservative' Opposition, and not of the Democratic party, if he shall not be preferred at Chicago. It has a look of attempted dictation which is resented by that class among the opponents of Mr. Lincoln—very numerous, if not already a majority—which sees in the political position of General M'Clellan strong grounds for resisting his nomination as one unfit to be supported by men who are sincerely anxious for the restoration of peace. This feeling is not at all mollified by the expressions of several of the speakers, in which opposition to the nomination of General M'Clellan is treated as revolt against the decision of the people and criminal connivance at the reelection of Mr. Lincoln—as though the friends of M'Clellan expected an unlimited acquiescence in his nomination, which they are not prepared to give, on their own part, to any other candidate the Convention may select. At the same time, they manifest a great apprehension that the Convention will not nominate their favourite.

Much allowance is to be made for the heat of partisans, who, in the zeal for the advancement of favourites, utter many hasty words and use threatening and denunciatory phrases, which pass away when the necessity for unity in action arises; but there is an essential and radical ground of difference between the personal adherents of M'Clellan and his opponents which is not so easily to be passed over; for in the opinion of a very large portion of the Opposition party, for whose votes M'Clellan is a candidate, his success might not accomplish the principal object of their desire for which success would be valuable. He is by his record a War Democrat, not only as a general who has led the Federal armies in many bloody battles against the South, and in that capacity aided the Administration by his counsel and with his active cooperation in the yet unforgiven deed of despotism when the Legislature of Maryland was forcibly suppressed, and the members who were the objects of suspicion to the Lincoln Government were seized and put into military dungeons, but as a civilian who continues to insist on the return of the Southern States into the Union as the indispensable condition on which alone he would be willing to make peace. He represents the War Democracy, who oppose Lincoln's Administration at all points except that one, that the Southern States must be brought back into the Union at all costs. Unlike Mr. Lincoln, the War Democrats are very liberal in their promises to the South of what they intend to do if successful. They are willing to undertake what every rational man knows to be impossibilities, in return for which they ask what are equally impossibilities. They are ready to undertake a general restoration of all that has been destroyed since the advent of Lincoln into power—the old Union, the old Constitution, State sovereignty in its full vigour, the rights and liberties of the citizen, secure again as they were once thought to be under the old order of things—and propose to ask the Southern States to enter with them into this happy state on the faith of their promises, contented as though they had not quitted the Union, at that very point, as no longer endurable, and set up another government as necessary to their safety and happiness! If the Southern States refuse to accept these overtures and to return into the Union—whether from the fixed resolve to maintain their independence, the rooted distrust of the faith of the North, or the knowledge which they have of the utter incapacity of the Democrats to keep their promises, even if they were made with absolute sincerity of intention—it is the declared purpose of the War Democracy to compel them to return. It agrees, in this at least, with Mr. Lincoln, that the unity of government must be preserved. Peace without Union is pronounced to be a dishonourable peace, the idea of which is not to be tolerated. Interminable war, to the utter subjugation of the South, is accepted, with all its consequences upon the North itself, as preferable to any peace on the basis of separation.

These are well understood to be, and certainly they have been until recently, the views of General M'Clellan himself; and they are found to be expressed in substance in the speeches of nearly all his prominent supporters, and must be taken, until a distinct change of opinion and an emphatic pledge of some substantial change of purposes is authoritatively made known, to be the view he will carry into the administration of the Government if he should be elected President. If he cannot have a union of consenting States, he will enforce with the sword a unity of government over vassal States.

But there is a great growing and earnest peace party in the North which will accept no such dogma. They are not less Union men in wish than the War Democrats, if they are less hopeful in war as the means of reunion. But they do not desire a Union of blood, and they see nothing but protracted and unavailing agony for the people of both sections—nothing but the union of their own government and the destruction of their own liberties—in the prosecution of this fratricidal war on any pretence that Union, built up on such ghastly sacrifices of life, and treasure, and liberty, is attainable or desirable. They are unwilling, and most of them will refuse, to support at the polls any candidate who offers them the delusion of pretending to find peace by asking the return of the South, and continuing to make war upon them if they refuse. The peace men, who are now holding numerous meetings throughout the country, especially in the North-western States, and will hold a Peace State Convention at Syracuse in this State to-morrow, are preparing themselves to make a demand at Chicago that, in the nomination for President, the issue shall be presented directly to the people whether there shall be an immediate armistice proposed, with a view to the conclusion of peace as soon as possible, with no other condition or expectation than that the negotiating parties will be free thereafter to treat with each other on the same basis of equality and sovereignty in respect to each other as existed when the present Government was agreed upon in Convention. It may not be put exactly into that form, but the substantial demand will be for no more bloodshed, and for appeal, in the best and speediest manner which may be attainable among the belligerents, to the judgment of both sections, the people in each deciding for themselves on the terms in which they will live towards each other or with each other.

Reflecting men, who have surveyed the whole ground calmly, pronounce this to be dissolution in fact—the consummation, by consent, of the disruption of the Union, and the possible disintegration of the loyal States into still smaller confederacies. The terror of such consequences has been heretofore a powerful support of the war with many who, detesting the Lincoln policy, but not despairing of the ultimate recovery of the Southern States to be again a balance-wheel in the Union, have felt that they were under constraint to choose between despotism and chaos. But the events of the war, in the heroic defences and stubborn resolves of the South, have dissipated all rational hope that the Union can ever be restored by force. The lawless acts of the Administration have awakened a dread of the loss of civil liberty at home, without even the compensation of the re-establishing of the lost dominion over the South, and are stimulating to a combined effort for the overthrow of the tyranny at Washington; and the exhaustion of finances, the imminent bankruptcy of the Treasury, in spite of the enormous load of taxation under which the people are restive and groaning before its burdens begin to press as they must do hereafter the fearful drain upon the physical strength of the nation for armies, recruited every few months by half-millions of the flower of its youth, who never come back—and the universal symptoms of popular suffering and discontent—are teaching many of the most resolute war men of a year ago that there is more peril now in the continuance of war than in any peace, even at the cost of separation and of the acknowledgment of Southern Independence.

This issue will undoubtedly be made at the Chicago Convention. If a war policy be adopted, and M'Clellan nominated, it will be after a bold, zealous, and possibly uncompromising effort to present a distinctive peace platform, and a clear outspoken peace candidate such as Thomas H. Seymour of Connecticut, whose record on this subject is the brightest of any in the North—that of a bold, outspoken, unshrinking adversary of the war from the beginning, without phrase or equivocation or circumlocution about the different methods in which it might or should be prosecuted. It is not believed now that M'Clellan can be nominated at the Convention. The spasmodic efforts of his particular friends to get up these personal demonstrations to fortify his position there are pretty good proof that they are afraid of the result; and the abated tone in which they now talk of continuing the war against the persistent rejection by the South of all terms short of independence, gives a tacit confession of the power of the peace sentiment which they would like to propitiate. There is not a word in the resolutions adopted at Union Square in favour of continued hostilities. All of that is implied in the speeches of some of the less discreet of the orators. But I do not think that the earnest peace men will consent to be juggled into the support of a war candidate by any ambiguities or artifices, or that they will generally support M'Clellan if nominated, unless he puts himself squarely on their ground, that peace is above all things the first necessity of the country and the first duty of Government, and that Union, however desirable, must come from peaceful conferences between free and equal States, and rest on the consent of the governed.

If M'Clellan could see in the changed aspects of the times, in the convulsions and perils which threaten the North, and in the new titles which the South has written on so many battlefields to the rights of self-government, grounds with which to satisfy his own conscience and honour in surrendering as no longer practicable or desirable, if it ever were before, his theory of the constitutional subjection of States, and the propagation of Republicanism by the sword, a great deal would be forgiven to him for his eminent qualities, his soldierly demeanour, and the natural moderation and magnanimity of his character. With his great popularity among the soldiers and the moral power which he derives from the malignity with which he was followed and hunted out for calumny and persecution by the Administration, he might, if he would carry the peace banner boldly and openly, be cordially accepted, and be more easily elected than any other man on that issue. The personal strength which he could bring to the cause would be the more readily accepted as an atonement for earlier errors and blunders, because the country was for three years in such a state of universal frenzy that the list of those upon whom the public eye would be turned as a fit candidate for the Presidency who can be pronounced to have been less tainted than McClellan is extremely small. With the exception of the Connecticut Seymour and Ex-President Franklin Pierce of New Hampshire, I know of none among men of political prominence. If he were now unequivocally for peace, he would be a very available candidate; but not being for peace, his nomination will be stubbornly resisted by those who are peace men in earnest, and will in all probability be defeated. If nominated, he will fail to carry that united support of the Opposition which is indispensable to success. Large masses of the Democrats in the North-west will tolerate no compromise on this question. The word passed round among them, in their presses and at their public meetings, is that they will support a peace candidate and no other.

AN OBSERVER.

THE CAPTAIN OF THE 'TALLAHASSEE.'

CAPTAIN JOHN TAYLOR WOOD, whose name has lately been brought before the public in connection with the exploits of the Tallahassee, has acquired for himself a conspicuous place in the annals of this war on account of the daring and successful enterprises in which he has been engaged. He is a grandson, on the maternal side, of the late General Taylor, President of the United States. Since the war broke out he has been naval aide to President Davis, but from time to time he has disappeared from Richmond, on services boldly conceived and brilliantly executed. With small boats, by surprises and by boarding, he has captured several Federal gunboats and transports, and, on one occasion, cut out a gunboat, the Underwriter, on the Neuse River, from under the guns of the enemy's works. For these distinguished services the Congress of the Confederate States passed the following unanimous vote of thanks:—

Joint Resolution of Thanks to Commander John Taylor Wood, and the officers and men under his command, for daring and brilliant conduct.

Resolved by the Congress of the Confederate States of America: That the thanks of the Congress of the Confederate States are due, and are hereby tendered, to Commander John Taylor Wood, Confederate States navy, and to the officers and men under his command, for the daring and brilliantly executed plans which resulted in the capture of the United States transport schooner Elinore on the Potomac River, of the ship Alleghany, and the United States gunboats Satellite and Reliance, and the United States transport schooners Golden Rod, Coquette, and Two Brothers, on the Chesapeake, and, more recently, in the capture from under the guns of the enemy's works of the United States gunboat Underwriter on the Neuse River near Newbern, North Carolina, with the officers and crews of the several vessels brought off as prisoners.

FEDERAL WARFARE.

(From the New York Daily News, August 27.)

THE 'surprise' said to have taken place in the attack of the Confederates a few days ago on Warren's Corps, turns out to have been one of the ingenious frauds of the censors. There was nothing of the sort at the time of that impetuous onslaught.

Warren had advanced to a position where he must have expected an attack. It came: and striking a weak part of his line, crushed onward in overwhelming weight. Passing through the gap thus made to his rear, the solid mass of the assault formed in two lines of battle back to back; and one moving to the right, the other to the left, at right angles to its original line of advance, took Warren's corps in flank. Crumpling them up as it pressed along, each body drove the Federal troops in a confused mass before it after the usual fashion of a flank attack, in an utter huddle.

One line of the Confederate movement is said to have come to a stand after having captured many prisoners. The other pressed file after file of our men before it, until its whole front became covered with a seething mass that, in terror and disorder, rushed wildly in every direction like a heaving sea. Driving on with that immense throng of our own men in its front, the movement was averted, it appears, by a terrible discharge of artillery, that spared neither foe nor friend!

War is at best a bloody business; but there are some instances in which it rises to the devilish. Pellesier suffocating a band of Arabs in Algeria, and Warren, in Virginia, hurling the deadly bolts of his artillery through a dense mass of his own men—sons and fathers, sent out to do battle from Northern households—are amongst its very worst atrocities. If that fire really forced back the Confederates, how fearfully destructive must it have been to the confused thousands that rolled and heaved helplessly between it and them! This infamous war has not presented to the fancy or the conscience of the people, in all its terrors, anything so utterly revolting as this.

The barbaric code of public bloodshed admits almost all forms of what, in civil life, would be regarded murders. Necessity, however, gilds all these with the sanction of what is called military law. We ask, therefore, whether this terrible act of General Warren may not have been avoidable — whether the necessity that may be held to sanctify it was one that existed beyond all reasonable doubt? The lives of hundreds, if not of thousands, of our soldiers—men of our own kith and kin—have been sacrificed by a judgment that may have been excited, that may not have shrunk with proper consciousness from an act so horrible; and we therefore think it due to the country, in consideration of the possibility of error in a decision leading to a result so calamitous, that this cannonade of General Warren be made a subject of military investigation.

BLOCKADE RUNNING.—On August 24 the blockade runner Constance sailed from Halifax for Wilmington. She was chased by a Federal gunboat, and ran into Ketch Harbour. She left next morning, hugging the coast. The Falcon has also left Halifax for Wilmington.

FEDERAL RECRUITING IN EUROPE.

(From the Morning Post, September 6.)

A BRITISH steamer, it appears, arrived at New York the other day with a cargo consisting only of a few bales of rags; but it was soon discovered that she had previously called at Deer Island, in Boston harbour, and there landed between 400 and 500 men brought out from Ireland to serve in the Federal army as substitutes for a corresponding number of Europeans who were not patriotic enough to comply with the President's requisition calling upon them to fight for the Union and the abolition of slavery. Another vessel, similarly freighted, came in shortly afterwards from Hamburg, and another was daily expected. The present headquarters of the Federal agency in Europe is, it would seem, at Antwerp, where a Mr. Julian Allen is 'doing what he can for American interests,' and men are said to be coming 'from all directions.' But we should observe at once, to relieve the Federal agents of the suspicion that unfortunately attaches to their operations in this line of business, and also to convey a hint, as Mr. Lincoln would say, 'to all whom it may concern,' that these men are stated to have emigrated expressly to enter the Northern army, and that their passage was paid upon that understanding. What, therefore, primarily invites attention is the part the Belgian authorities are alleged to have taken in the transaction. They would not, we are told, permit the embarkation of the 'emigrants' without examining them, 'and the signing of a contract by each person, which was to be a certificate that he went by his own desire.' This contract is, as the New York paper affirms, to the effect that the signers, when they arrive in the United States, will 'do whatever might be required of them;' and the customs officers, it is said, simply asked the men if they understood what it implied, and, when they could not write their own names, not only made the required signatures, but told them 'they were going to America, and must do their duty.' Now, that the men understood in some way what the contract implied we do not doubt, and, if the story be true, it is difficult to come to the conclusion that the Belgian officers were not at least equally aware of its meaning. At all events, such a statement plainly requires explanation. The Government of Belgium, we may assume, cannot be cognisant of the fact, if it be a fact; for while, as in this country, they may be unable to prevent practices that must be universally condemned, the account we have quoted would go to show a connivance which no neutral Government could justify.

But, apart from this particular allegation, which can doubtless be rectified, there remains the broad consideration the whole question exacts. These men are collected, carried away, and drilled during their passage to fight a battle which the Northern people, who have the means of purchasing exemption from service, will not fight themselves; and, moreover, the character of the war is established by the measures adopted to support it. Above all, the hypocrisy of the antislavery cry is abundantly demonstrated by acts which really amount to the practice of slavery in its very worst form. The 'emigrants' are bought to be shot in the room of those who buy them, and the abominable traffic goes on under the mask of religion and morality. It may be thought that the men who sell themselves do not regard the cause in which they are enlisted, and consequently that the cant of the War Christians is thrown away. This, however, is not quite the case. There are amateur recruiting agents who are influenced by the so-called religious feeling which is professed; and though the enthusiasm so excited may not produce a single volunteer in all Europe, it induces many persons to assist in driving substitutes to the market. When we hear emigration to America recommended and slavery denounced in the same breath, the design is obvious enough. So, too, if Lord Palmerston, for example, describes the awful slaughter in Virginia, and regrets that there appears to be no way of interfering to prevent the further outpouring of blood, the words of truth are instantly tortured into an expression of opinion adverse to the 'holy principles' the North, it is asserted, is in arms to maintain and extend. Hence it becomes necessary to reduce romance to the level of reason, and to strip fanaticism of its borrowed plumage.

At present, also, while in the interests of humanity and religion all ought to desire the termination of the war, any encouragement of this infamous scheme for recruiting the armies of the North in Europe, no matter on what plea, would obviously be a crime of the deepest enormity. The system is barbarous, view it how we will, but it is especially averse from every idea of justice and morality as employed by a great country to exterminate a comparatively small nation. For the success of the Federals means neither more nor less than extermination, and that is what is now preached from Northern pulpits. This, if this alone, should and does call forth the sympathy which is commonly felt for the Confederates, and, what is more, if the war continues, it will have its proper weight with the Powers of Europe. They may not be able to stop, or even to materially check, the tide of 'emigration.' The Federal agents may evade the municipal laws of foreign countries with impunity for a time; but that very offence will eventually lead to a change of policy which must, directly or indirectly, tend to strengthen the South. Neither in England nor in France will so flagrant an abuse of neutrality be tolerated; and the Federal Government will have to be informed, as regards the Belgian port its recruiting emissaries have appropriated, that the violation of the spirit of an obligation cannot be excused by any fraudulent conformity to its letter.

CONFEDERATE CRUISERS.—Yesterday intelligence was received at Lloyd's, under date New York, August 27, that two more Confederate cruisers had evaded the Federal steamers and successfully run out of the harbour of Wilmington, and since then had destroyed no less than thirty-three Federal merchantmen. The Tallahassee has eluded all the efforts of the Federal gunboats to overhaul her since she ran out of the harbour of Halifax, N.S., and on August 23rd destroyed no less than twenty-five coasting ships and vessels on their homeward voyage from Europe, many laden with valuable cargoes. All this destruction was effected off the coast of the State of Maine. The Federal mercantile marine, and the coasting trade especially, is completely paralysed by these daring exploits of the Confederate cruisers. The Federal gunboats have been foiled, as the commanders of the Confederate cruisers will not risk an engagement, their only object being the destruction of property, and not fighting.—Morning Post, Sept. 8.

Among the items of fashionable intelligence from Paris is the announcement of a marriage, which it is understood will shortly take place, between M. Emile d'Erlanger, of the distinguished Frankfort and Paris banking-house of the same name, and Mdlle. Mathilde Slidell, the eldest daughter of the Hon. John Slidell, the Special Envoy of the Confederate States of America.

THE MASSACHUSETTS SLAVE TRADE.

WE copy the following from the Boston Courier of August 19:—

'A satirical Kentuckian, writing over the signature of 'Legree' in the New York Tribune, urges the New England Governors to reopen the African slave trade as supplementary to the domestic branch of that traffic in which they are now engaged. Why not? As well send to Africa as to Guinea for food for powder and off rages upon the 'Altar of Liberty.' A negro and a fortiori an African a gro, is 'just as good to 'xpend rebel bullet as a white man.' 'Legree' endorses his advice.

'As Andrew, Buckingham, & Co. have confessedly entered into the dom stic slave trade, they cannot be slow to agree to the reopening of the African slave trade, as it is from here our future supply of laborers must come. Our present stock of negroes have become too much civilized and christianized to be longer 'hewers of wood and drawers of water' merely, and cannot compete with Guinea negroes as field hands; the latter being far more tractable and easily managed, besides having fewer wants, a clout and a corn cake being unaccustomed luxuries. Nor are arguments based on christianity and humanity wanting with which to reconcile your correspondents to this scheme. By statistical returns there are found to be two million members of evangelical churches among the slaves of the slave States, or more than are found among the equal white population of New England. This is the result of the training of masters and mistresses of the South. A far better showing this than all the missionary efforts of all Christendom, from the preaching of the Apostle Philip to the eunuch of Queen Candace, Queen of Ethiopia, down through the eighteen hundred years to the present time. The whole of Africa cannot show as many Christian converts as are to be found in this one county of Fayette among its negro population. Why, the Rev. Dr. Robert J. Breckinridge, the temporary chairman of the Baltimore Republican Convention, owns a negro man whom he hires to the African church at Lexington for $250 per annum, who preaches to more Christianised Africans every Sunday than all the preachers from the Cape of Good Hope to the Straits of Gibraltar. If such has been the result of former importations of Africans, in the name of God does not every consideration of humanity call for the reopening of a trade which has been such a boundless blessing to multitudes of the sable sons of Africa?'

With a sharp appreciation of certain New England peculiarities, Legree adds:—'Call it not a slave trade, but call it rather a missionary movement.'

PEACE IN AMERICA.—A great and important movement is now going on in Great Britain and Ireland in the shape of a peace address from the people of this country to the people of the United States. This address appeals to the ties of race and kindred, and asks if there has not been enough of strife and bloodshed, of misery and suffering; it goes on to say: 'We believe that it is now time for you to pause, and, after calmly reviewing all that you have accomplished, the distance which you have travelled from your well-known landmarks, and the difficulties and dangers that are certainly before you, to take counsel together as to the best means of restoring peace.

'It is in your hands to give peace to the American continent.

'We appeal to you to recognise the duty which attaches to your high privilege, and to make peace with the Southern States. And we make this appeal in the name of religion, humanity, civilisation, and common justice.'

In Ireland the address has met with hearty support from the people in general, Protestants and Catholics alike, the clergy taking a very active part in promoting the object. The people of Dublin, Cork, Belfast, Limerick, Drogheda, Queenstown, and the principal towns in Ireland, are signing the address in immense numbers, as also in Manchester, Liverpool, Leeds, Huddersfield York, Leicester, Preston, Stockport, Macclesfield, Congleton, Chester, Bury, Oldham, Bath, and most towns in England. It is also being extensively signed in Glasgow, Edinburgh, Aberdeen, Peterhead, and Banff. The Address is now being actively signed in London.

As the time is near at hand when the people of the United States will decide the question of peace or war for another four years, the friends of peace and humanity are anxious that the counsels of the people of Great Britain and Ireland should be uttered in favour of peace, believing that a people can best address a Republican Government and a Republican multitude. In this case there can be no offence—no selfish motive. It is humanity appealing to humanity, and entreating that the worst form of war should be closed in an honourable peace.

The London Society for obtaining the cessation of hostilities in America has appointed Mr. Joseph Parker, Coleman Street Buildings, Coleman Street, as its special agent to cooperate in this movement; and we are informed that already this gentleman is receiving, by every post, numerous applications for blanks. Gentlemen of influence in Bath, Bristol, Gloucester, Portsmouth, Plymouth, Guernsey, and many other places, have volunteered their services, and the list of earnest labourers in this Christian work is daily increasing.

THE 'TIMES' ON THE COTTON TRADE.—The following is the paragraph in the Times of Tuesday to which we refer in our leading columns:—'A heavy fall in the price of cotton would be the result of peace, and every such fall will lessen the amount required for carrying on the trade, so that an increased business might be effected with the employment even of a diminished capital. Just in proportion, too, as the trade shall revert to America will be the saving of distance in the transmission alike of money on the one hand, and the return produce on the other. The fact, also, is to be considered that money flowing to America is not buried or converted into trinkets and withdrawn from circulation as in India, and to some extent likewise in Egypt. Moreover, a fall in the price of the staple would at once cause large foreign orders, which have been withheld under existing circumstances, for our manufactured goods to be executed by our merchants and drawn for so as to have an important effect upon the various exchanges. Finally, the most significant point is that, even if the Southern States could ship their cotton with the speed which persons ignorant of the difficulties of transport after the war fancy to be practicable, there would be no ground to suppose that we should have any heavy specie balance to remit to them. Although we are bare of American cotton, both Northern and Southern States are absolutely bare of supplies of nearly all other kinds of goods. It may be doubted if in that respect the aggregate value of their requirements would not be found to exceed that of all the cotton they could even under the most favourable circumstances at present send to us; and as our bonded warehouses are for the most part well stocked with the principal articles of produce, we are prepared at any moment to meet these wants.'

TO OUR FRIENDS AND SUBSCRIBERS.

THE INDEX was established in May 1862, in the darkest hour of Confederate fortunes, by earnest friends of Southern Independence, with the distinctly expressed object of being the representative, in English journalism, of a gallant and struggling people appealing to the world not only for political, but still more for moral recognition. Since accepting this great trust, THE INDEX has unceasingly laboured, by the combined aid of English and of Southern writers, to enlarge and extend the common ground upon which two nations may cordially meet, which need only to understand each other in order to cherish the warmest mutual appreciation and lasting friendship. The chief and almost the sole difficulty has been, and is still, the callous indifference of the British Government on the one hand, and, on the other, the perplexity, to the European mind, of the unsolved and unprecedented problems involved in the management and education of four millions of the African race, intermingled with a population of the highest Caucasian type. This difficulty could be met only by a liberal fairness to every shade of honest opinion, by an inflexible adherence to truth under all circumstances, and by a bold avowal of convictions, even though ill received. THE INDEX does not claim to be neutral, but it claims to be independent in the highest sense of that word. It is because it must reflect and appeal to, at one and the same time, the public opinion of two countries as yet only imperfectly acquainted, that this somewhat unusual self-description is called for.

Thanks to arrangements now in successful operation, by which the Letters of regular Correspondents and Newspapers from all parts of the Confederate States are received within from twenty-five to thirty days from their date, THE INDEX is always enabled to present the very Latest Direct News from the South, as well as a faithful reflex of the tone and spirit of the Southern Press.

THE INDEX.

THURSDAY, SEPTEMBER 8, 1864.

The Chicago Convention.

THE steamer which left Boston on the 31st ultimo and Halifax on the 2nd instant will discharge the bulk of her freight of news upon the telegraphic wires, from off the coast of Ireland, on Sunday or Monday next at latest. She will bring us the result of four days' sitting of the Democratic Convention which assembled at Chicago on the 29th for the purpose of nominating a candidate for the Presidency of the United States, and enunciating the policy upon which that candidate is, a month later, to appeal to the suffrages of the three million voters of the Northern States. It is possible that the sittings of the Convention may have been stormy and its counsels divided—that, therefore, the suspense was not definitively ended when the steamer left the American shore. Military events also may have taken place, of which we are as yet unaware, to influence the action of the Convention. Still we shall learn enough to speculate with tolerable certainty upon the issue of the approaching crisis, and we know enough even now to make such speculations more than mere guesswork.

Present indications all point to the nomination of General M'CLELLAN. Present indications also permit little doubt that whoever may be the nominee of the Democratic Convention will be the next President of the United States. If there were no other reason for this, it would be found in the almost unanimous feeling among the masses, stronger even than their earnest longing for peace, that any change in the personnel of the Administration must be for the better. So utterly hopeless are Mr. LINCOLN'S chances for reelection, that his own supporters have set on foot a movement to unite the party upon one candidate by withdrawing both the competitors; and one of them, Mr. FREMONT, has publicly declared his acquiescence in the arrangement if Mr. LINCOLN will abide by it in good faith. The 'Jonah' of the sinking ship thus thrown overboard, the fortunes of the Republicans might possibly still be saved, but the manœuvre of withdrawing two candidates already in the field, and finding a third acceptable to the adherents of both the others, is too complicated to be feasible within the few weeks which now alone remain before the day of election. We look, therefore, upon the success of the Democratic nominee—always supposing the freedom of the polls from military interference, and barring the improbable contingency of serious Southern reverses—as being as nearly certain as human things, and especially American things, can ever be.

A month ago we should have treated this success as synonymous with peace: to-day we owe it to that candour from which we have never departed, whether the facts were agreeable to our wishes or the reverse, to say that the situation is, though not radically changed, yet essentially modified. Then the yearning for peace at the North might be translated into the language of reason whispering: 'Better be united with an independent South on terms of amity than in a conquered South be chained to a corpse.' To-day the yearning is as strong, perhaps stronger, but the evil one has found deluded ears to listen to the temptation: 'The Union may still be restored, if we give the South all else she asks, and we shall obtain by juggling what we failed to obtain by force.' The cause of this relapse is undoubtedly to be sought in the victory off Mobile, which, while to the South it is only a local reverse, may thus turn out to be to the North a great national misfortune. Compared with the madness which ruled until within the last few months, even the present delusion is relative sanity; but compared with the promising symptoms of recovery which we had the pleasure of chronicling a short time since, it is a return to madness.

As we were the first in the English press to shout the glad tidings of 'land, land,' it behoves us now, when every one descries the shore, to make certain that it is not merely a mirage, and to caution against the breakers which may still prevent the sadly travailed ship from safely reaching a harbour. Over-confidence on the part of spectators who are quietly in port can do but little harm; on the part of those whose lives and fortunes are embarked on the vessel, the slightest error may be ruin. Here an illusory view of the prospects of peace will at worst only hurt a few individuals engaged in speculations; on the other side of the Atlantic it will be the wreck of a nation's destinies. Our journal goes on the library tables of several hundreds of Northern politicians, both Republican and Democrat, and what we have to say on so momentous a question is narrowly scanned by probably more than ten times that number of Northern eyes. May it please the Allwise, who is the Ruler of North and South alike, that our warning come not too late!

The vision of peace is not a mirage. It is the real view of solid land, full of promises of future prosperity, and with ample space for Federals and Confederates. There are two approaches to it: one, marked out by foolish pride and counselled by political knavery, which leads to certain destruction; the other which it requires only common honesty and a patriotic purpose to find with ease and safety. In plain words, and dropping metaphors, the North, the aggressor in this war, and by whom, therefore, the first advance must be made, has two courses open. It may say to the South: 'We are still able to prolong this war; we do not even yet abandon all hope of eventual success; but the war was undertaken under a fatal misapprehension of its true conditions, and even success could not now give us what it was undertaken for. While, therefore, we have still the power to inflict further injury, we recognise our error, and offer you a fair and honourable peace.' To which the South would reply: 'The continent is large enough for us both. Since we must occupy it jointly, I for my part will not be a bad neighbour. All our former troubles arose from our being artificially linked together by a tie which chafed us both. This broken, there is no cause left why we should not live side by side in mutual peace and harmony. It is true I owe you no favours, but neither do I to the rest of the world; and if I have any favours to bestow, they will belong to that Power which first recognises my just rights, based upon the logic of historical facts and the principles of government for which your fathers and mine once fought the same battles.' There would be dignity and self-respect in such language from the North to the South, and there would be good faith and sincerity in such a reply from the South.

Or the North may address the South somewhat after the fashion that the plotter of a villany slyly pokes his expected accomplice in the ribs: 'We, the Democrats, are now in the ascendency. The Republicans, silly fanatics, were such imbeciles, and got so drunk with the unaccustomed nectar of patronage and office, that the country turned them out in a fit of disgust, and we, your old allies, are now the North. Come back to us, and give us votes in the Senate and in the House, for without it they may come in again when the people forget their nausea. There, now, we will hang a few of them, if that pleases you, or at least so frighten the whole lot that ABE shall cut his jokes in Exeter Hall, and BUTLER seek the tender mercies of London brewers, and every cheap hotel in all Europe be filled with New England orators and contractors. Have slavery, and any guarantees for it you may want. Have your own way in everything. Only do, do come back into the Union.' To which the South will reply: 'Democrats of the North, who hold this language, you are self-seekers and time-servers, and I know you of old. You possess not public virtue enough among you even to have a conviction, either right or wrong. It is such professions as those you now make which delayed separation for twenty years only to make it irremediable at last, and it is your lack of straightforwardness and moral courage which has caused the inevitable event to be accompied by this horrible effusion of blood. You have fitly selected as your representative a man who says one thing in private and another in public, and who neither in public nor in private dare speak his own mind, if he have one. You, who profess to ascribe the failures of LINCOLN, not to Southern valour, but to the incapacity of his chosen generals, proclaim the impersonation of failure, M'CLELLAN, who when at the head of armies wrote despatches only less lying and bombastic than POPE'S—who, with no better fortune than GRANT'S, cannot claim GRANT'S boldness nor his power of sustaining the spirits of his men—and who, worst of all, still draws his pay as a general in the army for Southern subjugation. You, who profess to uphold the Constitution and the rights of the States, select as your standard-bearer the man who first, at LINCOLN'S bidding, set the Constitution at defiance and trampled the rights of a sovereign State under foot—M'CLELLAN, the pliant tool for the arrest of the Maryland Legislature and the military occupation of that unfortunate State. You may deceive the people of the North, but you cannot deceive the people of the South. The best Southern blood was not shed to establish a party, but to vindicate a nation.'

When the nominee and the 'platform' of the Chicago Convention are known, our readers will be able to judge which of these two courses the North means to pursue. If the first, then in a few months there will be a lasting peace between North and South, such a one as will command the respect of European Powers and deride the cowardly and wicked policy which has obtained a secret hearing in Cabinets, though its advocates shrink from the infamy of its open avowal. If, on the other hand, the nominee of the Chicago Convention shall be M'CLELLAN—or, whoever may be the nominee, if its 'platform' be simply a string of patriotic commonplaces, borrowed from Fourth of July orations—then the last hope of salvation for the North as an Empire will have been sacrificed to the fetish worship of the Union, and there will be no peace. The South will not accept an armistice without its necessary concomitant, the raising of the blockade. It will not go into a Convention of the States with a lie on its lips. The war must go on, the South growing stronger, the North weaker. When peace at last shall come, it will no longer be a peace between equals, but a peace extorted at the point of the sword in smouldering Northern cities—a peace made with individual States or groups of States separated from the rest; and instead of two allied Powers taking the place of the extinct Union, there will be several, of which the South will be the most compact and the strongest.

The Crisis of the Campaign.

WHATEVER foundation there may be for the peace rumours which are circulating in the Northern States, no indication of an early cessation of hostilities is afforded by the operations of the armies in the field. Probably at no previous period of the war has the struggle assumed such grave dimensions, or been waged with so much stubbornness and energy; never were the immediate issues at stake, from a military point of view, of such critical importance to both North and South. It is true that the fall of Petersburg, the destruction of Mobile, and the surrender of Atlanta, if they could all be crowded into the space of the next three weeks, would only point to an indefinite prolongation of the contest. But the effect of failure at all these points, in the present state of public feeling in the North, could hardly fail to be decisive as to the fate of the party now in power in the United States; and therefore it is that every telegram from America is scanned with even more anxiety than awaited the despatches of three years ago. The interest of the war, and especially of the present campaign, has been prolonged beyond general expectation. A succession of daring enterprises and heroic repulses — a series of great battles, recalling the gigantic fights of the First Empire, and of minor engagements which may take their stand by the conflicts of Alma and Inkermann —never allow the attention to flag. As in a well-written volume, every fresh chapter in this war's history developes a new point, and leaves the reader in cruel expectation. Surprise follows surprise. The sensation headings of the New York press are vied with by the startling movements of corps d'armée, but the real decisive blow is never struck. It is always to come, and the opening and the close of a campaign tread closely upon one another, with nothing accomplished, and the end as distant as ever. The latest news from the seat of war is, as usual, indecisive and suggestive. Favourable on the whole to the Confederacy, it still reveals to us the struggle at its height. Three months ago it would have been thought impossible that GRANT'S and LEE'S armies could have so long confronted one another in Virginia, that SHERMAN could have reached Atlanta, and that, having reached Atlanta, he could have been kept for weeks outside her defences, almost as much besieged as besieging. In GRANT's invasion of Virginia, from his scramble through the Wilderness to his first assaults upon the lines at Petersburg, he is supposed to have lost from 80,000 to 100,000 men, killed and wounded, prisoners, stragglers, and deserters. He sacrificed 8,000 to 10,000 men in his latest effort to carry the Petersburg lines. And now it is asserted that his losses at Deep Bottom and on the Weldon Railroad will not fall far short of another 12,000. It would seem impossible that an army could stand up against the demoralisation consequent on these repeated defeats; and occasionally we hear that the Federal troops are no more to be trusted for fighting in the open or attacking entrenchments. But facts do not bear out the assertion. Not only are GRANT's resources apparently inexhaustible, but his soldiers fight. Outmanœuvred they are invariably; but their stubborn courage, added to their superiority in numbers, saves them; and the battle has yet to be fought which shall free Virginia from the tramp of the invader. Yet, if prediction is ever justifiable in war, no very long time, we believe, will elapse before the crisis of the struggle is reached. The Federals have staked all on the success of GRANT and SHERMAN. Veterans, reserves, hundred-day men, have been used up indiscriminately, until at last the supply is at an end, with both Richmond and Atlanta untaken. GRANT's losses are known. We have never seen even an approximate estimate of SHERMAN's casualties. But his frequent assaults upon strong defences, his fatiguing marches, his battles before Atlanta, his unsuccessful raids must have made up a frightful list of vacancies to be supplied. It is evident that the Federal army before Richmond is no longer regarded as a dangerous assailant of the Southern capital. The troops which lined the defences of Petersburg, and which have lately on more than one occasion, under General MAHONE, inflicted such severe punishment upon the Federals, do not, in all probability, belong to the original army of Virginia. They are the reinforcements brought up by BEAUREGARD when GRANT first threatened the eastern defences of Richmond. The bulk of LEE's army, which fought behind earthworks at Spottsylvania Court House and on the western bank of the Chickahominy, is north of the James River, and disposable for offensive operations. And it would seem that LEE will now force GRANT to retire from his present position by a formidable diversion across the Potomac. SHERIDAN's army was stated to be 45,000 strong. It had been reinforced by portions of at least two corps from GRANT's main army; and it occupied a very strong position in advance of Harper's Ferry. Yet General EARLY found himself powerful enough to attack and drive back this large force, and even, it is said, to cross the Potomac in its face. Either SHERIDAN's army is composed of very bad materials, or EARLY has a very considerable force at his back; and in that case we may hear any day of a battle that will bring back all GRANT's soldiers in hot haste to the Potomac. For SHERIDAN is no match for EARLY. A good cavalry officer, he has in no single instance shown any strategic capacity, and the operations in Maryland, if the Confederates re-enter that State, are likely to tax to the utmost the skill and energy of the Federal generals. The question is whether LEE has advanced the bulk of his army. If so, we may rely upon it that he has made GRANT safe. And circumstances seem to favour the supposition that he is contemplating the offensive. The violent efforts of GRANT to absorb his attention by successive demonstrations on the north and south banks of the James, the fact that the Federal General holds a portion of the Weldon Railroad, which he could not have gained had the Confederates been in force to follow up their recent victory, all point to a concentration of strength in another locality. That locality, we are inclined to think, is the Shenandoah Valley. There or in Maryland may soon be fought the decisive battle of this campaign.

Nor is SHERMAN likely to stay long before Atlanta. He has, since HOOD took the command, been beaten in fair fighting, repulsed in his assaults, and utterly baffled in every attempt to outflank and surround the Confederate army. Correspondents from his camp avow that their prospects are gloomy. Every extension of his line developes a Confederate work in front of it that he is not strong enough to storm, and he has to settle down to the siege of an uninvested town defended by an army which he has never beaten in the field. The danger to SHERMAN is not, however, the presence of the Confederate army in front of him, so much as the length of his communications. We know now that the Confederate programme is to compel his retreat by intercepting his communications. WHEELER and RODDY are already at work upon these. We hear of Confederate cavalry at Dalton in Georgia, at London in Tennessee, and at Tunnel Hill; of a fierce encounter in which the Federal General STEADMAN is wounded, and Colonel STRAIGHT killed; of trains captured, cattle driven off, &c. SHERMAN's line is at least 250 miles long. Of this distance four-fifths requires to be constantly guarded against an enemy's attack; and, with the drain upon his resources entailed by this demand, it seems an impossibility that he should be able much longer to maintain himself within two miles of Atlanta. In the meantime, the Georgian militia has responded heartily to General HOOD's call, and even if no reinforcements have reached him from Virginia, he is probably stronger in point of numbers than when he gave battle at Peachtree Creek. What the militia are worth has been already proved by their brilliant defeat of General STONEMAN's and M'COOK's raiding parties.

In other quarters matters are still looking well for the Confederacy. In Florida another Federal reverse is chronicled; at Mobile, the operations of FARRAGUT, with the exception of the attack upon Fort Morgan, have been brought to a sudden termination; at Memphis, FORREST is paying the Yankees in their own coin. But it is to Georgia and Virginia that we must look for the events that will influence Northern opinion and decide this year's campaign, and they cannot be long delayed.

Will Peace immediately bring down the Price of Cotton?

A PARAGRAPH appeared in the Times city article on Tuesday which is calculated to excite uneasiness in Liverpool and Manchester. We cannot believe that the prospect of peace in America causes the present tightness in the money market, for it certainly will not cost more to buy American cotton than it does substitutes for American cotton. The Times, however, sufficiently qualifies its evil forebodings by referring to the difficulties in the way of bringing American cotton to market, and to the demand for cotton goods that will spring up on the announcement of peace. It is certainly true that peace will cause a heavy fall in the price of cotton; but, if the circumstances are rightly understood, it is not inevitable that this fall should be sudden or partake of the features of a panic. The subjoined article was already in type when the Times comments on the cotton trade appeared, and those comments render it more than ever necessary that the case should be fully and fairly set forth.

The American war has not as yet caused a panic in the cotton trade. Hitherto most of the speculators have drawn prizes. Not only the original owners, but half a dozen sets of consecutive operators, have made fortunes out of the stock of cotton in hand in 1861. It was not at a single bound, but by a series of jumps, that cotton reached its present market value. The explanation is obvious. Until Secession was an accomplished fact it was regarded as an idle threat, and until the war actually commenced few persons in this country believed that the North would attempt to restore the Union by force of arms. Nor was this incredulity unreasonable. It is plain enough that the South was so firmly persuaded of the continuance of peace that she made no preparation for war, for certainly the long interval between the election of Mr. LINCOLN and the first bombardment of Fort Sumter might have been employed in transferring Southern cotton to neutral ports, so that the Confederates would have escaped many of the financial difficulties which they have had to encounter. Even when the war broke out, there were two reasons which tended to keep down the price of cotton. It was not supposed that the maritime Powers, in the face of the treaty of Paris, would recognise the validity of a blockade which could only be an imperfect blockade. Two years ago there was an impression that solemn treaties entered into by great Powers were worth something; but we know now that, whether treaties are old or new, they are only to be observed when observance is deemed expedient. Lastly, it was thought that the war would be short, and that before the enormous stocks of raw cotton and cotton fabrics were exhausted, the war would end. So it was only by slow degrees that men believed in a cotton famine; and therefore it was by equally slow degrees that cotton reached to what are considered famine prices. Yet, knowing the extreme sensitiveness of market prices, and what slight events frequently induce a panic, it is remarkable that the American war has not caused greater convulsions in the cotton trade.

Now that there is, let us hope, a prospect of the termination of hostilities, it may be well to consider the probable effect of peace on the price of cotton. Judging from the agitation in Liverpool and Manchester manifested as each succeeding mail announces the rapid development of a peace sentiment, we might fear that peace will produce such a sudden fall in the value of cotton that the holders would be utterly ruined. If a panic ensues, this will be the case, but we think it is easy to show that such a panic would be groundless, and that the holders of cotton need not fear a heavy and sudden depreciation of the value of their property.

It is true that there is a large stock of cotton in the South. It would be ridiculous to attempt to give an estimate of the stock, for nothing is more dangerous than basing a calculation on merely problematical data; still, knowing the vast quantity of cotton held by the Confederate Government, and that the Government holding represents but a portion of the entire stock, the whole quantity must be considerable. But it must be remembered that the whole of this stock cannot be forthwith thrown upon the European market. The means of transit have been destroyed. The railroads have been cut up not so much by the enemy as by the Confederates, for the purpose of repairing the main lines used for military transport. The river steamers no longer exist, and therefore railways must be repaired and a new fleet of river steamers built before the bulk of the cotton can be brought to seaports, and these works cannot be soon completed. Moreover, we must note carefully that the supply of American cotton has not altogether ceased. We find by a reference to the Liverpool shipping list that many thousands of bales of Southern cotton have been received at Liverpool in the last few weeks, and very few ships come from ports contiguous to the Confederacy without being partly freighted with cotton. The enterprise of British merchants has in this respect rendered the blockade ineffective, but a supply of American cotton, in addition to the large supplies from India and elsewhere, has not sent down the price of cotton.

It may be asked if we mean to assert that, when peace is restored, the quantity of cotton shipped from the South will not be much larger than it is at present. Assuredly this is not our opinion. What we say is, that, no matter how great the demand, many months must elapse after the conclusion of peace before a great part of the stock of cotton in the South can be in the hands of the Liverpool brokers; and, further, we say that the effect of peace on the price of cotton will be considerably modified, since already in time of war we are in receipt of Southern cotton. Still, making these allowances, it is not to be denied that, so soon as the war is over, cotton in comparatively large quantities will come from the Confederacy, but those who infer that there must be a sudden drop in price do not sufficiently weigh all the circumstances. Since the commencement of the American war it has required perpetual effort to foster the growth of cotton in India and other places. Cotton-supply Associations have done what they could to induce a belief that the American war was to go on for many years, and at the end thereof the South was to be left so exhausted and disorganised that many more years must pass away before she again became the great cotton field of the world. No other kind of argument was tenable; for if the American war has proved anything, it certainly has proved that no cotton country can compete with America.

Now peace in America will produce a genuine and well-founded panic amongst non-American growers, and the supplies from India and the Mediterranean will be instantly checked, for those countries, allured by the high prices, are sending every bale to Liverpool that they can make ready for export. We shall get more cotton from America, but our supplies from India and other places will fall off. And suppose that peace should bring about a panic, and that the price of cotton should come down to what will probably be its normal price three years after the war is over—that is, a shilling per pound—the effect would not only be to check, but absolutely to stop any large supplies of non-American cotton; that is, we should receive from India very little if any more cotton than we did in former times.

Besides the foregoing, there is another reason, and a very important one, why we may expect that peace prices will not rule for some time after the termination of hostilities. When peace is proclaimed, there will be a large and even excessive demand for cotton fabrics—a demand which will show that those who have erected new mills were men of foresight, and that those who have looked with indifference on the emigration of Lancashire operatives have been lamentably shortsighted. Everywhere the stocks of fabrics are at a very low ebb; still buyers are very guarded in their purchases, from the prevalent idea that the war is nearly over, and that peace will cause a sudden and disastrous fall in the price of cotton. Should there be a momentary fall, the demand will restore high prices; or if high prices are maintained, buyers, seeing no prospect of immediate cheapness, will have to purchase at current rates. Besides, there will be an enormous demand for cotton goods in the Confederacy. When we consider how completely the South is denuded of cotton fabrics, it is not, we think, an exaggeration to say that her orders will amount to from ten to fifteen millions sterling, and that two-thirds of the cotton exported from the Confederate States during the first year of peace will be re-imported as cotton fabrics.

We submit, then, that there are no grounds for supposing that a sudden and heavy fall in the price of cotton must result from peace, but, on the contrary, that the holders of stocks, unless they sacrifice their property in a moment of panic, will not lose by the termination of hostilities. We do not mean that if a man refuses to part with his cotton, and stores it up for a year or two, he will not lose. Our argument is, that the downfall of price will be gradual, that probably no very serious depreciation will follow peace, and that present stocks will pass into the hands of manufacturers at nearly present prices. Peace will ultimately give us cheap cotton, though the most sanguine person must not expect there will be a return of the prices of 1860 for many years. Meantime we rejoice unfeignedly that, though high prices will prevail for cotton fabrics, they will not, owing to the large demand, prevent those wondrous hives of industry, the cotton mills, from again being in full work, and that the Lancashire operatives—the only class in England that has suffered in consequence of the American war, and who have borne their suffering with a noble fortitude that is beyond all praise—will be amongst the first to reap the fruits of blessed peace.

SERIALS FOR SEPTEMBER.*

September magazines are proverbially dull. The current number of the Cornhill is a striking instance. The illustrations are heavy, the scraps of novels are heavy, and the articles are curious on account of their extreme poverty. They were written in the dog-days, when the exhausted contributors were longing for sea-breezes, and only thought of getting through enough copy to satisfy the importunate printer's devil. We are treated to a paper on partridge-shooting which is equally devoid of wit and information. In order to cover the requisite number of pages with type, we have a translation of General Todleben's account of the battle of the Alma. Fancy the Cornhill resorting to such padding! However, we have no wish to be unkind to a magazine which is usually altogether worthy of the high position it holds. The weather has been unusually enervating, and contributors are but men. No doubt a review of Todleben's book was suggested, but the exhausted contributor could not do more than pen a few words of introduction to the translation of a chapter.

Fraser is not by any means lively, but its articles are readable. A paper on diplomacy by M. H. Ottley is a pretty specimen of article-making under difficulties. A large portion of the twenty pages is taken up with historical details such as an industrious reader and copyist might glean in two hours in the reading-room of the British Museum. Mr. Ottley's opinions manifest the most thorough ignorance or the most thorough misconception of the existing condition of political affairs. He argues that the British Parliament ought to have some voice in foreign affairs, that the theory of Parliament not being able to set aside a treaty before it is formally ratified is an unconstitutional assumption, and that Parliament ought to be consulted before important treaties are concluded. He illustrates this by a reference to the late Danish negotiations. Now it must be manifest to the most casual observers of the working of our Constitution that the House of Commons does, or can, most effectively control the Foreign Department. Secret diplomacy has gone out of fashion, and no Ministry, if it wished it, could carry on an important negotiation in secret. If the House of Commons disapprove of a projected treaty, it can stop it by turning out the Government. Did the House of Commons disapprove of the Danish policy of the Government? In spite of the majority of eighteen we think that it did, and that, if the sense of the House had been taken pending the negotiations, and before censure was too late to be of practical use, the Government would have been forced to change its policy or to resign. It was the Opposition, by its timid tactics, by its connivance at the policy it condemned, which held the function of the House of Commons in abeyance and gave the Ministry an irresponsible jurisdiction. We do not defend the conduct of Earl Russell; we do not say that there is not much to excuse, or at least to plausibly account for, the vacillation of the Opposition; but it does not serve the Conservative cause, or the cause of Parliamentary Government, to conceal the actual state of the case.

The concluding paper in Fraser, which treats of the Poor Laws, is an article that we are sorry to say is too true. Our system tends to develope pauperism, and is cruel in its effects on the pauper. The workhouse is a den of misery. In places as dreary as prison-cells, on worse than prison fare, our paupers drag out a wretched existence. The young and the old, the sick and the healthy, are crowded in the same building. The sane are disturbed with the cries of the insane. No less than 30,000 incurables 'linger in pain, and agony, and hopelessness in the workhouse,' and without 'any mitigations which anodynes, or soothing drinks, or comfortable beds might afford to their long agonies.' The workhouse babies, deprived of fresh air and proper food, 'grow up the inevitable heritors of disease.' And what is the moral effect of workhouse training? 'Out of a single workhouse in London, enquiry was instituted two years ago concerning eighty girls who had left and gone into service. It was found that every one of them was on the streets.' We may lament, but we can hardly be surprised, that girls out of place prefer prostitution to a return to the workhouse. We regret, but we cannot wonder, that the poor die of sheer destitution rather than become inmates of the workhouse.

The first article in Fraser treats of a subject which is also discussed in Blackwood and the North British Review. We refer to the dispute between Professor Kingsley and Dr. Newman. Fraser gives a fair and tolerably intelligent account of Dr. Newman's theology; Blackwood cannot forget that Professor Kingsley is a Liberal, and indulges in virulence altogether unjustifiable; the North British Review gives a biography of Dr. Newman. Professor Kingsley, in reviewing the seventh and eighth volumes of Froude's History of England in Macmillan's Magazine, charged Dr. Newman with stating that truth need not and ought not to be a virtue for its own sake, and that cunning was a weapon given to the saints to withstand the brute main force of the wicked world. This was a very harsh, uncalled-for, and false accusation, and Dr. Newman asked for proof. The Professor referred him to a sermon preached in 1844, but ultimately admitted that he had not lately read that sermon, and that he was ready to believe Dr. Newman's denial of the charge. Dr. Newman published the correspondence with some remarks so bitter that they inevitably brought about a rejoinder, and the Professor wrote some very hard things about Roman Catholicism. Dr. Newman then published a very remarkable book. In language singularly chaste the story is told of the fierce struggles of a great mind in its efforts to discover religious truth. We see how scepticism and faith contended together, and how, to escape from the overwhelming feeling of uncertainty, Dr. Newman submitted to the authority of the Roman Catholic Church, and so put an end to all his doubts by putting an end to all enquiry.

The North British Review contains an able article on Todleben's 'History of the Crimean War.' It is written from a Russian point of view, but on the whole it is far more reliable than Mr. Kinglake's work. It seems clear enough that if the allies had pushed their advantage and marched on to Sebastopol immediately after the battle of the Alma, that stronghold would have fallen without a protracted siege. We must remember, however, that the allied commanders could not possibly know, and had no right to assume, that such an important place was so nearly defenceless, and that therefore they were justified in proceeding cautiously. If the allies had not met with a new system of defence—that of earthworks, as invented by General Todleben—Sebastopol could not have held out for many weeks. Just when modern artillery had reached that degree of perfection which rendered the strongest stone fortifications of no avail, Todleben hit upon an expedient which neutralises its most powerful efforts. It is curious to note what a marked effect the earthwork system of Todleben has had on the course of the American war. It has enabled the South to defy the superior artillery of their enemy. But earthworks are useful for defence, not for aggression, and therefore the Federals, though very ingenious in the use of the spade, have not made much progress towards the conquest of the South.

In the North British Review there is an article on Russia under Alexander II., which is a laboured attempt to show that Russia is a civilised and civilising power. We must confess that no amount of argument will make us believe in the civilisation of a country wherein order is maintained by the wholesale hanging and banishment of political opponents. An article on Wordsworth, the 'Man and Poet,' is exceedingly well written, and will do good if it induces the study of works which we think are too much neglected.

The Autographic Mirror, No. 14.—The current number of this excellent serial is unusually interesting. A letter by Macaulay is characteristic of the manly independence of the great historian. A short note by Mr. Disraeli, in which he refers to the portrait of his father, will be valued by the right hon. gentleman's friends. There are autographs of Catherine II. of Russia, of Sir E. B. Lytton, and many other eminent personages. A sketch of the battle of Aboukir, drawn by Nelson with his left hand, and a facsimile of a paper drawn up by the Duke of Wellington enumerating the cavalry under his command at the battle of Waterloo, are autographs that will be highly prized by Englishmen. We are glad to see that the Trustees of the British Museum are permitting their priceless collection of autographs to be copied, which will make them widely known. The Mirror, by reproducing the British Museum autographs, will render a national service.

The number before us contains a sketch of General R. E. Lee and the signature of that great commander. There is also a facsimile of Captain Semmes's last two entries in the log-book of the Alabama. One is dated June 16, the day of the fight.

SPECULATION.*

Some persons suppose that a commercial career is necessarily dull and uneventful, and that trade gives no adequate employment to great minds. These ideas are vulgar errors. The vast commerce of the world is the most striking evidence of man's intellectual capacity. The merchant who conducts an important business, or the merchant who is trying to build up an important business, must be clearsighted, courageous yet prudent, and a judge of human character. He must acquire and maintain a high moral character. He must resist the hourly besetting temptation to become rich suddenly by gambling. He must be endowed with the faculty of organisation. It is necessary that he should be well informed on political affairs. In the higher circles of commerce there are many men who have distinguished themselves at the university, and who would have started in a profession under brilliant auspices. They do not find that commerce involves mental rustiness, but, on the contrary, that commerce is a severe but healthy course of mental training. Not that mere education commands the grand prizes. As in literature many of the most renowned names are of men who pursued knowledge under difficulties, and who were not indebted to university culture, so in commerce there are merchant princes who are in all respects self-made men, and who, beginning at the lowest round of the ladder, have by boldness, judgment, and perseverance, reached the summit. Commerce affords full scope for genius as well as for high mental cultivation. Herein is the secret of the political calm that has for so long blessed England. The energies of the people find countless vents outside the domain of politics. So far from seeking, ambitious young men will not accept Government appointments, but prefer contending for one of the countless prizes offered by commerce. The British Constitution has always proved a miserable failure when tried by other countries. The explanation is that it will not work well unless yoked to British commerce. It is a powerful engine, but highly dangerous without that safety-valve.

But let not any one suppose that commerce is a sure road to wealth. The conditions of success are not problematical, but they are hard to observe, and multitudes are wrecked. Mr. Evans's book tells us how many who are apparently well to do end their days in poverty. Mr. Evans speaks with authority. He seems to have breathed a commercial atmosphere all the days of his life, but mainly, if not entirely, as an intelligent observer. He has been engaged in compiling the history of commerce from day to day for a London newspaper; and in this way was brought into contact with the magnates of the 'Change,' and has been freely admitted behind the scenes. He tells us some curious stories anent speculation—amongst others of a Count D—— who came from the Continent, made large sums of money on the Stock Exchange, got into difficulties, but who reappears when there is a new speculation mania. Another amusing chapter is an account of how Mr. Evans hunted down a gang of bill stealers. But to specify all the amusing chapters of the book we should have to copy the table of contents; for our author has the happy faculty of treating grave matters pleasantly as well as instructively. To those who are fond of dabbling in 'limited liability companies' we would especially recommend the remarks of our author on the way in which these schemes are 'promoted.' There is also some very sound advice about speculation in foreign stocks. Mr. Evans's book will please those who read it for pastime, and it will be useful to speculators who are not too infatuated to heed its warnings.

The Earl of Donoughmore on the American War.—At a meeting of Tipperary bowmen, held last week at Knocklofty, the seat of Lord Donoughmore, Mr. Mason, the Confederate Commissioner, was one of the party, and presented an additional prize, which was won by a Miss Sankey. The noble chairman, referring to this incident, said: 'No one with a spark of love for home and liberty animating his breast, no one who admires those great virtues which have ever secured the admiration of mankind, can look upon the contest now waging throughout the Confederate States without feeling anxious for the triumph of the Southern cause. True it is that we have not taken any part in that struggle. This some people may regret—others approve; but though we have not recognised their cause, our hearts have been with those gallant and noble men. (Cheers.) We have the happiness of having amongst us this night an honourable gentleman who fills a distinguished position as representative of the Southern States. He is far from his kindred and from his native land; but though separated as he is from his country, and though his mind is naturally filled with anxiety for the issue of those momentous events now happening there, still he has been kind enough to honour our festive sports with his presence, and to assist us in our pleasures by presenting this beautiful and valuable prize. (Hear, hear.) I am sure that there is no one here in this assemblage who does not hope for Mr. Mason's return to his native country under the brightest circumstances, and who is not ready to breathe a prayer that when he goes back to that country he may find it free, independent, and happy. Perhaps at some day not far distant he may have the pleasure of being present at an archery meeting in his own native land which will recall to his mind the present scene. He may, it is true, observe with sorrow the many blanks that war has caused in the circle of his friends, but, though great the sacrifice, the knowledge that they died fighting for liberty and home, and that through the terrible struggle in which they engaged their native land inherits freedom—this will remove the pain which such a saddening retrospect would otherwise bring to his mind. (Applause.)—Daily News.

The Defence of Mobile.—The citizens of Mobile have made preparations to defend the city to the last if it should be attacked. The following proclamation of the Mayor has been responded to with the utmost alacrity:—'The enemy's vessels, as you all know, have run past the forts and are now in the bay; so that the outer water defences are of no further present use for the security of our city and homes. What the purpose of the enemy is we have not yet discovered—whether to hold command of the bay, in order to dominate the forts, or by his shallowest vessels to attempt to draw near enough to open a bombardment on it, it is now impossible to say. We must act without this information. We must gather every man fit for defence into some organised body, and hold ourselves in readiness to repel attack, come from what quarter it may. This is the only way to make our efforts useful, and to stand strong against the progress of the foe, in case he should approach us within reach of the weapons we have at command. The advance on us has been unexpected, and our arms cannot impede or repel the enemy in his present position; but his ulterior intentions may soon be unmasked in such form as will bring our services into use, and then on your valour will depend the safety of the city. We must defend this city to the last point of resistance. Let it not be said that Mobile is craven, while we have the illustrious examples of Richmond, Petersburg, and Charleston looking us in the face. Let not the name of this city stand in the historical records of this unexampled war beneath, or in contrast with, these grand instances of heroic fortitude and endurance. Fellow-citizens, I can only counsel alacrity in this business, and a cheerful obedience to your commanders. They are striving with all their might, and they will not lead you to dishonour. My own services will be given to the cause with all the zeal I possess. And so, trusting to the benign influences of God and our own hands and hearts, I hope we shall escape all danger, or battle through it to a successful end.—R. H. Slough, Mayor.'

THE CONFEDERATE CAUSE IN FRANCE.

FROM A CONFEDERATE CORRESPONDENT.

PARIS: September 6.

THE visit paid by the officers of the Russian navy to the United States envoy at St. Petersburg, in order to express their gratitude for the enthusiastic welcome and brilliant hospitality which the Atlantic squadron had received at the hands of the American people in all the United States ports which it had entered, and also for the reception with which their officers were honoured by Mr. Clay, has aroused the indignation of the French press. It expresses no astonishment at the somewhat strange sympathy existing between the degenerate republic of Washington and the most despotic monarchy of the Old World, for it reminds its readers that at the siege of Sebastopol the Yankees openly sympathised with the Russians; it is astonished, however, that in the face of such demonstrations as these, there should still be found journals who dare to defend the policy of the North.

We recommend (says the Pays) to the sympathies and to the logic of the Siècle and the Opinion Nationale this Holy Alliance of St. Petersburg and Washington, cemented as it is by the blood of the unhappy Poles given up by Mr. Lincoln to the vengeance of Russia.

Mr. Clay having stated in his speech to the Russian officers that Russia and the United States were each pursuing the same path, that of true civilisation, the Pays thus replies:—

Yes, it is true indeed that Russia and the United States are each following the same path; but when it is added that this path is that of true civilisation, it amounts to a pretension so absurd as to render any reply unnecessary. Such doctrines as these require neither refutation nor commentary.

The editor in chief of the Patrie, M. Ernest Dréolle, in a stirring article entitled 'Russo-American Civilisation,' directs serious attention to this speech of Mr. Clay. 'The profession of faith of an American minister fraternising with the Muscovite Government, deserves,' he says, 'to be made a note of.'

The Northern representative does not like ambiguity. With him there is no doubt, no hesitation! The statesmen of Washington, whose energies are directed towards the extermination of the South, make common cause with Russia who devastates Poland! The path which they each follow is that of true civilisation—true civilisation, mark you—there is none other. The civilisation represented by France, England, or Central Europe, is a false civilisation! The capital of the civilised world is to be found at New York, with a branch establishment at St. Petersburg.

The Patrie then thanks Mr. Clay for having given the cue to this American question, relative to which the French journals were disputing some days since. Henceforth, however, there need be no more discussions, and all doubts may cease. The substance of the question is well understood; it is as follows:—

The Government of Washington delivers the South; it does so in the same way as that in which Russia delivers Poland. The Government of Washington does better still—it consoles humanity by one of those pitiless wars which recall the fusillades of General De Berg in Poland, the gibbetings of Mouravieff in Lithuania, or the war in the Caucasus. This is the true civilisation—the only true civilisation—that which is offered as an example to barbarous and despotic old Europe!

Public opinion, which never forgives (concludes the Patrie), has now ceased to ask what may be expected from the Liberalism of a Government which unites its interests with those of Russia, and pretends to march with her to the deliverance of the world.

We can now fully comprehend the effect of this alliance—it is Russo-American civilisation.

This sarcastic article, replete with irony, has excited much notice, and deals a blow against the defenders of the Yankees from which they will not easily recover.

The Russian organ at Paris, Le Nord, is unwilling to allow the slightest opportunity to pass without having something to say upon the Russo-American question, and its remarks are not favourable to the Paris journals, who support the Federals and are at the same time the defenders of Poland. The Siècle and the Opinion Nationale, says Le Nord, incense in Europe that which they burn on the other side of the ocean. This is certainly an important admission and deserves notice.

Le Globe calls attention to the progress of the peace party in the North, and to the late movement made by Grant from the other side of the James River. This movement, in the opinion of the Globe, is far from being a glorious one for the Federal arms; it simply proves that Grant, after having lost two months before a small town whose defences had been hastily constructed, after having left there 25,000 men either killed or disabled, now disgracefully raises a siege which has not furthered his purposes in any way. The France attaches more importance to the pacific movement, the centre of which it finds in the Western States, who are weary of witnessing the sacrifice of lives valuable to the country in battles whose sole object is the maintenance in power of ambitious men who trifle with the fortunes and the destinies of the United States.

The Patrie has less confidence in these pacific manifestations; it regards them merely as a proof of want of energy on the part of the Northern populations, but does not think it possible to conclude even a simple armistice, since the Cabinet of Richmond would listen to no terms until the acknowledgment by the Unionists of the independence of the South.

In the Presse M. Chatard examines the political and military situation of the United States. I regret to find a large number of errors in this article; so numerous, indeed, are these errors, that it is difficult to believe M. Chatard to be its author. For example, we read in this article that Mr. Davis supports certain agents in the North with the view to favour the election of M'Clellan, that this general is the representative of the peace party, that Fremont is the candidate of the Copperheads, and similar statements of an equally strange character. It is easy to perceive that the talented writer in the Presse, who so fully appreciates the military side of the American question, has altogether overlooked its political side. This is an hiatus which this judicious writer will no doubt fill up.

M. Ancaigne discusses in the Patrie the recent military events which took place at Mobile, Atlanta, Petersburg, and in the Shenandoah Valley; he regards them as little favourable to the Federals. The sudden halt made by Early, Grant's check near Petersburg, and the manœuvres of Wheeler's cavalry on Grant's train, induce him to think that the prospects of the Confederates are daily becoming brighter. The advantages gained by the Federals before Mobile in no way disquiet him, and although he commits the error of mistaking General Maury, who commands this place, for the celebrated naval officer of that name, he appreciates with great exactness the difficulties which the Federals have yet to overcome before they can hope to occupy the capital of Alabama.

The same number of the Patrie contains a letter from its Richmond correspondent, M. Eugène Cavellier, formerly superintendent of public schools at New Orleans, in which communication the atrocities committed by the negro soldiers in the Federal armies are denounced to Europe in very energetic terms.

The Opinion Nationale has this week made a grand discovery, namely, that the South is desirous of entering the Union. Those who will read in La France the account there given of the interview of Messrs. Gilmore and Jaques with President Davis will ask themselves the question—Has not the Opinion taken leave of its senses?

CONFEDERATE CAUSE IN LANCASHIRE.

FROM OUR OWN CORRESPONDENT.

MANCHESTER: September 7, 1864.

THE cause of the Confederacy never wore so favourable an appearance as at the present time. Its friends are growing more zealous, its enemies fewer and more disheartened than ever, while the 'waverers'—who are prone to distribute their friendships and enmities according to their personal interests—are making haste to join the winning side. These three propositions are equally true of Lancashire, Yorkshire, Derbyshire, and the manufacturing portions of Cheshire. Even the Leeds Mercury, the influential organ of the Baineses, Forsters & Co., is no longer sanguine enough to foresee anything but military and political disaster as the termination of the present campaign. 'Since the grand assault on Petersburg, which,' says that journal, 'proved so great a failure, it has been impossible to discover any evidence of a regular plan in General Grant's movements, which have resembled nothing more than the uncertain efforts of a chess-player whose plan of attack has been utterly defeated, and who can only make haphazard moves, in the hope that something may turn up to enable him to strike an effective blow.' This is pretty plain speaking for a hitherto staunch Federal newspaper, which, next to the Manchester Examiner, has made the most persistent efforts in the northern counties to lacquer the Union arms with the show of success. As at Leeds, so at Bradford, Halifax, Sheffield, and other important Yorkshire towns. Apropos of Bradford, it cannot be too often reiterated that that borough is notoriously misrepresented on the American question by Mr. W. E. Forster, and, as an instance of this, it is within my knowledge that many of the honourable gentleman's leading constituents—'advanced' ones, too—are among the most active and liberal patrons of the Southern Independence Association. As for the people of Sheffield, they only repeated themselves the other evening when they received Sir Frank Crossley's defence of what he treated as an anti-slavery war, with loud expressions of abhorrence if not of insult. But, in point of fact, not only at Sheffield, but, so far as I can hear, everywhere else, 'anti-slavery' is, as the phrase goes, played out. Why, the Union and Emancipation Society has actually wearied of its own cuckoo-note, and the agitators who were paid to sound it have been compelled by necessity to return to their former habits or to wriggle themselves into some more remunerative intrigue. By the way, with regard to that curious society (which has really done excellent service to the cause it opposed), it would seem ungracious to ridicule it now it is in extremities. I will refrain, therefore, from adding more than that its executive committee in Manchester and its friends 'on the other side' appear to have equal cause for being discontented with each other—the committee on account of financial collapse, and the friends on account of the unpopularity and futility of the Society's operations.

The 'Peace Address' to the people of the United States, which has recently been put in circulation for signature in every town in Great Britain and Ireland, is meeting with a most favourable acceptance in these districts. Ministers of all respectable denominations have engaged to distribute copies among their congregations, and the returns of signed sheets are already very numerous. The only difficulty appears to be in the supply of the necessary forms. This difficulty got over, there can be no question that, within a month from this date, Mr. Adams will receive for transmission to his Government a document the importance of which he will know better than to doubt. The signatures will certainly be reckoned by hundreds of thousands obtained in the manufacturing districts alone, and probably the aggregate number obtained in the United Kingdom will be from eight to ten millions. The following note from a Unitarian minister is a fair testimony of the spirit with which the movement has been taken up:—

I want to do something in the matter of the address and sheets for signature. Though I am very busy here with a large congregation, I feel moved to offer what help I can give. I have prepared a lecture for delivery now, and am willing during the month of September to give two nights a week in Dukinfield, Mossley, Oldham, &c., and at the close of the lecture signatures might be obtained on sheets such as I have received, and others might be left with friends of the cause for filling up. You will probably remember my name as the mover of the resolution at Sheffield in favour of recognition of the South, when we carried our motion by a majority of 10,000 votes. My engagements are very numerous and heavy; but I feel so deep an interest in this matter that I am willing to make any sacrifice in my power to help, if only a little, in the effort to bring about peace on the basis of the independence of the South.

THE PEACE MOVEMENT.

THE PEACE MOVEMENT. MR LINCOLN'S BLUNDER, AND HOW HE TRIES TO REPAIR IT. RESIGNATION IMPOSSIBLE. THE SOUTH AND MONROE. THE PEACE DEMOCRACY IN FAVOUR OF THE MONROE DOCTRINE. THE RE-CHANGE OF THE M'CLELLAN PARTY. THE PEACE PARTY IN FAVOUR OF UNCONDITIONAL PEACE. THE EFFECT OF THESE VARIOUS OPINIONS ABOUT THE CHICAGO CONVENTION. MR LINCOLN'S CHANCE OF RE-ELECTION. THE DEMONSTRATIONS TO RESIST MILITARY CONTROL IN THE ELECTIONS. THE SPIRIT IN THE LINCOLN PARTY.

NEW YORK: August 23, 1864.

THE past three weeks have been extraordinary developments of the craving for peace among the Northern people. The abortive effort at Niagara, originating nobody knows exactly how, conducted with no distinct object on either side which the public has yet been able to understand, and brought to a close with such offensive promptness by Mr. Lincoln, nevertheless let loose a flood of speculations which show that the drift of the popular desire is strongly for peace. The conduct of the President in repulsing so rudely an overture which had the appearance of an offer from which something might arise to lead to peace, has been used with damaging effect by his adversaries and considered by many of his own party. Even the most obsequious of his followers seek to break the force of the condemnation by denying the common interpretation of his words, and trying to make us believe that when he was asked for a passport to Washington for certain named persons, and he withheld it, answering by a circular notice 'to whom it may concern,' announcing that anybody might come to him who would bring the submission of the rebels to the terms therein prescribed, he did not mean to say that these are really his terms, or that he really intends to make them a sine qua non for entertaining projects of peace. The pressure must be heavy which extorts such quibblings in excuse for the policy of the President from partisans who have hitherto supported all his acts and sayings in their actual import, and assailed as traitorous sympathisers with the enemy all who tolerate the idea of treating with rebels until after unconditional surrender. It was, in fact, a political blunder, and the more sagacious among his advisers have discovered, and are seeking to repair it. If he had suffered these Southern agents to come to Washington, and had managed the affair with discreetness, the embarrassment would have been theirs and not his. They had no authority to engage for the Southern Government, and they had nothing to propose for themselves. They have been already reproached at Richmond for seeking to be placed in a situation where it would have been so easy for an acute enemy to subject them to humiliation—to turn them away as pretenders, or exact from them the proposal of terms which he would gain credit for refusing, and at the same time acquire thereby the political advantage of having manifested a willingness to yield something for an opportunity to make peace. If he ever contemplated the possibility of reaching peace through this road, or conceived the idea of foiling his opponents by seeming to do so, he was driven from it by the intolerance of the Radicals about him, and the consequence has been, that he and some of them are alarmed at the indications of popular disappointment, reaching deeply into the ranks of the Republicans themselves. Hence the strenuous efforts among a large class of them, led off by the personal friends of the Secretary of State, to soften away the meaning of the President's words, and to give the reassurance that the hard terms laid down in his Niagara letter are not ultimata, and not even necessary parts of a settlement which shall restore the Union. This view is industriously circulated in leading party journals, and clearly expounded, as though it were the interpretation of the Secretary of State, in the Albany Evening Journal, which is the mouthpiece of the Seward section of the Cabinet. According to this, an attempt is said, and currently believed, to be going on at Niagara, to engage the Southern gentlemen there in another correspondence, by which the ground lost in the former may be recovered. Judge Black, of Pennsylvania, and Major Hay, the President's private secretary, again are named as the new emissaries, dispensing with Greeley, Sanders, and Jewitt. The tale goes that these gentlemen have previously conferred with Messrs. Holcombe and Thompson at the Clifton House, Mr. Clay being sick at St. Catharine's, and Mr. Thompson for the first time appearing to take part in these conversations. A sensation paper in this city has it that these gentlemen have agreed, on the offer of Mr. Lincoln, to a joint commission to be appointed by the two belligerents, and to be held at Baltimore, for arranging the terms and period for an armistice, pending which negotiations for peace may be opened. It is a strange report to find believers, yet there are a great many men who, believing what they desire, however improbable, are willing to risk money on the chances that Mr. Lincoln has suddenly changed his whole policy, retracted his public declarations up to the very latest, of only three weeks old, and is ready to treat with the rebels as equals, without a condition as to slavery; and that the South, which is more successful in arms than ever before, is anxious to treat for a voluntary renewal of political associations, from which she has been fighting through three years of heroic constancy, under unspeakable sufferings, against barbarous and brutal invasion to secure her escape. Looked at in the light of serious overtures with the expectation of reaching peace, nothing could be more astounding than the offer, except perhaps the acceptance. For the President it may be a piece of political cunning to help himself out of the difficulty into which his precipitancy hurried him on the former occasion, and enable him to silence the murmurs rising against him in the country for having thrown away a chance of peace on an arrogant and untenable punctilio. He had lost the opportunity of putting the responsibility of continuing the war entirely on the South, and given the adversaries of his administration the chance of concluding that but for his stubbornness and intolerance the Union might be now peacefully restored. As a candidate for the Presidency he might well desire to regain that position, and as a public man foresee that it committed him to nothing hereafter. Now the Southern gentlemen who are addressed in Canada are well known to have no powers from their Government for the purposes of any such agreement, and I think they see the position of public affairs in a light which makes it extremely unlikely that they would give any encouragement to a plan of which the obvious purpose is to help forward the political prospects of Mr. Lincoln. Indeed, the rumours from Canada, and the doings themselves in Canada, so far as they have gone, have come to be looked upon as parts of an electioneering plan for influencing the nomination of candidates for the Presidency of the Northern United States, and affecting the votes to be cast for one or other of the contending parties, rather than as bonâ fide efforts of statesmanship for bringing the war to a definite and direct issue. I, for one, wish that the recognised agents of the Confederate Government, and all Southern men who might be supposed to have its confidence, would prevent their names from being used in connection with schemes for electing this or that man President of the United States in such a manner as to do injury to the cause by allowing it to be supposed that they favour one man more than another among those who are for continuing the war in any manner for the compulsion of the South into the Union. I have good reason to know that neither Mr. Thompson, Mr. Holcombe, nor Mr. Clay entertains the idea that peace is possible by war or by consent while this Administration is in power, or possible under any Administration so long as Union is made the condition. Their ultimatum, which is unquestionably that of their Government and of the whole body of the Southern people, is peace with independence—absolute peace, with the full right to consider and decide for themselves what they will do afterwards. It is not required of them to discourage or repudiate the hopes of others, that peace with State sovereignty conceded may lead to negotiations for the construction of another Government by union of States or of Confederacies based on new consent, which, protecting the separate rights of each with fresh and sufficient guarantees, might preserve that which is still an object of desire to all, in a unity of national force towards all other Governments.

The depth of the Southern resentment against the North amounts to positive detestation, and their distrust of the pretended Conservatives, who have so long tolerated and connived at the atrocities of the war, and surrendered their own liberties at the footstool of a vulgar despot to enable him more effectively to crush out the liberties of the South—to give its sons to the sword and its roofs to the flames—is not to be so readily overcome by honeyed invitations to submit to the rule of another variety of the same race who may come into a passing majority. A common danger or a common passion directed against other enemies might draw them again after a while towards each other, although it is not to be doubted that at this moment the great masses of the Southern people would ally themselves with any foreign Power, in almost any quarrel, in order to defeat and humiliate the North and secure their own final separation. But it is nevertheless felt in the South that they have been unjustly and unkindly treated by both France and England in their long struggle for independence. When they accomplish separation, they will have no grateful thoughts towards the Government of either of those Powers, but rather a sentiment of proud resentment for a selfish neglect which, in sacrificing the weak to the needs or demands of the strong, becomes as mischievous to them as positive ill-will would have been. The time is passing rapidly by within which the magnanimity of Europe can impress itself so firmly on the hearts of the Southern people, by interposing the shield of public law between them and their oppressors, as to prevent the possible revival of that ancient feeling which used preeminently to distinguish the South in antagonism to the interference of foreign Powers in the affairs of any of the States on this Continent. If the Monroe doctrine ever rises again to be a bond of cohesion between the Northern and Southern States, recreating a common impulse for a powerful nationality supported by gigantic and invincible armies, it will owe its vitality to the selfish cowardice now of those whom it will then jostle without ceremony off of this continent—of which Earl Russell and M. de Lhuys, for their masters, had better take note. It will be found that, at the Chicago Convention next Monday, the Peace Democracy will declare for the Monroe doctrine with more energy than the Republicans dared do at Baltimore, trammelled as they were with the functions of a Government which cannot now execute all it is willing to threaten against foreign interventions in America; and that the popular passions which are thus invoked will be counted on as among the most powerful impulses which are to be relied upon for the reunion of the States hereafter. It would be well for those interested not to underrate the power of such impulses over the American mind.

All the advocates of peace and all the opponents of the Administration — peace men or not — are looking with intense interest for the proceedings of the Democratic Convention which meets next Monday at Chicago to nominate a candidate for the Presidency. This is the regular Convention of the party. There is another Convention—a sort of self-appointed mass meeting of Conservatives and other opponents of the Administration—which meets on Saturday, two days before the other Convention. The main object is to bring to bear upon the Democratic meeting a great outside influence in favour of the nomination of General M'Clellan, for which a large support is promised from independent members of other parties. Their position before the public is that of peace with reunion, on the basis and within the terms of the present Constitution — these terms to be offered to the South with the promise of redress for their grievances and security for their property under the guarantees of the successful party. The alternative is that, if the Southern States refuse to accept these terms and to lay down their arms, they are to be coerced into submission by war, to be prosecuted with all the strength and resources of the Government, but in a more lawful way, and with more civilised processes, until they are subdued. In my last I gave you an account of the great meeting in Union Square, at which these views were enforced by the speakers, and General M'Clellan commended as their representative. The leading advocates of the press embody the pacific overtures in two propositions as the fruit of success in the elections: 1. Immediate suspension of arms; 2. The call of a Convention of all the States, North and South, to deliberate, under the forms of the Constitution, on the amending the Constitution as therein provided for.

The peace men of the country declare their want of faith in this plan, and have been agitating against it with great activity ever since it was proposed as a solution of the war question. In the West dissent from the plan includes a harsh personal antagonism to the candidate named by it. A number of the leading Democratic papers there denounce General M'Clellan by name, and call upon the earnest peace men to resist his nomination, and to refuse to support him if nominated. Public meetings are more guarded; but the drift of the resolutions of nearly all the conventions and other gatherings of the Democratic party in the West is adverse to the support of any candidate who is not for peace without a condition—for an armistice at once, preliminary to the withdrawal of the Federal armies—and an application to the independent States of the South for a new convention of sovereigns, to recreate, if possible, a common government. The Convention at Syracuse on the 18th, to which I alluded in my last as likely to be the exponent of the line of policy of this portion of the Democratic party in the Chicago Convention, was duly held, and was largely attended, notwithstanding the studied misrepresentations of its proceedings by the partisans of M'Clellan, the War Democrats, or, as the voters call them, the Shoddy Democrats. It was an harmonious and effective one, and represented beyond a doubt the real feelings of the great body of Democratic electors embodied in the declaration in substance, that the nomination at Chicago, to be of any value to the country in its sore trials, and to be worth support by patriots, must be in favour of unconditional peace and the admission of unconditional sovereignty to the Southern States as the means for securing it, and the only hope of winning them back to union.

The struggle between these two Democratic factions out of the Convention has been very violent—much more violent, in fact, among the leaders of adverse opinions than they have allowed themselves to exhibit in their public conduct towards each other, although their language has been sometimes exceedingly bitter, each seeking to make capital by charging the other with designing to break up the unity of opposition to Mr. Lincoln, and thus increase the chances of the deplorable event of his reelection by their divisions. The War Democrats are most offensive in this quarter, because they are among the old party leaders, and are impatient at being thwarted in their plans by less conspicuous men; and having control of the principal journals, and unlimited scope in the attributing of unworthy motives to those who differ from them, have sometimes been very unsparing in their language. The contest will in a few days more be transferred to Chicago, to which both parties will send outside delegations of their most active men to advise with and manage the Convention. Each side is calling out lustily for harmony, and a unanimous and hearty effort together to defeat Mr. Lincoln; but the War Democrats assert that peace without reunion would be intolerable disgrace, and the Peace party affirms that war is in itself an unmitigated evil, and peace by itself the supreme political good—that disunion may be a calamity, but union maintained by bloodshed is a curse and a crime.

How these adverse opinions are to be reconciled on any one candidate by political manipulations at Chicago, I find it difficult to conceive. But there are very intelligent men of both classes, members of the Convention, who tell me it is sure to be done, and strangely enough both hold that its success will be the sure forerunner of peace, and substantially without conditions. They all reason on the overwhelming necessity which presses on every man's mind for getting rid of Mr. Lincoln's administration as the only chance of having, in war or in peace, a hope for the rescue of their own Government from degradation and impending ruin, and the reestablishment of the rule of civil order in the land will subordinate all other issues to that single one of paramount domestic importance, leaving that of war and peace as an issue of foreign politics to be decided by events over which candidates, and platforms, and elections will have but a secondary influence. The M'Clellanite will tell you that the choice of a candidate is merely the selection among chances and expedients for securing success in an election; and such is the fearful and rapid growth of national necessities, the failure of armies, the exhaustion of finances and decay of credit, the waste of muscle and productive power, that no President will be able, after the closing of this campaign, to carry on war, or get the public to consent to attempt to carry it on, for the purpose of restoring the Union by force against the continued refusal of the South to be appeased or reconciled by a change of men and measures. Under the force of these persuasions, fallacious as a great deal of the reasoning is, and delusive as the implicit engagements might prove to be, it is not to be denied that as the Convention approaches there are manifest signs of a greater willingness than was thought possible a month ago to unite on the candidate nominated, whoever it may be. This is construed by the friends of M'Clellan into an improvement of his prospects, as the strongest candidate among the delegates known to be appointed. But that mode of calculation does not hold good in party conventions, for it is the Democratic way of doing things in those bodies to make combinations of minorities in order to defeat the favourite, and in this way they have twice achieved success, with Polk in 1844, and Pierce in 1852. The nomination of M'Clellan is likely to be resisted with great pertinacity, and it is yet on the cards that he may be beaten by some candidate who may be relied upon to follow the developments of the public will as it exists when he comes into power, without the shame of an open renunciation of the policy which he proclaimed when aspiring to be a candidate.

The chances of the Democrats are largely increased by the irrepressible contentions and discords of the Republicans, and the folly and almost fatuity with which Mr. Lincoln carries on the political campaign for himself. The demonstration of Senator Wade and Representative Davis, War Republicans of the most violent cast, against the lawless audacity of his military dealings in the occupied portions of the Southern States, to manufacture spurious electoral votes for himself, is now held to be part of a concerted effort of Republicans to organise an opposition to his election and force a change of candidate. There is a call in circulation, originating in Ohio, and supposed to be an emanation from the friends of Mr. Ex-Secretary Chase, for a National Union Convention, to be held at Baltimore in September, for the nomination of a Republican Union candidate to supersede Mr. Lincoln by concert among leading men of the party, or to make combinations with other 'war' candidates to unite all sections of the Opposition against him. The movement may come to nought as a political organisation, but the attempt is a damaging proof of the internal discords which beset the President's party.

The military subversion of the civil power in Kentucky, and the arbitrary arrest and deportation of Kentuckians for declared or suspected opposition to the Administration—the tightening of a similar strain upon Missouri and Maryland—the renewal of military arrests of political opponents for over-freedom in commenting on the acts of the President, and late demonstrations in Indiana and Illinois, which create the apprehension that it is the President's purpose to find or make an occasion for the proclamation of martial law in these States, in order to bring their electors within the control of his military subordinates—are giving proof and aggravation to the political charge that he is resolved to employ the army directly in promoting his election by military usurpation at the polls, as well as by his control over the votes of the soldiers cast under his dictation within their several States. So deep is the suspicion and so wide the apprehension of these freaks of tyranny, that they form the topics of alarmed consultation among the leaders of the Opposition party upon the means of protecting the right of suffrage and resisting these violent efforts to perpetuate power by fraud and force. The secret associations in the West, which have lately been denounced as treasonable, and subjected to the military power of the President in the arrest and disarming of the members, are mostly political associations framed for mutual protection in their civil rights of personal liberty and free voting. There remains scarcely a doubt that if these last executive outrages should prove successful, and the election of a President should be effected by this means, there would be revolutionary resistance to his inauguration. The manifesto of the Winter-Davis Republicans contains an unmistakable warning of their consequences, amounting almost to a threat of sustaining them. The partisans of Fremont make them an open ground of unrelenting hostility to Mr. Lincoln, and the Democrats with unhesitating firmness resolve in their several Conventions, and intend to renew it at Chicago, that an election made by the force of votes cast under the compulsion of martial law, or in districts or States reorganised into voting constituencies by the military authority of the Executive for his own benefit, will not be submitted to, whatever the consequences of resistance may be.

Many who have consistently supported the war and upheld Mr. Lincoln's war policy throughout are falling away from him as a political leader whose stubborn selfishness is fast driving the country into revolt. The defection would be almost universal but for the mighty influence of patronage over a well-disciplined class of powerful retainers, who hold nearly every place of influence and control so many of the organs of public opinion, aided by the pervading force of party discipline over the habits of unthinking multitudes, and the indecision among the more intelligent which springs from dread of the consequences of breaking up an Administration in the midst of war and bringing public affairs into a state of double confusion. The chief of a triumphant party, who is master of a million of soldiers and the dispenser of a thousand millions in salaries and jobs, is not got rid of with the facility with which discontented parties in ordinary times get rid of unpopular candidates. These discontents will certainly weaken the President's party; it is scarcely hoped that they can compel a change of candidate. They add, however, infinitely to the motives for desiring the cessation of war, during which only such candidature could be tolerated, and will impel many Republicans, from considerations of public safety, to unite with any organisation which promises to get rid of these dangers and their author.

In the midst of these distractions, which are convulsing the whole fabric of Northern society, who can venture to predict the course or the issue of an election?

AFFAIRS FINANCIAL AND COMMERCIAL.

WEDNESDAY EVENING.

MONEY AND DISCOUNT MARKET.

WE have been as near a state of panic as it was possible to be. Happily confidence has been once more restored, and there is now no apprehension of any very serious danger. It is quite clear to every one that the money market is in a very sensitive position, and that, if any unforeseen events were to occur, there would be a strong financial disturbance. The rates of discount have tightened here, and they are also advancing on the Continent—for instance, the terms at Amsterdam have gone up to 5 per cent., and at Frankfort to $4\frac{1}{2}$ per cent. If any change were to ensue at Paris it would immediately produce an influence here, and then it would be scarcely possible to avoid running to 9 per cent. At present it is thought we shall escape that evil. One or two of the failures which have occurred show very discouraging results, and this does not assist to solve the general difficulty. The Indian exchanges are once more moving in the wrong direction, and if these rates are to advance, as also the terms of discount, the results would be alarming. The Bank minimum of 8 per cent. is now charged in most transactions, and, in some cases, $\frac{1}{4}$ to $\frac{1}{2}$ per cent. higher. But the strain is not so great as to look for a further rapid rise. On the Stock Exchange the terms for short loans have been 5 to 6 per cent., but for lengthened periods it is a matter of negotiation to fix rates.

BULLION AND SPECIE MOVEMENTS.

The bullion market so far continues in a satisfactory state. The amount of gold sent into the Bank this week has been 163,000*l.*, whilst there have again not been any withdrawals, and as long as money continues at the present high value, it is not probable that any large amounts will be taken for transmission abroad. The arrivals of gold this week have been only 164,961*l.*, of which 19,500*l.* is from New York, 9,225*l.* from the Brazils, and 126,236*l.* from Australia. The shipments of specie by the steamer for the East on the 4th inst. were only 176,389*l.*, of which 173,000*l.* was in gold, and 3,389*l.* silver. To Point de Galle and Madras the amount of gold was 3,389*l.* Of the remainder, 111,000*l.* silver was to Calcutta, 19,500*l.* to Singapore, 4,500*l.* to Hongkong, and 5,000*l.* to Shanghai. The silver market has again become very active. The bar silver brought by the last West India packet has been sold at $61\frac{5}{8}$d. per oz., which, as compared with the price obtained on the previous occasion, is an advance of $\frac{3}{8}$d. The greater portion of the Mexican dollars, by the same mail, have been sold for China at $68\frac{3}{4}$d. per oz., which is a decline of nearly $1\frac{1}{4}$d.

HOME AND FOREIGN SECURITIES.

Great heaviness has been the chief characteristic of the English stock market throughout the week. In the present aspect of monetary affairs, the operators do not care about speculating to any extent; this, with the fact of Consols being pressed upon the market to a very considerable amount, has increased the prevailing heaviness. Consols, however, do not close at the lowest point touched, the present price being $87\frac{3}{8}$ to $87\frac{1}{2}$ for money and the present account, which, as compared with this day week, is a decline of $\frac{7}{8}$ per cent. Exchequer bills have been weaker, but have recovered to 25*s.* to 15*s.* dis. The foreign stock market, although very flat, has not shown so much depression as the English department; still there is a general absence of speculation, and the slight alteration in prices has been in those stocks more particularly affected by political affairs. Greek and Spanish Certificates have each advanced $\frac{1}{4}$ per cent., but the Passives have declined $\frac{1}{8}$, whilst Mexican have dropped about $\frac{5}{8}$ per cent. The closing quotations this evening were: Greek, 24 to $24\frac{1}{2}$; Mexican, $27\frac{7}{8}$ to $28\frac{1}{8}$; Spanish Passives, 31 to $31\frac{1}{4}$; ditto Certificates, $13\frac{5}{8}$ to $13\frac{7}{8}$; Turkish Six per Cents. of 1854, 90 to 91; and those of 1862, 70 to $70\frac{1}{2}$.

AMERICAN SECURITIES.

The market for American Government and Railway securities has been more animated than for a long time past. The dealings have been comparatively numerous, and prices have slightly improved for most descriptions. This movement in the market has been chiefly caused by the peace rumours from the other side of the Atlantic, and if they continue, it is probable the market will further improve. The dealings, as officially quoted, have been: In United States, 1881, at $39\frac{1}{4}$ and $39\frac{1}{2}$; do. do. 1874, $41\frac{3}{8}$; Virginia State 6 per cents., at 29, $29\frac{3}{4}$, and 30; Atlantic and Great Western Railway, Pennsylvania section, 72 and 73; Erie, $100 shares, all paid, $41\frac{1}{2}$, $42\frac{1}{2}$, and 44; do. 4th mortgage, 51; Illinois Central, $100 shares, $90 paid, 46, 47, $48\frac{1}{2}$, and 43 dis.; and do. do., all paid, 50, $49\frac{1}{2}$, 50, $49\frac{1}{2}$, 49, 48, $48\frac{3}{4}$, $48\frac{1}{2}$, 50, and 52. On the Frankfort Bourse, the rate of United States 5-20 bonds since the 1st inst. has ruled about the same, viz.:—Bonds of 1862, payable in 1881, 42½; do. 1864, payable in 1881, 40¾ and 40½; do. do. payable in 1882, 40¼ and 40¾.

CONFEDERATE COTTON LOAN.

The market has been remarkably steady this week, in the face of a general flatness in the stock market, under the impression of approaching peace, coupled with the present strong position of the Southern Confederacy. The price has advanced from 74 to 75 per cent., to 79½, 80, ex dividend and drawing.

CONFEDERATE COMMERCIAL REGULATIONS.

The attention of those engaged in the blockade-running trade is invited to the revised regulations under the 'Act to impose restrictions,' &c., issued by the new Confederate Secretary of the Treasury, and which appear in our advertising columns. These regulations differ in only a few, but important, particulars from those previously published by the authority of Mr. Memminger. Among the points of difference are the reduction of the rate of freight to be paid by the Confederate Government, from 6*d.* to 5*d.* per pound on shipments, and from 25*l.* to 20*l.* per ton on importations; and the valuation of cotton delivered by the Confederate Government at 1*s.* instead of 10*d.* per pound. It is clear, therefore, that the new Secretary is determined to carry out the recent commercial policy of the Confederate Government with even greater stringency than his predecessor. This cannot fail to affect favourably the quotations of the Confederate Cotton Loan, already now with rapid and steady steps approaching its par value.

MEETINGS OF PUBLIC COMPANIES, ETC.

At special meetings of the Credit Foncier and Credit Mobilier of England just held, it was unanimously agreed that the two companies should be amalgamated. The reports of these companies, which were read at the meetings, showed a clear profit of 190 per cent. per annum, in addition to carrying 40,000*l.* to the reserve funds; and it was stated by the chairman that the prospects for the future were quite as promising as the past. In order to enlarge the sphere of operations it was agreed to enlarge the capital to 2,000,000*l.*, divided into 100,000 shares of 20*l.* each. Of these shares, 80,000 will be issued to the present shareholders in the two companies, and the remaining 20,000 to the public at a premium of 2*l.* 13*s.* 4*d.* per share. It is contemplated that it will not be necessary to call up more than 5*l.* per share. It is stated that the amount of paid-up capital will then be 500,000*l.*, and that the total premiums, amounting to 160,000*l.*, will increase the reserve fund of the amalgamated company to 200,000*l.*—At an extraordinary general meeting of the proprietors of the Bank of British Columbia, the resolutions passed at a former meeting were confirmed: they were to the effect that the directors be authorised to establish such branches in the western parts of North America, as Her Majesty would be graciously pleased to allow; that the unpaid capital of the company should not be called up until, in the opinion of the directors, it was desirable that it should be so called; that it was desirable to issue notes and bills payable at the place of issue and at no other place; and that the directors be authorised to apply for a new charter, and that all the provisions of the supplemental charter should be the laws of the company as if the same had been the original charter.

PROGRESS OF ENTERPRISE.

The prospectus has been issued of the Chilian Mining and Trading Company, with a proposed capital of 340,000*l.* in 17,000 shares of 20*l.* each. The Company is brought out for the purpose of purchasing and working two copper mines in Chili, called Descubridora and San Pedro, and of acquiring certain valuable freehold premises, plant, &c., with the existing trade therewith, at the ports of Chanaral and Pau D'Asucar. It is stated that arrangements have been made by the Company for the purchase of the first-named mine for 135,000*l.*, and of the latter property for 160,000*l.*, the vendors taking amongst themselves and friends capital to the amount of one-fourth of the purchase money.—The Scottish Indian Tea Company have just issued a prospectus asking for a capital of 100,000*l.* in 10,000 shares of 10*l.* each. The object of the undertaking is to encourage the special cultivation of tea; and should the provisional agreement be carried out, the Company will commence operations with at least 400 acres in plant, and will extend the planting and cultivation of tea over the portion of the estates yet uncleared.—The Wanzer Sewing Machine Company is another undertaking just brought out, the object being the purchase of the patent of a sewing machine, which, it is alleged, is capable of performing any sort of work. The patentees have agreed to receive in payment paid-up shares to the amount of 25,000*l.*, and will not take any dividends until the Company shall have repaid out of profits the whole amount of the capital advanced by the other shareholders. The capital required is 50,000*l.*, which, it is proposed, shall be raised in 500 shares of 100*l.* each.—The Merchandise Marks Association is a Company established for the purpose of giving a more practical effect to the Merchandise Marks Act, and to protect traders and others from the spurious imitations so frequently put forward. In addition to the shareholders, there is to be a list of subscribers, who are to possess the advantages of the Association on the payment of an annual subscription. The capital asked for is only 20,000*l.*, in shares of 10*l.* each.

THE COURSE OF THE PRODUCE MARKETS.

In the produce markets business continues for the most part very dull, with prices drooping but not seriously depressed. The protracted inactivity is attributable chiefly to the dearness of money and to the uncertainty that is felt as to whether it may not yet be dearer. There has, however, been in nearly every department an absence of speculation of any magnitude for so long a time that, as a rule, the markets are in a sound condition, and hence it is that prices remain free from any violent fluctuations. The general trade of the country also is sufficiently extensive to keep up a fair legitimate demand for most kinds of produce, and whilst purchases are are confined to the mere requirements of the immediate period, and business has consequently an inanimate appearance; there is sufficient doing to work off arrivals as they take place. No undue accumulation of stock is therefore going on to disturb the confidence of importers as to the future course of prices, as far as they may be regulated by the effect of supplies. Cotton has formed an exception to the generally steady character of the markets, prices having fallen fully 1*d.* per lb. under the combined influence of dear money and the more pacific aspect of affairs in America. The provision trade is dull, and butters of all kinds are rather cheaper, the weather recently having been more favourable for production. American sells at 90*s.* to 108*s.* for fair to fine qualities. In bacon there is very little change; but present high rates are not expected to be maintained as curing is more active. Cheese is rather more in demand and firm in price; good Americans, 50*s.* to 58*s.* per cwt. Lard is dearer, with a better enquiry. Petroleum continues dull of sale, and offers at 2*s.* 1*d.* per gallon on the spot for American refined, and at 2*s.* 2*d.* for the last three months' delivery. Rough is quoted 18*l.* per tun. In turpentine the dealings, which are restricted, are confined solely to French at 67*s.* 6*d.* per cwt. Rosin is firm at 31*s.* to 42*s.* for American and 26*s.* to 34*s.* for French. Seed oils of all kinds are depressed. Linseed oil offers at 35*s.* 6*d.*; pale rape, at 46*s.*, and brown at 42*s.* 6*d.* per cwt. Oilcake is not saleable in quantity, except on easier terms, but general quotations are as yet not materially altered.

LIVERPOOL, Wednesday, September 7.—The slight improvement manifested in our cotton market last week has not been maintained, either as regards business or prices. The dealings have again become very limited, but quotations, although only a fraction lower, close with less firmness. The sales this week have been only 23,000 bales, of which 8,000 were on speculation and for export. The sales this year, down to the present time, have been 1,858,910 bales, and to the corresponding period in 1863, 1,559,020 bales. There have been imported this year 1,501,063 bales, against 1,020,846 bales last year. The trade have taken this year 1,152,211 bales, and in 1863, 867,614 bales. The exports this year have amounted to 385,376 bales, and to the same time last year, 303,886 bales. There have been taken on speculation this year, 314,254 bales; same in 1863, 354,382 bales. The estimated stocks at the present time are 250,903 bales; at the corresponding period last year they were 239,341 bales. The closing quotations to-day were, American descriptions, 27¼*d.* to 29*d.*; Pernambuco, 29¼*d.* to 30*d.*; Maranham, 29¾*d.* to 30*d.*; Maceio, 28¾*d.* to 29*d.*; Bahia, 28¾*d.* to 29*d.*; Egyptian, 24*d.* to 31*d.*; Smyrna, 24¼*d.* to 24½*d.*; Surats, 14*d.* to 23½*d.*; Bengal, 14¼*d.* to 15*d.*; Scinde, 14½*d.* to 15*d.*; China, 17*d.* to 19½*d.*

The markets at Manchester have this week exhibited increased dulness in all departments, and in the present unsettled state of affairs there appears no disposition to press business in any department. In shipping yarns, there has been scarcely anything doing, particularly in the finer descriptions, and spinners under the circumstances have shown a disposition to press sales. The market for home trade yarns is also particularly dull, and manufacturers show no inclination to purchase; they regard with extreme anxiety the advices from America, and to the effect which they have already produced on the money market in this country. They are buying only in retail and for immediate requirements, and those who are not in urgent want for their mills refrain from purchasing at all. There seems to be an increasing inclination on the part both of spinners and manufacturers to lessen production, and to close their mills unless there is a better prospect of an improvement in trade. In the cloth market affairs appear to be in a worse predicament than in the other departments, and sellers are not receiving any offers, merchants appearing determined at present to refrain from purchasing. There is no doubt that cloths can now be purchased on easier terms than last week, though to what extent it is quite impossible to say. From nearly all the markets both at home and abroad as to the extent of stocks on hand the accounts are favourable, as being likely to have an effect on prices. The closing official quotations are as under:—⅞ Grey Printers, 8*s.* 6*d.* to 16*s.* 6*d.*, according to quality; ⅞ Grey Madapollams, 7*s.* 7½*d.* to 10*s.* 1½*d.*; ⅞ Grey Printers, 11*s.* 7½*d.* to 18*s.*; ¾ Grey Shirtings, 12*s.* 9*d.* to 27*s.*; Water Twist, No. 20, 2*s.* 2*d.* to 2*s.* 9½*d.*; No. 30, 2*s.* 7*d.* to 3*s.* 1*d.*; No. 40, 3*s.* to 3*s.* 6*d.*; Mule Twist, No. 20, 1*s.* 10*d.* to 2*s.* 8*d.*; No. 30, 2*s.* 3*d.* to 2*s.* 10*d.*; No. 40, 2*s.* 5½*d.* to 3*s.* 3*d.*; No. 50, 2*s.* 10*d.* to 3*s.* 5*d.*; No. 60, 2*s.* 11*d.* to 3*s.* 7*d.*; No. 70, 3*s.* 1*d.* to 3*s.* 9*d.*; No. 80, 3*s.* 5*d.* to 3*s.* 11*d.*; No. 90, 3*s.* 7*d.* to 4*s.* 1*d.*; and No. 100, 3*s.* 10*d.* to 4*s.* 8*d.*

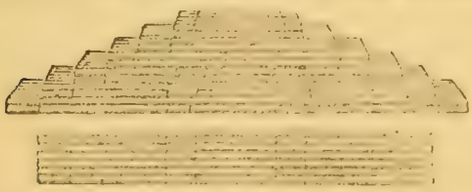
DUNCAN'S PATENT RATAN CANE SPLINTS.



THESE Splints are introduced and recommended to the Faculty for the great advantages which they possess above others,—viz., their comfort, coolness, and durability, as well as the facility with which they may be applied to the fractured limb.

As cleanliness is an important consideration, these Splints possess that quality pre-eminently, as they may be readily washed without the slightest fear of injury.

They are especially adapted to the constant usage of the General Hospital, and the movements of an Army on Service, as they cannot easily be injured. For Colonial practice they are recommended for the same reason.

They have been submitted to, and have received the approbation of, the Principal Medical Officers of the Army Medical Department.

The Splints cannot be injured by moisture; and are manufactured either with or without pads.

REGULATIONS TO CARRY INTO EFFECT THE ACT TO IMPOSE REGULATIONS UPON THE FOREIGN COMMERCE OF THE CONFEDERATE STATES, TO PROVIDE FOR THE PUBLIC DEFENCE, APPROVED FEBRUARY 6, 1864.

I.—As to the Sea.

1. The owners of any vessel intending to sail from a Confederate port with a cargo consisting in whole or in part of cotton, tobacco, military and naval stores, sugar, molasses, or rice, shall, before the lading on board of any such articles, file with the collector of the port from which the vessel is to sail a copy of her register, with a declaration of the names of the owners and officers thereof, the place of their birth, and of their residence for the preceding year, together with the port or place to which the said vessel proposes to sail. The said declaration shall also set forth the quantity and value, in Confederate currency, of the cargo proposed to be taken out, as also the consent of the said owners that one-half of the tonnage of the said vessel may be employed by the Confederate Government for its own use, both on the outward and homeward voyage, at the rate of freight hereinafter mentioned. The collector shall submit a statement as to the owners and officers to the military commandant of the port; and if he shall not object to their loyalty, or to the sailing vessel, for reasons of military necessity, the collector shall grant a permit for the lading of said vessel, one-half for account of the owners, and one-half for account of the Confederate States.

2. Before the said lading shall be completed, the owners of the vessel shall execute to the Confederate States a bond in one-half the value of the vessel, with security deemed adequate by the collector, conditioned that she will pursue the voyage designated, and that she will return with reasonable despatch to a Confederate port, after her outward cargo shall be discharged, with a cargo consisting one-half of articles not prohibited by the laws of the Confederate Government, and the other half of such articles as the Government shall offer for shipment from such port, at the rate of freight hereinafter mentioned.

3. Each shipper of any portion of the cargo proposed to be laden on board the said vessel shall, before the lading thereof, make application to the collector for a permit to lade the same; which application shall declare the articles to be shipped, and the quantity and value thereof in Confederate currency, the port of destination, and the name of the consignee. A permit shall then be granted by the collector, if the application is deemed satisfactory. The lading shall be had under the inspection of a revenue officer, who shall be charged with the duty of seeing that the goods laden conform to the permit.

4. Before the completion of the lading on board, or the granting a clearance, each shipper of any portion of the cargo shall execute and deliver to the collector a bond to the Confederate States, in one-half the value of his shipment in Confederate money, with security deemed adequate by the collector, with condition that at least one-half the net proceeds of said shipment shall be invested in goods or articles not prohibited by law; and said goods or articles shall be shipped by the same or some other vessel to the Confederate States within sixty days from the unlading of said cargo.

5. The freight to be paid by the Confederate States on all cotton and tobacco shipped from a Confederate port shall be fivepence sterling per pound, payable on delivery at the port of destination, in coin or sterling exchange. Return freight shall be at the rate of 20*l.* per ton, payable on its delivery in a Confederate port, in cotton, at twelvepence sterling per pound for middling uplands, and at a proportionate price for cotton of other qualities; or, at the option of the Government, in specie or sterling exchange. In calculating the ton of freight by weight, 2,240 pounds shall be allowed; by measure, forty cubic feet shall be allowed.

6. The rates of freight for articles other than cotton and tobacco shall be adjusted at the same relative rate, and payable in the same way.

7. The Government reserves the right to limit or prohibit the shipment of rosin, turpentine, or any manufacture thereof, whenever deemed dangerous to its own shipment.

8. Upon the completion of the lading of the vessel, and before receiving her clearance, there shall be delivered to the collector, in addition to the usual manifest, another, setting forth the names, ages, and description of the officers and crew, and of every passenger intending to sail in her. The said last-mentioned manifest shall be delivered to the commandant of the port, who shall thereupon cause the entire vessel to be searched; and if satisfied that the parties on board are persons who may safely be permitted to leave the Confederacy, and that the passengers have the proper passports, he shall certify the same on the manifest, and return the same to the collector; whereupon, and not before, a clearance shall be granted to the vessel, and she shall be permitted to sail.

9. The owners of each vessel, and of each portion of a cargo, sailing from a Confederate port, shall be allowed to take up their respective bonds by producing to the collector the certificate of the proper agent of the Confederate Government at the port of delivery, setting forth the particulars, showing that the said party has complied with the obligation of the said bonds so far as the same was practicable; and the collector, upon being duly satisfied, shall be authorised to surrender the said bonds.

10. Nothing in these regulations shall be so construed as to conflict with the proviso of the law which declares 'that nothing in this Act shall be construed to prohibit the Confederate States, or any of them, from exporting any of the articles herein enumerated on their own account,' nor shall a bond be required of a State in any case.

11. The penalties of all bonds executed in conformity with these regulations shall be recoverable in full, on proof of breach of the conditions of the bond, and without proof of any damage suffered by the Confederate States in consequence of such breach; and all bonds shall be executed in such form as to give effect to this regulation.

12. Vessels sent into the Confederacy for the purpose of exporting cotton received in payment of any Confederate bond or obligation, shall be subject to these regulations only so far as relates to such portion of the tonnage, if any, as may remain vacant after the lading of the cotton received in payment as aforesaid.

13. Whenever any vessel shall bring into the Confederate States an entire cargo for account of the Confederate States, the owners of the said vessel and the shippers of her cargo shall be relieved from the bonds previously given to invest and bring in one half of the net proceeds of her outward cargo; and the certificate of the agent of the Treasury Department, at the port of lading, that such cargo was duly shipped in pursuance of the regulations, shall authorise the collector to cancel and surrender the said bonds.

G. A. Trenholm, Secretary of the Treasury.
J. A. Seddon, Secretary of War.
Approved August 3, 1864,
Jefferson Davis.

5. The following additional oath or affirmation shall be taken by each master or person having charge or command of any ship or vessel which shall arrive at any port of the Confederate States after the 1st of March, 1864, viz.: 'I further swear (or affirm) that there are not, to the best of my knowledge and belief, on board (insert the denomination and name of the vessel) any goods, wares, or merchandise, the importation of which into the Confederate States is prohibited by law; and I do further swear (or affirm) that if I shall hereafter discover or know of any such goods, wares, or merchandise, on board of the said vessel, or which shall have been imported in the same, I will immediately, and without delay, report the same to the collector of this district.'

6. Each importer, consignee, or agent shall at the time of entering any goods imported after the said 1st of March, 1864, take the follow additional oath, viz.: 'I also swear (or affirm) that there are not, to the best of my knowledge and belief, amongst the said goods, wares, or merchandise, imported or consigned as aforesaid, any goods, wares, or merchandise, the importation of which into the Confederate States is prohibited by law; and I do further swear (or affirm) that if I shall hereafter discover any such goods, wares, or merchandise, imported or consigned as aforesaid, I will immediately, and without delay, report the same to the collector of this district.

THE NEGRO UNDER FEDERAL RULE.

THE CORPS D'AFRIQUE.

NEW ORLEANS, LOUISIANA: August 21, 1864.

THE extracts from an official report upon the condition of the 'free labourers' on the 'Government plantations,' which I communicated in a late letter, revealed in a most painful manner the evils incident to violent and sudden emancipation. The result would doubtless have been the same no matter what might have been the motives of the emancipators. A great social system like Southern slavery cannot be overturned in a day without seriously disturbing, if not actually destroying, every interest dependent upon it; and 'every interest' is but another term for the industrial resources and productive power of the country. Few pretend that the interests of the country, North or South, or the welfare of the black man were consulted in the war against slavery. If either were, 'I can't see it,' at least here in Louisiana; and I am sure that here the experiment of free labour has had a fairer trial, been more propped up, and indulged, and petted, and rewarded, and has had more and higher inducements held out to it for good behaviour, than in any other Southern Department. Indeed, the white labourers might well envy the black labourer of the 'Government plantations' the many privileges accorded him—on paper. The great difficulty is to secure to the 'free labourer' the realisation of these privileges. I must, however, reserve for a future occasion some general remarks upon the condition of the freed men and women upon Government plantations. At present I shall confine myself to the narration of a few facts regarding the negro as a 'soldier of freedom.' When the 'contrabands' in Louisiana began to be numbered by the thousands, the Federal authorities saw they had, in common parlance, drawn an elephant. Upwards of twenty thousand of these contrabands were being supported at the public expense. Such a practice continued for any time must prove fatal to even the best disposed and most intelligent of labouring classes. Judge then of its effects upon the fugitive slaves. Of course they were idle and vicious, vagabondising around the city and the camps, and generating a physical and a moral pestilence among the orderly, industrious, and contented negroes of the city. The most unreasoning of the worshippers of the 'ebony idol' saw and admitted the great and threatening evil of this emancipation by war. It would not pay, but they were determined to make it pay. The plans were to put the women, children, and old men on the plantations, and to put the able-bodied men in the army, with a distinct organisation, to be known as the Corps d'Afrique. The following history of this organisation is given on the authority of a letter from an officer of the Corps d'Afrique:—

'When the order of organisation was promulgated, it contemplated the organisation of eighteen regiments of five hundred men each, with the same number of officers as in the regiments of one thousand.' [Thus affording a multitude of commissions for young gentlemen of idle habits and faint hearts, who, being subject to conscription, might otherwise have been forced to serve in the ranks of the white troops.] 'There were already three full regiments organised several months previous, and General Ulman had already commenced recruiting for the five regiments known as "Ulman's Brigade." These eight regiments were made the nucleus of the new corps; and during the summer and autumn of 1863, through the channels opened by the progress of the campaign, there were men enough enlisted to swell the number of regiments to twenty-five. But, unfortunately, it was found that the physical qualifications of the negroes were not equal to the hardships of drill and fatigue duty, many of them having in them the seeds of old and surely fatal diseases brought on by the vicious habits of plantation life, and many others being as yet young and immature in body and marked by hereditary taints.'

Strange how prejudice will blind the judgment 'Vicious habits of plantation life,' 'seeds of old and surely fatal diseases,' and 'hereditary taints' are notoriously untrue. The conditions of slavery do not tolerate them; the planters' interests are against their prevalence; and the great increase of the blacks of the South—greater than that of the whites North or South—proves that the plantation life of the Southern slave enjoys a greater immunity from want and all the ills that flesh is heir to than is enjoyed by the freest labourers in the Old or New World. Numerous grandparents and mothers who can count their offspring by the score are to be seen on almost every plantation. However much we may differ about its morality, we cannot question the fact that this system of American slavery is highly favourable to the physical well-being of the African. The officer knows nothing about plantation life. His recruits acquired their 'seeds of diseases,' 'hereditary taints,' &c., while vagabondising around the camps and the city.

'It is surprising, to one unacquainted with the subject, to contemplate the terrible rate of mortality, and to learn how many have lung and heart diseases, or are broken down by rheumatic affections, overwork, and ill-usage. Thousands died, were discharged for disability, or deserted.'

The regiments dwindled down from five hundred to two or three hundred: recruiting was stopped by the order of General Banks, which contemplated the retention of as many able-bodied blacks as possible on the Government plantations; officers began to grow discouraged; resignations became the order of the day; disappointment on the pay question demoralised the men. When the campaign commenced this season, four regiments were ordered to the field. To fill them up to six hundred men each, it was necessary to transfer men from three or four other regiments, leaving to each company of the latter only its officers and ten men. Very little remains of the original corps, save in the regretful recollections of its officers.

What the future of the corps will be depends now upon the question of expediency—Will the possible interests or necessities of our standing army warrant the enormous expense of organising and drilling coloured troops, and bringing them up to the standard of white troops? As the resources of the South, agriculturally, are called out, the demand for labour of acclimatised blacks will increase; if the available number is diminished by the requirements of a large army, there will be an increased opposition to maintaining black regiments. To fill up the black regiments in this department alone would require twenty thousand recruits, and the relative mortality of white and black troops seems to indicate that it would be better to let the present black organisation die out, and supply their places, if the necessity continued, from the army of foreigners now seeking our shores. Besides this reason, there is another entering into consideration—namely, the greater cost of maintaining coloured troops. They are undeniably idle, lazy, unproductive, and wasteful. The loss by wear and tear, such as the expense of keeping up their uniforms and equipments, of camp and garrison equipage, and all kinds of military stores and property, promises to exceed very greatly the corresponding expenditure for white troops, and it is scarcely a matter of doubt that their services are far less valuable, both in quality and quantity, to the Government.' There is one Northern man at least who has learned something since he came South, and who tells his experience very candidly too, bating a little prejudice, the result doubtless of a want of better acquaintance with his subject. This confirms what the South has been telling us for years, that the free blacks 'are undeniably idle, lazy, unproductive, and wasteful.' As 'Soldiers of the Army of Freedom,' 'thousands died, were discharged for disability, or deserted.' In other words, the Corps d'Afrique was soon an exploded humbug. The North thought the black man ought to fight for his freedom, and that he would gladly seize the chance to meet his former oppressors in the open field. But poor Sambo could not appreciate the privilege, and did not seem to have any oppressor's wrong to wipe out. Death relieved thousands of them from the cruel hardships and tyranny of military rule; as many more sought escape in desertion, till now 'twenty thousand new recruits are required to fill up the black regiments in this Department.'

General Banks saw all this as clearly and as soon as any other man, and his admission of the failure of the Corps d'Afrique is given to the world in his general orders of February 3, 1864, organising the 'free labour system,' which transferred the negro from the camp to the plantation—his only field of usefulness. Banks has been much censured for these orders, and doubtless they sound very inconsistent in the mouth of an American Abolitionist. They were, however, the conclusions of a ripe experience, derived from actual contact with the fugitive slaves; and though the orders give the endorsement of a lifelong Abolitionist to the dictum of the South that the black man will not voluntarily labour even for himself, still experience sanctioned them, the Adjutant-General of the United States approved and amplified them, and the 'free labour system' has proved a blessing to—no, not to the black man, but to many of the philanthropic but needy planters from the North. Now the policy of Banks is reversed by General Canby. In accordance with instructions from the latter, Banks orders that 'all able-bodied men of colour, between the ages of eighteen and forty years, be enlisted for the military service of the United States, under the direction of the Superintendent of Recruiting Service for United States Coloured Troops.' And the order is being carried out relentlessly. So sweeping has been the conscription among the plantation labourers that the crops are almost wholly neglected. There can hardly be a third of the ordinary yield. In the city the conscription has been equally sweeping, and attended with many painful and amusing scenes in the dodges and expedients of the poor hunted blacks to escape the 'tender mercies' of their self-elected and self-vaunted friends. Those philanthropic planters who came down here 'to labour in the interests of God and humanity,' and turn an honest or dishonest penny, are indignant with General Canby. They are about to memorialise President Lincoln, representing to him how the agricultural interests must suffer if the 'plantation hands' be conscripted. Every novus homo of them talks as glibly of his 'hands,' his plantation, and his crops, as though he were 'native here and to the manor born.' It would be idle for them to seek redress from General Canby or General Banks; the former makes the civil policy entirely subordinate to the military, and Banks, to whom they owe their present stations, is powerless to help them.

To escape conscription the negroes fled to the swamps, across the lines into Dixie, or to the city. They found but a temporary refuge here, for they were run to earth as remorselessly as was ever poor reynard. They could not stand such treatment from their friends, and a number of the creole negroes of the city sent Banks a letter of remonstrance. The remonstrants are the immediate representatives of a very peculiar class of the coloured population—for the most part free, possessing some little means, a very limited education, in complexion representing every shade known to the human family. Both the American and the French (creole) population of the city regard these hybrids as an unmitigated curse to the community. The women are the great 'social evil,' while the men are 'idle, lazy, wasteful, and unproductive,' and the morals of neither have improved by contact with the Northerner—military or civilian. In his reply to their remonstrance, General Banks 'has the honour' to speak of this class of the community as 'citizens,' which they are not, unless his ipse dixit makes them such. Judging from his intimate association with them—their frequent dinings and suppings at his house, and his well-known penchant for a quadroon soirée dansante—he would no doubt be glad to recognise them as the first citizens. I subjoin the General's reply:—

'Headquarters Department of the Gulf,
New Orleans, Aug. 17, 1864.

'Messrs. T. M. Poree, and others, New Orleans:

'Gentlemen,—In answer to your memorial, which I have this day received, I have the honour to say that the arrest of the persons you represent was not only without orders, but against order, and no intention has been entertained of disturbing the people of this city by any forcible enlistments.

'Some days since, prominent citizens of New Orleans represented that there were many hundred negroes without employment, and without visible means of support, in the swamps and woods about the city, escaping regular labour, and indulging in the propensities which vagrants are inclined to follow.

'Instructions were given to ascertain if this were a fact, and, if the statement was found to be true, to have such men enlisted in the army. Under a misapprehension of orders, the officers intrusted with the duty made arrests of citizens employed in regular business within the limits of the city. As soon as the fact was known, the order was given for their release without exception. All measures will be taken to prevent the recurrence of these arrests. I regret exceedingly that any well-disposed citizen should have been disturbed in his employment or in his family.

'I recognise the alacrity with which the people you represent organised the regiments in 1862, and also at the time when the safety of the city was threatened in 1863, during the siege of Port Hudson, and acknowledge with great pleasure the obligations which the Government of the United States owes to you and to them.

'With much respect, your obedient servant,

'N. P. BANKS,
Major-General Commanding.'

FEDERAL SUBSTITUTES.—A New York paper published the following extract from a letter written by a member of the 11th New Hampshire Regiment: 'Of the 300 that started for our regiment last winter only 175 ever reached it, and these were Italians, Spaniards, Irishmen, Dutchmen, Frenchmen, Englishmen, Australians, Portuguese, and Hungarians. Do not think this exaggerated, for there were men from all these nations, and probably some others were represented that I do not think of. On the way from Tennessee to Annapolis the majority of the 175 left us, and glad we were to get rid of them. It is the same all through the army. We have under guard now six Frenchmen, one Indian, one half breed, one Spaniard, five Irishmen, and the remainder I should judge were a conglomeration of all races under the sun. Last week we had one Turk and a couple of Australians. The next quota I expect we shall have a couple of hyenas and whole battalions of apes. If the people of the North are not willing to help us fight the rebellion, but to every call for more troops they send us nothing but these miserable things, we shall soon have scarcely any army left, and the war must cease for that very reason.'

Notes on Events of the Week.

AMERICA.

VERY graphic accounts are given in the Northern papers of the gathering at Chicago. Not only crowds of Western men, but crowds from the far East, poured into the city in which was to be held the National Democratic Convention. On August 29 the streets were filled from early morning with people who were never tired of cheering the delegations as they appeared with party banners and with bands of music. The pressure was so great in the amphitheatre, where the Convention was held, that a part of the flooring gave way, but no one was hurt. At 12 o'clock the Convention was called to order by the Hon. A. Belmont, chairman of the National Democratic Committee. Governor Bigler of Pennsylvania was chosen for temporary President. He briefly addressed the Convention. He remarked that after three years 'of a war unparalleled in modern times for its magnitude and for its barbarous desolations,' the hopes of the Union 'are in no wise improved.' A different policy must be adopted, 'one which will bear no conditions precedent to the restoration of the Union, but which will diligently seek that result as the return of permanent peace amongst the people.' The resolutions offered by the various delegations were read and referred to the Committee of Resolutions. The Convention, after the transaction of formal business, adjourned to the next day, the Committees remaining in session and the several delegations meeting in Caucus. At night open-air mass meetings were held, one of which was attended by 60,000 people.

At the meeting of the Convention on the 30th, Mr. Harris of Maryland censured the course pursued by General M'Clellan in ordering the arrest of the members of the Maryland Legislature. General M'Clellan was warmly defended by Governor Morgan of Ohio, who said that M'Clellan had acted on testimony which he then regarded as credible. After this discussion, Governor Seymour, who had been chosen President, took the chair amidst great enthusiasm. He said the Democratic party would bring back union, peace, and liberty. He protested against the party in power because 'they will not let the shedding of blood cease even for a little time to see if Christian charity or the wisdom of statesmanship may not work out a method to save our country.' It was not from want of courage and devotion on the part of the troops that the Administration had failed. But it had failed, for 'even now the Government declare in the edict of a general that rebellious discontent has worked northward to the shores of the great lakes. The guaranteed right of the people to bear arms has been trampled under foot up to the very borders of Canada, so that American servitude is put in contrast with British liberty.' In conclusion he urged upon the Convention the importance of unanimity, saying, 'In all probability the future destiny of our country hangs upon our action.' Governor Seymour was loudly cheered.

In the afternoon session the following resolutions were presented and adopted with only four dissenting voices:—

Resolved: That in the future, as in the past, we will adhere with unswerving fidelity to the Union under the Constitution as the only solid foundation for our strength, security, and happiness as a people, and as a framework of government equally conducive to the welfare and prosperity of all the States, both Northern and Southern.

Resolved: That this Convention does explicitly declare as the sense of the American people, that after four years of failure to restore the Union by the experiment of war—during which, under the pretence of a military necessity, or war, the Constitution itself has been disregarded in every respect, and public liberty and private rights alike trodden down, and the material prosperity of the country essentially impaired—justice, humanity, liberty, and the public welfare demand that immediate efforts be made for a cessation of hostilities with a view to an ultimate Convention of all the States or other peaceable means, to the end that at the earliest practicable moment peace may be restored on the basis of the Federal Union of the States.

Resolved: That the direct interference of the military authority of the United States in the recent elections held in Kentucky, Maryland, Missouri, and Delaware, was a shameful violation of the Constitution, and a repetition of such acts in the approaching election will be held as revolutionary, and resisted with all the means and power under our control.

Resolved: That the aim and object of the Democratic party is to preserve the Federal Union and the rights of the States unimpaired, and they hereby declare that they consider Administrative usurpation of extraordinary and dangerous powers not granted by the Constitution—the subversion of the civil power by military law in States not in insurrection—the arbitrary military arrest, imprisonment, trial, and sentence of American citizens in States where civil law exists in full force—the suppression of freedom of speech and of the press—the denial of the right of asylum—the open and avowed disregard of State rights—the employment of unusual test oaths—and the interference with, and denial of, the right of the people to bear arms—as calculated to prevent a restoration of the Union and the perpetuation of a government deriving its just powers from the consent of the governed.

Resolved: That the shameful disregard of the Administration of its duty in respect to our fellow-citizens who now and long have been prisoners of war in a suffering condition, deserves the severest reprobation on the score alike of public and common humanity.

On August 31 the Convention assembled at 10 o'clock. Mr. Wickliffe said the delegates of the West were of opinion that circumstances may occur before the 4th of next month which would render another meeting of the Democratic Convention necessary. He therefore moved the following resolution, which was unanimously adopted:

Resolved: That this Convention shall not be dissolved by the adjournment at the close of its business, but shall remain organised, subject to be called at any time and place that the executive national committee shall designate.

The Convention then proceeded to nominate a candidate for the Presidency. The vote was taken by States. The result of the first ballot was: M'Clellan, 162; other votes, 64. The result of the final ballot was: M'Clellan, 202½; Thomas H. Seymour, 23½. The announcement of the vote was, we are told, 'welcomed by the wildest enthusiastic cheers from the multitude.' Mr. Vallandigham moved that the nomination of General M'Clellan be the unanimous sense of the Convention. Mr. M'Kean, of New York, seconded the nomination, which was carried by acclamation.

Mr. George H. Pendleton, of Ohio, was unanimously chosen as candidate for Vice-President.

A communication was read from the chairman of the German People's Association of New York, claiming to represent 200,000 citizens, and accompanied by resolutions pledging the members of the Association to the support of the Chicago nominees. The communication was filed.

Mr. Wickliffe offered a resolution to the effect that Kentucky expects the first act of M'Clellan, when elected, will be to open Lincoln's prison doors and set the prisoners free. Carried unanimously.

After loud and long-continued cheering for the ticket, the Convention adjourned, subject to the call of the National Committee.

ON August 25 there was a battle near Reams Station, on the Weldon railroad, which the Federals describe as one of the most desperate fights of this war. The Federals under General Hancock were assaulted by the Confederates under General Hill. After two unsuccessful attacks the Confederates made a terrific onslaught, pierced the Federal line, drove the enemy back in confusion, and recovered four miles of the railroad. It is admitted that the Federal losses are very heavy, and that the 5th Corps alone lost 5,000 men. Mr. Stanton says that he thinks the Confederates lost 10,000 killed and wounded in the last two weeks, and adds, 'We have lost heavily, but ours has been mostly in captured.' Now, when many prisoners are taken, either the enemy is beaten or the men surrender rather than fight; but in either case it is not possible that the side which takes the prisoners should lose more in killed and wounded than the side which surrenders them.

IT was reported that General Early was retreating on Richmond, of course, 'hotly pursued' by Sheridan. At the latest dates, however, it was stated that 'General Early was still in Sheridan's front.'

MR. STANTON has announced the occupation of Atlanta by the Federals, but the report was not fully credited in New York. According to Mr. Stanton's information, the Confederates evacuated Atlanta, and a severe but indecisive fight took place at East Point. The Confederates are said to have retired to Macon. At all events, Hood held Atlanta long enough to remove all the valuable machinery from that city. It is reported that Generals Wheeler, Reddy, and Forrest have joined their forces, are operating in Sherman's rear, and destroying the railroad between Nashville and Murfreesboro'. Whether Sherman has or has not occupied Atlanta, this movement renders his position critical. Before him is Hood's army, and in his rear there is a powerful force threatening his communications.

FORT MORGAN has been surrendered, but not without a fight. After a heavy bombardment from sea and land, General Page gave up the contest. In his official despatch Admiral Farragut states that the guns were spiked, and adds: 'There was every reason to believe that this had been done after the white flag had been raised.' It would have been better to give some of the reasons for this suspicion. Admiral Farragut also says: 'Fort Morgan never fired a gun after the commencement of the bombardment.' Why the fort should be bombarded for twenty-four hours without making any reply is not easy to understand, unless we suppose there was no ammunition. If they did not intend to fight, we must admire the heroism which induced them to risk their lives whilst they were destroying the guns, &c. By surrendering with all the matériel in order, they could have avoided the danger.

THE Confederates under Colonel Shelby, on August 23, captured nearly a whole Federal regiment between Duval Bluff and Little Rock, Arkansas.

FRANZ MÜLLER, charged with the murder of Mr. Briggs, has been surrendered to the British authorities. Mr. Schaffer, who defended the prisoner, contended that, as there is war—unsolemn war—between England and the United States, the extradition treaty is not binding. Mr. Schaffer talked for a long time about the Alabama, the Tallahassee, and the 'Stars,' but he could not procure the release of his client.

THE Tallahassee was off New Inlet, North Carolina, on August 25, and was attacked by the United States gunboat Monticello. The Tallahassee returned the fire, and the next day was lying securely under the guns of Fort Fisher. We are told, 'she was saluted by the fort, and returned the compliment in sight of the Union fleet, which seemed to be incompetent to prevent her escape.' It is also said that another 'rebel privateer' has entered the port of Wilmington.

THE New York money market has been greatly excited. On August 30, under the influence of the platform of the ChicagoConvention which was regarded as promising peace, the price of gold fell to 231½. Next day there was a rally to 243½, and on September 2 it was quoted at 254½, being a rise of 23 per cent. in two days. To show how little the war news affects the market in the present anticipation of peace, we find that, on September 3, when it was doubted if Sherman had occupied Atlanta, gold fell 14 per cent., being quoted at 240½.

ENGLAND.

To sportsmen who above all things love to see the best horse win, the Great Doncaster St. Leger of 1864 must afford unbounded satisfaction. In our columns last week a slight résumé of the victories and defeats of the expected candidates for the prize of 'horse-breeding Yorkshire,' and of their pretensions to success, was given. It is not necessary, therefore, again to dwell on these points of interest. It will be sufficient to remind the reader that an opinion was clearly expressed that the race would be confined to Blair Athol and General Peel, before whose prowess all the champions of the 'outside' division would undoubtedly fail. The weather yesterday was most inauspicious, and the dense multitude who had assembled on the Town Moor, impelled not as at Epsom by a mere desire to make holiday, but by a deep-rooted and unconquerable devotion to horses and horse-racing, were compelled to endure throughout the afternoon a strong wind and a driving rain. Before the race Blair Athol had returned to the position of first favourite at the odds of 2 to 1, while 11 to 4 was laid against General Peel, 6 to 1 against the Miner, 7 to 1 against Baragah, 100 to 6 against Lord Stamford's Cambuscan, who was, however, heavily backed for a place, and 25 to 1 each against Ely and the Knight of Snowdon. Brindisi and Black Rock figured at 50 to 1. At a quarter to three o'clock the ten competitors appeared in front of the Stand, when General Peel and Blair Athol were received with most terrific cheering. Each horse was as perfect in condition as the skill of the veteran John Scott and the clever Mr. T'Anson could make them. Indeed, recollection fails to recall a grander animal than General Peel, or a more perfect racehorse than Blair Athol. After one attempt the field was despatched on good terms, the running being made successively by Ely, the Miner, and Baragah, the two first sweeping into the straight in the van. There Cambuscan, who till that time had brought up the rear, rushed to the front, passing Ely and the Miner on their right, while General Peel at the same moment appeared on their left. At the distance Ely and the Miner fell back, and the race for a moment seemed to lie between the General and Cambuscan, the riders of both pressing their horses with the utmost vigour. Suddenly, however, exactly as at Epsom, so here at Doncaster, the glorious son of Blink Bonny rushed to the front, and, seemingly without an effort, passed his opponents struggling in defeat, winning finally in a canter by two lengths. General Peel defeated Cambuscan by a head. The Miner was four lengths in the rear of Cambuscan. Then followed in order Ely, Claremont, Baragah, Brindisi, Knight of Snowdon, and Black Rock. Thus once more has the marvellous excellence of the Stockwell blood been demonstrated, for while beyond all doubt the speed of General Peel has proved equal, if not superior, to that of Blair Athol, yet at the critical moment the strain of Orlando (for Orlando is the maternal grandsire of General Peel) has been detected; and the invincible stoutness of the greatest of sires, the son of Pocahontas, has triumphed over the efforts of a more elegant, more swift, but less hardy stock.

A SOMEWHAT remarkable document has emanated from the four archbishops of the United Kingdom. It takes the form of an address from themselves and the Vice-Presidents of the Society for the Propagation of the Gospel to the clergy and laity of England. After stating the obligation of the English people to maintain Christian missions among our own subjects abroad and among the heathen generally, the address states that the present hindrance to the discharge of the work is the lack of funds. Then follow appeals from the Bishop of Calcutta, who aims at the evangelisation of the north-east and east parts of the diocese of Calcutta, of East Bengal, Assam, and Singapore, so that Hindoos, Buddhists, Malays, and Chinese would form objects of conversion—from the Bishop of Labuan, Bishop Twells of the Orange River, the Bishop of Honolulu, the Bishop of Ontario (Canada), and the Bishop of Columbia. All these earnestly demand funds for the extension of the work under their care. The most remarkable appeal, however, is from the Cape of Good Hope. First the Dean of Maritzburg, in the diocese of Natal, proclaims the need of 12 clergymen, with numerous subordinate agents, but declares that 'he is equally destitute of men and of resources.' Next the Bishop of Grahamstown states that, 'if the Society is unable to make an additional grant, he must at once consider which of the mission agents can be otherwise employed.' But the Bishop of Capetown plainly states that 'he trusts the Society may be able to do something more next year; if not, the work must be abandoned.' Under these circumstances the Archbishops ask whether these calls are to remain unanswered, for if so, then these rejected multitudes will cry unto the Lord against the English people, and the sin be laid to the charge of this Church and nation. The address concludes with an earnest appeal to the clergy to stir up the laity, and to the laity, by annual contributions in their parishes, by regular subscriptions to the societies, and by associations, to help the work.

EARL RUSSELL has informed Mr. Edward Bates, of Liverpool, that Her Majesty's Government are of opinion that the case of the Georgia must go before the Prize Court in the United States, and that Mr. Bates must be prepared to defend his interest therein.

THE great bed of Ware was sold by auction last week for 100*l.*, and it is stated that the purchaser was Mr. Charles Dickens.

THE strength of the British army stationed in the united kingdom in the year 1862 was 78,173 officers and men. For every 1,000 men there were 989 admissions into hospital and 53 constantly sick. About 500 out of every 1,000 cases came under the same head of disease. In the cavalry regiments 13 in every 1,000 cases were attributed to intemperance. It is very difficult to compare the rate of mortality with that of the ordinary population, as the process of invaliding reduces the percentage considerably. It is, however, asserted that in the French army stationed in France, the rate of non-effectives from sickness in the same year was almost identical with that of the British army. Corporal punishment in the Military Train reached to about 3 men in every 1,000, to about 0·6 in every 1,000 in the Foot Guards, and to less than 2 in every 1,000 in other regiments.

In the year ending March 25, 1863, the amount expended for relief of the poor in England and Wales was 6,527,036*l.*, being more by nearly half a million sterling than was expended in the preceding year. If the cotton districts be excluded from calculation, it will be found that there was a general decrease in the relief required. The mean number of paupers of all classes was no less than 1,079,382 persons including 221,749 adult able-bodied paupers.

Mr. Burroughes, late M.P. for East Norfolk, has been convicted before a bench of county justices, under the 12th and 13th sections of the Nuisances Removal Act, for being the owner of certain cottages in the county of Norfolk destitute of the accommodations required by the Act. Three of the cottages situated in the parish of Hemblingham, contained two rooms each, and were inhabited by three families numbering in all twenty-one persons; while a fourth cottage at South Walsham, afforded shelter to a man and his wife, two grown-up sons, a grown-up daughter and her illegitimate child.

Prince Humbert arrived at Southampton on Sunday last from Havre in the yacht of Prince Napoleon. On Monday evening he dined with Lord and Lady Palmerston, and on Tuesday left for Doncaster to witness the races.

The number of race-horses charged with duty in Great Britain in 1863-64 was 1,893. Taxed dogs in 1862-63 were 347,389. No less than 50,255 persons paid for armorial bearings. The powdered heads show a lamentable decrease, being but 913, but taxed servants rose to the number of 248,222.

The magistrates of Lancashire have been sorely vexed in attempting a decision between the claims of extreme tolerance on the one hand and of conscientious convictions on the other. At a meeting with the Right Hon. Lord Stanley in the chair, the Recorder of the town of Preston, moved a vote of 40*l.* 'for the purchase of vestments, chalice, linen, crucifix, candlesticks, and other articles necessary to enable the Roman Catholic minister at the House of Correction in Preston to celebrate the service of his Church.' Some months ago we gave a summary of of the act enabling justices to appoint Roman Catholic chaplains in Houses of Correction. Under this act a chaplain had been appointed for Preston Gaol and the sum of 150*l.* had been granted for the fitting up a portion of the gaol as a chapel. That amount was not sufficient to purchase in addition the articles just enumerated, and, therefore, a further sum was now demanded. The resolution gave rise to a very animated debate, one gentleman, who spoke at considerable length on the 'crucifix,' which he held to be a graven image, was proceeding to discuss the meaning of the 'Second Commandment,' when he was called to order by the chairman. Another gentleman expressed deep regret that the required sum had not been voted in the first instance, instead of allowing the court to be placed in a most painful dilemma. A third gave it as his opinion that the vote would compel the county to pay as it were a church-rate to another church than that of England, a process, as he said, rather in the direction of than a departure from the annals of superstition. An amendment was handed in to the effect 'that no crucifix or graven image be introduced within the walls of the Preston gaol at the expense of the county,' but it failed for the want of being seconded. After a long debate the original motion was carried by 22 votes to 19. It may be mentioned that there are more than 100 Roman Catholic prisoners in Preston Gaol.

A circular has been issued, dated September 13, announcing a suspension of payment by the firm of Croskey & Co., of St. Michael's House, Cornhill. The circular holds out the prospect of a discharge of their liabilities in full. Messrs. Lewine and Morris have also suspended payment.

The corporal presence of Bishop Colenso seems to produce much the same effect on the Bishops of England as the sight of an Orange procession on a true son of the Church. It had been announced that the Bishop of Natal would preach for the village schools in the church of Claybrook in Leicestershire, on Sunday, September 11, at the request of the vicar, the Rev. R. H. Johnson, who also holds the living of Lutterworth, and has reached the venerable age of 83 years. On the Saturday, Dr. Colenso arrived at the vicarage. Immediately after him there followed a Mr. Gates, the agent of Dr. Jeune, Lord Bishop of Peterborough, bearing a missive from his Lordship to the vicar, inhibiting the latter from yielding the occupation of the Claybrook pulpit to Dr. Colenso. A similar document was served on the curate of the parish, the Rev. Lewis Wood. On Sunday morning, Bishop Colenso, a friend, and the vicar, proceeded to the church. In the churchyard a person bearing a document attempted to approach the Bishop, but was stopped. When the Bishop knelt at the altar the same person approached, and failing to arrest his attention threw the notice at him. It fell at the feet of the Bishop, and remained unheeded throughout the service. During the service the vicar announced the fact of the prohibition, but promised a publication of the intended sermon, and an address in the schoolroom. The Bishop was again present at the evening service. Before the sermon the curate, after stating that Bishop Colenso had on the first intimation of the wishes of the Bishop of the diocese written to his Lordship promising not to preach at Claybrook church, proceeded to deliver the opinion of himself and his vicar on the work of Colenso. The vicar, he said, was now an old man, one who for forty-eight years had laboured to declare the truth of God among the people, and to have his conscience clear of their blood. As an aged minister, who must before long be called from this world to give an account of his ministry, the vicar desired to testify that he heartily and entirely approved the work of Dr. Colenso, believing him to be a true and faithful servant of God, doing his utmost to advance the cause of true religion, and to promote the solid lasting welfare of the national church. The curate then referred to the examples of persecution endured by Reformers, by Wickcliffe, himself vicar of Lutterworth, by St. Paul, even by our Lord himself. He desired the people to read Colenso's books for themselves. He thanked God that he had lived to see this day of increased light and of straightforward utterance of the truth. The same evening, at six o'clock, the Bishop proceeded to address the people in the schoolroom, but so dense was the crowd that an adjournment was effected to the village green, where Bishop Colenso standing on a table spoke at length on the subject of Gospel missions, with special reference to his own diocese, a district 'which,' said he, emphatically, 'the Queen had placed under his charge as Bishop, with regard to the affairs of the Church of England.'

In the Belfast riots 176 people were wounded and nine killed in the fourteen days. The force of military and constabulary was 4,000 men, the number of arrests made was exactly 50. The sum claimed as compensation for losses sustained amounts to about 10,000*l.* It is stated that the magistrates have gone to Dublin Castle to request that a new police system may be established in Belfast on the London plan, the force to be commanded by a commissioner responsible to the Government.

Hopes had been entertained by sanguine individuals that the enquiry instituted by the Fishery Commissioners would bring the Claddagh fishermen and the owners of the trawlers to terms of reconciliation. The conduct of the Claddagh men has rendered the efforts of Professor Huxley abortive. These worthy persons were not content to prove by evidence that 'in the good old times' when they monopolised the fishery, the Galway market was supplied, and the Claddagh men flourished. They had no notion of a fair fight and no favour, assured of the better cause they desired to render assurance doubly sure. Therefore, with characteristic audacity and folly they warned the witnesses for the trawlers not to appear on peril of being 'marked men.' The enquiry, of course, was abruptly terminated, and the feuds must continue unless other means are used to adjust the quarrel.

THE CONTINENT.

FRANCE.

Of all the legends of ancient Greece, none was so often made use of by the ancient tragedians to excite the awe and terror of the spectators, and to impress them with the relentless divine vengeance which follows upon crime, as the awful tragedy of the death of Agamemnon. The treacherous murder of the son of Atreus by his wife Clytemnestra and her paramour Ægistheus, the consequent vengeance of his son Orestes upon his adulterous mother and her associate, and the avenging Furies which then pursued the parricide, have been illustrated by the gloomy genius of Æschylus in language which remained unrivalled until Hamlet, Prince of Denmark, heard the like tragedy revealed to him by the spirit of his murdered father. The legends of Greece and of Denmark have found this week a worthy rival in the annals of the Assize Court of Tarn-et-Garonne. On the 2nd inst. appeared at the bar of that court Jean Bétolières, the father, with his two sons of the same name, to answer to the capital charge of the murder of Jean Vigié. Bétolières, the father, had long suspected Vigié of an adulterous intercourse with his wife; the suspicions were shared by his sons, and the three determined to put an end to the scandal. Another person was interested in the same object; Vigié the younger, the son of the adulterer, had seen the infidelity of his father with the greatest indignation, and had reason to believe that the sudden death of his own mother, which had then but lately occurred, was not unconnected with it. Whether he was more immediately concerned in the vengeance wreaked by the Bétolières family upon Vigié was not clearly made out. All we know is that a night came when Bétolières, the father, discovered that Vigié was on the premises, probably awaiting an opportunity of meeting his mistress. They went out, first the elder son, then the younger, then the father; Marcellin, the elder son, seized Vigié, and, after a hard fight, threw him down; then giving him over to his brother Second to hold him, he ran to inform the younger Vigié of the occurrence. Vigié the elder was a strong man; struggling under Second, he had nearly succeeded in overpowering him, when the father came to his son's assistance, and by a few kicks with a heavy wooden sabot silenced the adulterer for ever. Marcellin returned with the younger Vigié; they were shown the corpse; then, according to one report, the son Vigié said, 'You have done your work well; but had you killed him a fortnight ago, my mother would be still living.' Immediately after the deed, the three Bétolières gave themselves up to justice. The sympathy of the people was with them. The prisoners were defended at their trial by the great advocate, Jules Favre. Such was his eloquence, and such the natural leaning of a French jury in favour of a vengeance taken on these grounds, that the three prisoners, after a two days' trial, were acquitted.

The Empress of the French is paying a visit to the baths of Schwalbach, a little village of Nassau, about nine miles north-west of Mayence, under the name of the Comtesse de Pierrefonds. She is said to be suffering from a derangement of the digestive organs; for which it is hoped that she will find a cure in those healing waters.

The following important promotions and appointments have been made:—Marshal McMahon, Duc de Magenta, to the Governor-Generalship of Algeria; General Bazaine, who has commanded the French troops in Mexico with great success since the departure of Marshal Forey, to the rank of Marshal of France; and General de Martimprey, who has been temporary Governor-General of Algeria since the death of the Duc de Malakhoff, to the rank of Senator.

Every country has its favoured class and its pariahs, its licensed bullies and its legally recognised victims. The latter in one country may be the pauper, in another the apple-woman; on Prussian railroads the foreigner has filled this part; in France the unprotected class is the lodger, the licensed tormentor is the concierge or porter. A case occurred lately in the police-courts of Paris, in which these distinctions were brought out so strongly that the law was obliged for once to disown its pet. Adolphe Derouet, the concierge of a certain lodging-house, was a man of exquisite nerves; there were things which completely destroyed his moral equilibrium, and from which he felt constrained to free himself at any cost. Among these antipathies of his was one to white albino-coloured hair. As ill-luck would have it, one of the lodgers, Lockmann by name, was unprincipled enough to be the possessor of a chevelure of that colour. The duties of Derouet's office obliged him to see this daily. His indignation boiled within him, and he told Lockmann more than once that 'he would drag his white hairs in the dust.' The means he adopted to effect this object were, to say the least, peculiar. Meeting him casually one day, he gave him a violent kick in the stomach, and then beat him about the head with a glass tumbler. Lockmann thought the delicate nerves of his concierge might be lulled to a state of less painful sensibility by a few months in prison, and accordingly summoned him for assault. Derouet pleaded his excuse, but the obdurate magistrate agreed with Lockmann, and the astonished concierge was committed for three months.

The following fact (?) is chronicled in the French journals:—'A gentleman was shooting over his land on the first day of the season (the names and localities are of no importance), when he came upon a covey of fourteen partridges feeding; he fired at them on the ground, and killed thirteen out of the fourteen at one shot!' Truly, partridge shooting in France must be a noble sport. One may fairly ask whether the French partridges adopted their detestable habit of running instead of flying as a generous concession to the weakness of the sportsmen of their native country, who so much prefer a ground shot to one on the wing.

GERMANY.

It is now hoped that any difficulties which may have arisen in the Conference of Vienna will not be so great as to require the penultima ratio of a notice of resumption of hostilities on the 15th inst. A sub-commission has been sent into the Duchies to determine the new frontier, and its report is expected shortly to appear.

The new difficulty with regard to the commercial treaty with France is that which principally occupies the minds of the Berlin and Vienna diplomats. Austria has demanded a modification of one article in that treaty as the condition of her entrance into the Zollverein. The Patrie, on behalf of France, declares that 'France is determined to consent to no change whatever in that treaty, the ratifications of which will be exchanged between the two Governments on October 31.' The Norddeutsche Zeitung, however, thinks that the French Government has already proved that it can make allowance for circumstances, and will show itself ready to reconsider the treaty. Such are the first fruits of non-intervention. France allowed Germany to do what it pleased with Denmark, and now the Germans think they can do what they please with France. It appears that the tone assumed by Herr von Rechberg has somewhat surprised the Prussian Cabinet. They had expected him to demand, on behalf of Austria, some guarantees for her non-German possessions as the price of her adoption of the commercial treaty, whereas he has now forced them, by the dexterity of his management, to reopen entirely afresh the international conferences on the customs question. They are to meet at Berlin. The representative of Austria is to be Herr von Hock, a disciple of free trade, and therefore one who will entirely agree with the principles of the Franco-Prussian treaty, which must form the basis of any new customs union in Germany.

The Assembly of Darmstadt has called upon their Ministry to give their adhesion to the terms of the new Zollverein, under any circumstances, before October 1.

A report has been going the round of the papers that a Congress of Princes is to be held at Berlin, to which a Prussian proposition for federal reform will be submitted. This report is denied by the Austrian journals: nous verrons. The last Congress of Princes at Frankfort was very near being a great success for Austrian diplomacy, and Prussia may think it worth her while to repeat the experiment for her own advantage.

The question of the Austro-Prussian Alliance has been discussed very fully by the Vienna correspondent of the Kölnische Zeitung. He says that it is false that Austria does not oppose the wish of Prussia to make territorial acquisitions in North Germany. Such acquisitions are expressly forbidden by the terms of the treaty of alliance, which treaty has not yet been in any way modified. All that Austria will allow to Prussia is the occupation of a military and naval position in the Duchies, in conformity with the law of the German Confederation. If Prussia demands the smallest slice of territory—if it lays a hand even on the Duchy of Lauenberg—Austria will require the restitution of Silesia in exchange.

As to the Duchies their position is daily simplifying itself. They were originally condemned to inaction when Austria and Prussia came forward to fight for their liberation; and in the same passive state they must be content to remain while their fate is decided in the council-room from which they are excluded. There will be a little bill to pay, and if they are told to pay it they will be forced to acquiesce, or, rather, their consent will not be asked to the arrangement. It is a very singular fact that the original grievance of the Duchies against Denmark was that very non-recognition of their existence which they now suffer from their own countrymen. The people of the Duchies are fully alive to this. A meeting of landed proprietors of the middle class, that is, not belonging to the Ritterschaft, was held at Kiel on the 3rd inst. They rejected the resolution passed by the meeting of nobles in favour of an interim Austro-Prussian Government, and endorsed that passed by the inhabitants of the towns in favour of the Duke of Augustenburg by 25 votes to 6. A meeting of peasants is shortly to take place, in which the same resolutions will be passed. At the same time deputations continue to flow to Copenhagen from North Slesvig, demanding protection for their nationalities.

It appears that Lord Russell has again tried his hand at the settlement of the Slesvig-Holstein difficulties, and with exactly the same success as before. In a despatch addressed to the Courts of Vienna and Berlin, he called upon them to submit the question of the final destiny of the Duchies to the universal suffrage of the inhabitants. The answer which he received was one that is probably kept in stereotype by those Courts for his Lordship's special use:—'You should have thought of that before.' They quietly inform him that it is too late to introduce a new alternative into the subject. Great surprise has been manifested by the appearance of this despatch from Lord Russell; the key to the enigma has been found in another despatch of his of about the same date, in which he made a fresh attempt to induce France to join England in a protest against the dismemberment of Denmark. It has been met with a more decided rebuff than any of his former missives. It becomes daily more and more evident that the English Cabinet have completely misapprehended the policy of the Emperor on the Danish question. When he suggested vigorous measures, they chose to confine themselves to mere words; now that they have changed 'what they please to call their mind,' they are surprised to find that he also has embarked in another course.

One of the difficulties raised by Prussia with regard to the Duchies is a claim on Denmark for a proportionate part of the sum paid to her in lieu of the Sound dues. The sum originally fixed for this was $30,476,325, of which Prussia was to pay $4,440,027. A considerable part of this remains unpaid, and Prussia now proposes to transfer her debt from Denmark to Slesvig-Holstein, as a fair proportion of the whole indemnity. What the Duchies may have to do with the Sound it is hard to see; we in England, at least, should think it a very cool request on the part of a seceding colony, Canada for instance, should it require from us a proportionate part of the profits arising from the trade of London; yet this would be very nearly parallel.

Politicians can scarcely be at fault in drawing an ominous conclusion from the coincidence of the visits of the Empress Eugenie and the King of Prussia to the waters of Schwalbach. The Empress being there, what more natural than that her Imperial spouse should pay her a visit? And if the visit took place during the stay of the King of Prussia, could the two monarchs avoid a meeting without marked rudeness? It is shrewdly suspected that something is on the tapis between France and Prussia: the Prussian Minister, Herr von Roon, was received at Châlons with peculiar cordiality; and there are not wanting signs of the wane of Denmark in Imperial favour. Whether any understanding between these two Powers would result in a new rectification of frontier, or in combinations of future importance, it would be idle to attempt to guess. Neither the one nor the other possibility is calculated to allay the present uneasiness of Europe.

The Duke of Augustenburg's memorial to the Diet has been printed and distributed to the members. The Grand Duke of Oldenburg, it is said, has found it impossible to frame a memorial in vindication of his own claims, so few and weak are the facts upon which they rest.

We last week noticed the result of the race for the continental St. Leger, contested on the first day of the Baden-Baden meeting. The second and third days furnished sport of considerable interest. The Prix des Produits brought four horses to the post, and was won by Vermout in the hollowest style by four lengths: oddly enough, the three first horses in the race were by the same sire, Nabob, their names being Vermout, Arcturus, and Poudrière. The Prix de l'Avenir, of 4,000fr., for two-year-olds bred on the Continent, was an interesting affair. The betting was even on Count de Lagrange's Le Bearnais, the brother of the speedy Cosmopolite, 2 to 1 against the Duc de Morny's Lelio, a colt by West Australian, who ran his maiden race last July at Newmarket, and was noticed in our columns as an illustration of the practice of running a racehorse unshod: and 4 to 1 against the Duc de Morny's Clermont, also by West Australian. The favourite in the event ran indifferently, and the race was left to the pair of the Duc de Morny, Clermont winning on sufferance. The Italian filly Vimeira, by Stradbally out of Flea, was third. The Duc de Morny not only placed confidence in his own horses to the advantage of his own pocket, but also that of his friend Prince Charles of Prussia. On the third day of the races the sport commenced with the Prix de Carlsruhe, which also fell to Clermont, Le Bearnais being second, and Vimeira third. The Prix d'Eberstein followed, and was won by M. H. Delamarre's Fidelité by Monarque, Arcturus being second. The interest of the public was, however, concentrated on the 'Grand Prix de Bade,' a race which, founded only in the year 1858, already bears on its roll of winners such names as Mon Etoile, Stradella, and La Toucques. Additional excitement was created by the fact that Vermout and Fille de l'Air were again to meet, while the excellent Dollar was also to imperil the chances of both the great continental three year olds. It will be remembered that in the continental St. Leger Fille de l'Air defeated Vermout by a neck at even weights. In the Grand Prix the mare had to concede 6 lbs. in the weights. This fact coupled with the consideration that Vermout was likely to be all the better for his gallop in the race run four days previously induced the public to prefer him to the mare, the betting being 5 to 4 against Vermout, 7 to 4 against Fille de l'Air, and 3 to 1 against Dollar. Vermout pursuing the tactics which gained the victory at Paris over the mighty Blair Athol, made all the running, and won easily by two lengths, Dollar being second, and Fille de l'Air third; Beatrix was fourth, Affidavit fifth, and the Italian Benvenuto last.

DENMARK.

The Prince and Princess of Wales left Scotland on the 5th inst. in Her Majesty's steam-yacht Osborne, to pay a visit to the native country of the Princess. They travel incognito under the title of Baron and Baroness Renfrew, not of course with any idea of secresy, but to save themselves from the tedium of royal receptions which otherwise would dog their every step. Their visit has not failed to attract great attention. The Danish journals have commented upon it with great freedom. The Opposition papers have taken the opportunity, with more acrimony than good taste, to vituperate the foreign policy of England, charging it with all the misfortunes which Denmark has undergone. 'Tis true, 'tis pity: pity 'tis, 'tis true;' and none have been more ready to confess it than the English nation itself; but to take the present occasion to repeat the miserable story is an ungracious and inhospitable act. Some journals have gone so far as to require the Danish people to receive the royal pair in perfect silence, or rather not to receive them at all, but to leave the routine work of compliment to those who are paid for doing it. Of course nothing could be more unjust than this. Whoever may be guilty of the late misdeeds, the Prince and Princess at least are innocent. It is said that an illustrious lady, one day finding the Princess in tears for the miseries of her native country, said to her: 'Go and cry in Rotten Row, and you will have every man in England in arms for you.' But neither in this way nor in any other have the Prince and Princess attempted to influence the politics of England. Nothing, then, could be so unjust as to wreak upon them the vengeance due to others' faults. Nor were the Danes at all disposed to take the advice. Slow though they may be in action, they are most remarkably fond of amusement: even in the depths of the war it was a cause of surprise to all strangers that they could continue to amuse themselves, to frequent Vauxhalls, concerts, and casinos with the most insouciant gaiety. Every preparation was therefore made to receive the guests suitably; garlands and flowers, arches, festoons, and the other paraphernalia of festivity decorated the old town of Elsinore, the appointed 'haven where they would be;' and good reason they had for wishing to be there, for the weather was undeniably 'ugly,' with a steady rainfall. The whole Danish fleet were assembled to do honour to the occasion, and to act as a sort of body-guard to the King, whose impatience to see his daughter again scarcely allowed him to remain on shore while she was at sea. The approach of the Osborne was heralded by the arrival of H.M.S. Aurora, Captain Sir Herbert M'Clintock, the famous Arctic navigator. But the long wished-for moment was for some time deferred. On the morning of the 6th the town of Elsinore was awakened by the booming of a gun, and all men rushed to see whether the Osborne had at last appeared. The sea was white with ships taking advantage of a long-delayed wind to pass through the Sound, but no Osborne. As the day wore on the town began to swarm with uniformed officials; then the different members of the Royal Family appeared; the King and Queen were received with loud huzzas, which may have convinced them that much of the seeming Danish disloyalty is only a transient fit of sulkiness. At last the ship appeared, but only to lie to for an hour or more at a provoking distance off. The fact was that the Princess had suffered severely on the voyage, and required a little rest to fit her to receive her relatives. At last the signal for disembarkation was given; the King and Queen came down to the landing jetty, and the Osborne steamed slowly up amid the thundering salutes of the fleet. Denmark was all on tiptoe to see the beloved Princess, and she, no less anxious to see her country and her family, stood with the Prince at the top of the paddle-box waving her handkerchief to those on shore; at last even the baby was brought up and held on high for the inspection of all who chose. The King and Queen felt then that they were also grandfather and grandmother; impatient of longer delay, they embarked in a ship's boat and rowed off to the royal yacht. They were received by the Prince at the gangway, but scarcely had they appeared on deck when the Princess rushed first into her father's arms, and then into those of her mother. The inspection of the baby came next, and it was evident that he met with complete approval. The ship had now touched the pier; the whole party landed, and listened patiently to the inevitable address from the burgomaster, after which they drove off to the royal castle of Fredensborg. The Czarewitch Nicholas, who has been spending some little time in Denmark, arrived at Elsinore but a few moments before the Prince and Princess; it is hoped that the two royal heirs-apparent will find an opportunity of meeting and fraternising, to the advantage of both of them. There are stories rife in the romantic world which would convert the happy home of the Danish King into the abode of one of those mediæval 'stern parents' who rejoiced in daughters beautiful as the day, whither the young princes were always flocking, and the rival suitors fought one another daily for the honour of her hand. It is said that not only the Czarewitch, but also Prince Humbert of Italy, has seen the fair sister of our Princess, and wished to share with her his future crown. If so—well, the house of Romanoff is proverbial for handsome men, while the house of Savoy is not.

The Czarewitch left Fredensborg on the 8th inst.; he proceeds through Oldenburg and Hanover to meet his Imperial father. The two Crown Princes are said to have been on the best of terms, and there is every prospect that the Prince and Princess of Wales will go to St. Petersburg after their projected visit to Stockholm.

An address bearing the signatures of several thousands of the inhabitants of Copenhagen has been presented to the King. It expresses the satisfaction felt by the people in the late change of Ministry, and their distrust of the 'Eider-Dane' party. It concludes with a promise that the undersigned will make every necessary sacrifice for the honour and prosperity of their country. The King was so much gratified with the address that he kept the deputation which presented it to dine with him.

The political committee of the Rigsraad has published a very lengthy report, from which we extract the most important points. Shortly after the resumption of hostilities, before the capture of Alsen, the then newly-appointed Bluhme Ministry made up their minds that further resistance was useless; there was no hope of foreign help; at home the Ministers for War, Marine, and Finance were agreed in declaring that the means at their disposal were inadequate; the only course open was to treat for peace upon such terms as could be obtained; these involved the cession of the whole territory south of the Jutland frontier. The committee leave it to the House to consider whether the conclusion arrived at by the Ministry was justified by facts, and whether the terms accepted were such as ought to have been allowed. The committee then takes notice of two petitions, one from 119 Slesvigers praying the House to reserve the right of the Slesvig population to a universal vote by districts; the other from 1,036 heads of families in the Jutland enclaves and the Duchy of Slesvig, praying that they may not be separated from Denmark. The committee then proceed to deny the right of any person or body to vote away the Duchy of Slesvig except the Rigsraad in which members for that Duchy sit. But since, in consequence of the war, there are scarcely any of the Slesvig members now sitting in the House, the committee proposes to elicit the opinion of the Slesvigers themselves by means of a universal vote by districts. They acknowledge the difficulty of obtaining a free vote from a country in military occupation, but they determine to run that risk rather than take upon themselves the responsibility of voting for the countries thus occupied.

SWITZERLAND.

Tranquillity has been restored at Geneva, and no further arrests have taken place. The envoy of the Emperor of Mexico, M. Baraudiaran, has presented his credentials to the Federal Council.

M. Chenevière, the gentleman on whose election the riots occurred, has been sworn in to his office by the Federal Council.

The International Congress, which has been sitting at Geneva with a view to regulate the position of hospitals and wounded in time of war, has terminated its labours, and the following ten resolutions have been adopted and signed, under reserve of ratification, by the representatives of Belgium, Baden, Denmark, Spain, France, Hesse, Italy, the Netherlands, Portugal, Prussia, Switzerland, and Wurtemburg:—

Art. 1. Ambulances and military hospitals are regarded as neutral, and as such protected and respected by the belligerents (so long as they contain sick or wounded). The neutrality would cease should such hospitals have a military guard.

Art. 2. All employés of the hospital, including the almoners, carriers of the wounded, &c., will enjoy the benefits of this neutrality as long as there are wounded to be attended to.

Art. 3. The persons designated in the above article may, even after occupation by the enemy, continue to perform their duties in the hospital or ambulance to which they may be attached, or withdraw to join the division to which they may belong.

Under these circumstances, when their functions shall have ceased, they will be escorted to the enemy's outposts by the army in occupation.

Art. 4. As the matériel of military hospitals comes under martial law, the persons attached to those hospitals may not, on leaving, take away with them anything except what is their own personal property.

Under the same circumstances, however, an ambulance preserves its matériel.

Art. 5. Inhabitants of the country who give help to the wounded are respected and remain free. The generals of the belligerent Powers are called upon to forewarn the inhabitants of the call made upon their humanity, and of the neutrality consequent thereupon.

Any wounded man taken into a house will be its safeguard. Any inhabitant who has taken in the wounded will not be billeted upon or submitted to war contributions.

Art. 6. The wounded or sick are taken care of, no matter to what nation they belong.

Those will be sent back to their homes who, after being cured, are deemed incapable of further service.

The others may also be sent home, but on the condition of not resuming arms during the war.

The escorts on this service are to be respected as neutrals.

The commanders-in-chief have the power to hand over to the enemy's outposts the wounded during the combat when circumstances permit it, and with the consent of both parties.

Art. 7. A distinct flag and uniform is adopted for the hospitals, ambulances, and escorts. On all occasions the national flag must accompany it.

A badge may also be allowed to denote a neutral, to be granted only by the military authorities.

The flag and badge will bear a red cross on a white ground.

Art. 8. The general details of these regulations will be settled by the commanding officers of the belligerent Powers, according to the instructions from their Governments.

Article 9 calls the attention of other Governments to this convention, inviting them to join it. Article 10 states that the ratification of the convention is to take place at Berne within four months, or earlier if possible.

GREECE.

THE following letter, addressed to the King of the Greeks by a member of the National Assembly, has created a perfect storm in the country:—

Athens, August 26.

SIRE,—To expel Otho, a Sovereign whom as an individual we acknowledge to be a worthy man, we Hellenes did not hesitate to stake the fate of our country, because the royalty under Otho had become a centre of intrigue. Sire, the whole of the capital of the kingdom is convinced, and within two days all Greece will be so likewise, that your Court has descended in a mass into the political arena, and made use of your name in a scandalous manner on the occasion of the election for President of the National Assembly. Sire, the object of the contest for the Presidency was evidently the correction of your Court, which has for some time past been conspiring against the oath made by the constitutional King towards the nation—a Court which a great national majority is endeavouring by peaceful measures to replace in its proper sphere. Corruption has, however, gained the day, and the victory of the courtiers is both prejudicial to the King and a misfortune to the nation. Sire, the policy now pursued alienates the King from the love of the people—a love on which you have based your strength and your authority. Greece cannot possibly tolerate such a course, and myself, the most humble of your subjects, moved by the grief which I feel, from my attachment to my king and to my country, supplicate your Majesty to save from further embarrassment the land in which you have declared to wish to live and die as a Hellene.—Your Majesty's very sincere and very obedient subject, EUTHIMIO PLASTERAS, Representative of Lepanto.

Immediately upon the reception of this, the Ministry proposed a vote of censure on the member who had been guilty of such an unconstitutional proceeding. After a debate, which finally culminated in a hand-to-hand fight, the vote was passed; but such were the fears of a popular movement, that all the houses in Athens remained closed during the whole day. Demonstrations against the Ministers have been made on the classical ground of Thebes and Chalcis. At Nauplia a scurrilous song attacking the King, Count Sponneck, and the Court, was in general circulation.

The King of Greece is officially reported to be betrothed to the Grand-Duchess Alexandrovna of Russia; the unity of faith between those two crowns makes such a connection desirable for both. By this marriage our own Royal Family will be very nearly connected with that of Russia.

Greek securities are on the rise; by a telegram from Athens we are informed that the debt of 1824-25 has been recognised—the original capital of 7,000,000*l.* having been consolidated at 2¼ millions bearing 5 per cent. interest.

SPAIN.

The Queen has given an audience to Señor Fasio, the envoy of the Emperor of Mexico, and received his credentials. Her Majesty, in reply to his address, expressed a hope that the relations between Spain and Mexico would ever be as amicable as their identity of origin, the similarity of their manners, and the evident accordance of all their interests demanded.

PERU.

It is feared that the Peruvian Government will not be disposed to accept the terms of accommodation proposed by Spain. Among these terms no mention is made of the restoration of the Chincha Islands, and the Peruvian Cabinet will decline to treat with Spain upon any basis but that.

CHINA.

Despatches have been received from the English Minister in China, Sir Frederick Bruce, containing most cheering reports on the state of our commerce with that country.

The import trade has increased from 41,000,000 taels (about 13,000,000*l.*) in 1860 (the last year before the opening of the Yangtze and the northern ports) to 81,000,000 taels (about 27,000,000*l.*) in 1863.

This increase is due, in a great measure, to the large and increasing trade, from the ports opened on the Yangtze, in Chinese produce of all descriptions. Owing to the violence of the winds and the rapidity of the currents in certain places, the application of steam to navigation was required before the Yangtze could be made available as a highway for transport. The decks of the steamers are now crowded with Chinese passengers, and their holds are filled with produce destined, not for foreign export, but for Chinese consumption.

The export trade has increased still more largely during the same time, one reason for which is found in the fact that Shanghai has now become an entrepôt, where goods are collected to be distributed to different ports of China, Japan, and the Western world.

The entries of foreign-owned tonnage employed in carrying this trade have increased, within the above-mentioned period, from 293,568 to 996,890.

The city of Nankin has capitulated, and the city of Cangsing has been captured. A camp of instruction has been formed under Colonel Gordon for the purpose of training the Chinese troops.

THE French are rapidly extending their influence in the East. A new Franco-Annamite treaty has been concluded, containing the following important articles:—

The establishment of a French protectorate in six provinces of Lower Cochin China.

The opening of three important ports on the Annam coast, with the concession of nine kilometres of ground in the vicinity of each port, where French merchants shall be at liberty to travel and trade.

Entire liberty is granted to French missionaries to propagate the Christian religion throughout the whole kingdom.

The establishment of consular agents at Hue and the ports opened to commerce.

Payment of an indemnity of 100,000,000 francs to the French Government.

JAPAN.

We have advices from Nagasaki to as late a date as the 15th of July. General Brown and Sir Rutherford Alcock were both at Nagasaki at that date, on their way to the Straits of Simonoseki. It is clear, therefore, that the resolution to open the passage of the Inland Sea to foreign vessels has been definitively taken. As we hear of no fleet or land force accompanying these high officials, it is very possible that whilst General Brown may embrace the opportunity of reconnoitring what may prove to be the scene of future hostile operations, Sir Rutherford will endeavour to settle whatever points are in dispute by direct negotiations with Tsiosiu, the powerful Daimio who at present stands opposed to the free navigation of the Inland Sea by foreign vessels, and whose fortresses have been the sole impediment to their making use of it.

THE LATE BISHOP POLK.

THE following account of the circumstances attending the acceptance of a military commission by the late Bishop Polk was addressed by the Rev. Dr. Goodrich, of the diocese of Louisiana, to a New York paper.

In the early stages of this unhappy war, Bishop Polk seemed to have the impression that the President of the Confederate States was not sufficiently alive to the importance, in a military point of view, of the Valley of the Mississippi. The Bishop's familiarity with that country, derived from a long residence in Tennessee and Louisiana, and his frequent visitations as Missionary Bishop on both sides of the Mississippi River, and his early education at West Point, qualified him to judge as wisely, perhaps, as any other man of certain places as defensive positions, in case of any invasion of that territory. In an interview with the President of the Confederate States, in Richmond, he gave his ideas freely to Mr. Davis, entering into detail of what he thought to be the wisest measures to be adopted for the military defence of the country. The President listened with interest to all the Bishop had to say, and, when he closed, remarked that he entirely concurred in the opinions which had been expressed: and 'you, Bishop, are the very man to undertake that defence.' Bishop Polk was taken very much by surprise, and declined the task, on the ground of its incompatibility with his ecclesiastical office.

The President urged, in reply, that such were the perilous conditions of the Southern States, that every lover of the country should feel himself bound to take part, as he was best qualified, in its defence; and that the Bishop's military education, and his intimate knowledge of the country west of the mountains, seemed to point him out as one well fitted for that department.

Bishop Polk was much impressed with the conversation of the President, but left him without any encouragement that he would accept the position. Bishop Meade was at that time in Richmond, and Bishop Polk, having repeated to him the particulars of the interview with President Davis, asked his opinion on the subject. Bishop Meade declined any advice, stating it was a very grave matter, one with respect to which Bishop Polk must determine for himself, in the light of his own conscience before God, but there was a man in Richmond in whose Christian judgment he had great confidence, and whose opinion on the subject he thought would be entitled to much consideration. That man was Colonel Lee, now the distinguished leader of the Confederate armies.

Before Bishop Polk had an opportunity of calling upon Colonel Lee, the Colonel called upon him, and introduced the subject by signifying to the Bishop that he ought to take command in the army for the defence of the South. 'Has Bishop Meade said anything to you on this subject, Colonel Lee?'

'No; I have spoken to no one; I have come of my own mind to converse with you on this matter.' 'And do you think, Colonel Lee, that I, a Bishop in the Church of God, am called in this crisis to take command in the army for the defence of the country?' 'I certainly think so.' The Bishop then repeated the conversation he had had with Bishop Meade.

The result was, Bishop Polk was nominated to command, and accepted at the hands of the President the office of major-general in the army of the Confederacy.

I give you the above as I received it nearly three years ago while residing in the city of New Orleans. I do not make myself responsible for its literal exactness, but I entertain no doubt of its substantial accuracy.

I may also add, that some time before I left the South, while General Polk was in command at Columbus, I had occasion to address him a letter of a private nature, in reply to which he alluded to the step he had taken in assuming military command. He expressed great regret at the necessity which had demanded it—his fervent desire and prayer soon to return to the sacred and far more congenial duties of his episcopal office—the satisfaction it afforded him to know that his course was approved by those whose opinions he had been accustomed to value, but that, however others may judge, he was perfectly clear in his own mind, having taken the step in full conviction of his duty to God and man. The letter in which these and like sentiments were expressed I have not with me. It was left with others in New Orleans, else it would afford me pleasure to send you a copy, that you might see in it the spirit with which the Bishop of Louisiana entered into the military service of the Confederacy.

STRAWS.—A correspondent from Manchester sends us the following:—"'Straws indicate the way the wind blows.' The following paragraph, taken from a letter of a little girl twelve or fourteen years of age in Ohio to her uncle in this city, shows the condition and feeling of the people in the agricultural districts of Ohio:—'Uncle has been drafted this week, leaving his farm, &c., with his wife and four little children. He says very truly his liberties with his fellow white men have been taken away. Compelled to go and fight for the liberty of the black man—the 'cussed nigger' whom God Almighty never meant to associate with white people! It has almost broken our hearts to see for a long time past our neighbours and their sons dragged away to this war, never to return, with very few exceptions, and those too frequently maimed for life." This letter was shown me by a gentleman who, twelve months since, was rather disposed to sympathise with the "freedom shriekers" of Yankeedom; but a change has "come o'er the spirit of his dream," and he now thinks that the truest and best friend of the black man is his Southern master.'

LETTER FROM NASSAU.

FROM OUR OWN CORRESPONDENT.

NASSAU: August 22, 1864.

STAGNATION OF TRADE—RAVAGES OF THE YELLOW FEVER—BLOCKADE-RUNNING—EMANCIPATION DAY.

SINCE my last, of July 4, the importance of our little island in a commercial point of view has been under a cloud. The 'phantom' commerce, which was wont to move the wheels of trade and infuse a life of pleasant excitement into the community, has deserted us for our sister ports of Bermuda, and in its wake has followed the swarm of speculators with their goods, who fatten upon its necessities. Our usually thronged harbour is therefore, comparatively speaking, bare of shipping, and our hotels and boarding-houses present 'a beggarly account of empty benches.' We cannot regret this, however, in view of the terrible epidemic with which we have been scourged, and which has only within the past few days evidenced signs of abatement. But few who were not already seasoned to a tropical climate escaped its attacks, and, I am sorry to say, they have proved unprecedentedly fatal. From the lack of system observable by the authorities, it is impossible at the present time to ascertain the exact number of deaths (although in my next I hope to furnish full statistics), but they are estimated by one of our prominent physicians to have been considerably over 200 in the short space of six weeks—a rate of mortality hitherto unknown upon the island. Its ravages among the shipping have been terrible in some cases, as in that of the Kitty Jones, the captain and three-fourths of the entire crew being swept off, and scarcely a vessel remains in the harbour that has not contributed three or four victims to the insatiate maw of the plague. Every day we hear of its having broken out upon vessels that left here when it first made its appearance. Even the Medea, the man-of-war upon the station, is reported to have put into New York with sixty cases on board. We can now, however, congratulate ourselves upon its approaching disappearance, a change in the weather, and the mitigated type assumed by the late new cases, all giving assurance to our expectations. As you may naturally suppose, the business of running the blockade has not been as lively as usual; still the average of its inefficiency has been maintained. Since the 4th ult. the following arrivals and departures have taken place:—

Arrivals: July 5, Coquette, Wilmington; July 26, Fox, Charleston; July 26, Lucy, Wilmington; July 30, Prince Albert, Charleston; July 30, Syren, Wilmington; August 1, Druid, Charleston.

Departures: July 4, Prince Albert, Charleston; July 6, Little Ada, Savannah; July 6, Coquette, Wilmington; July 12, Annie, Wilmington; July 22, Will o' the Wisp, Wilmington; August 5, Prince Albert, Charleston; August 5, Druid, Charleston; August 6, Fox, Charleston; August 9, Syren, Wilmington.

As we have no captures reported by the Corsica, it is fair to presume upon the safe arrival of all the last departures, in which case we have to record, since last table forwarded, nineteen successful evasions of the blockade to two unsuccessful, the latter being the Little Ada (described in my last), and the Jupiter, upon her first outward trip; in both instances the cargoes were thrown overboard. Against these losses, we have the arrivals of two splendid boats—the Stag, from Greenock, July 22, and the Hope, from Liverpool, August 10; the latter is now loading, and leaves on Tuesday, and we hope the coming 'dark moon' will witness the entire resumption of business.

On the first day of August (Emancipation Day), the coloured inhabitants celebrated its anniversary with a procession, religious services, tea-drinking, &c., but from personal observation neither the enthusiasm nor the participation was very general. The Rev. Mr. Swann, an Episcopal clergyman, was invited to deliver a sermon on the occasion, of which I send you the following report clipped from a local newspaper (i. e. the Guardian):—

The prayers being over, the Rev. Robert Swann addressed a few extempore words to the Friendly Societies from the 4th verse of the 100th Psalm. He told them that, as an Englishman, slavery of all kinds was hateful to him. He did not, however, think that those who had received the boon of freedom had availed themselves of its blessings as they ought to have done. He believed that there was more drunkenness, more immorality, more lying, far less honesty in business transactions, less fidelity in servants with respect to contracts, and less reverence in worship, than there was before the days of Abolition. When he first arrived in the colony, the sight of a drunken man in the streets was an exception to the general rule; but now no one can pass through our thoroughfares without meeting three or four persons in a state of intoxication! He hoped the members of the Friendly Societies would use their utmost influence to discountenance this state of things. The rev. gentleman also remarked that, as the present generation died off, he thought it would be as well to discontinue the demons ration of August 1 as Emancipation Day, but rather keep it up only as the Anniversary of the Friendly Societies.

When you take into consideration the fact that this gentleman has spent the last twenty years of his life upon this island in the close and intimate relations with its people the office of a good and conscientious clergyman necessarily enjoins, his views thus openly expressed must furnish an example worth more to the unprejudiced mind in considering the great social problem than all the theories propounded by Exeter Hall since its establishment.

The dearth of trade prevents my furnishing you price-currents as usual; the few goods sold within the past few months have been disposed of at a very small advance on the invoice prices, holders being anxious to realise in order to escape the sickly season. Prices are, however, well maintained, in anticipation of the autumn trade, and freights evidence a marked advance.

RECRUITS.—Returns just issued for 1862 show that half the persons who offered themselves at the head-quarters of the recruiting districts of the United Kingdom were labourers, husbandmen, and servants. Of this class 394 in 1,000 were rejected on inspection: of mechanics employed in occupations favourable to physical development, such as carpenters, smiths, masons, 396 in 1,000 were rejected: of manufacturing artisans, as clothworkers, weavers, lacemakers, 455; of shopmen and clerks, 445. These figures show the relative proportions, but the absolute number of rejections was larger, as more than a fourth of the men had been previously passed by army or civilian surgeons, and were therefore picked men before this inspection. There was also a further examination of the men on joining their corps, but only 3 per cent. were rejected at that later stage. Considerably more than half the recruits of the year were Englishmen, nearly a third Irish, about a seventh Scotch. The largest proportion of rejections was among the Irish, the least among the Scotch. The ratio of tall men presented for examination—six feet and upwards—was (in every 10,000) 104 in the English districts, 194 in the Scotch, 91 in the Irish.—Times.

LETTER FROM HALIFAX.

HALIFAX, Nova Scotia: September 1, 1864.

CIRCULARS from the Committee of the Bazaar in aid of the Southern Prisoners' Relief Fund, were received here by the last mail steamer from England, and the warm-hearted enthusiastic lady to whom they were sent has lost no time, but gone energetically to work that Nova Scotia may be duly represented in this rightly-called 'work of humanity.' The following are the names of the Halifax committee:—Mrs. W. J. Almon, Mrs. W. J. Stairs, Mrs. H. C. D. Twining, Mrs. A. G. Jones, Mrs. R. Hugonoin, Miss Pitsburg. The press here, with but one exception (and that a very insignificant Yankee organ, called the Sun and Advertiser), have given all possible publicity to the appeal of the committee, and there are good reasons for believing that it will be liberally responded to. The captains, pilots, pursers, and other officers on board the blockade-runners in port are subscribing most generously, as well as such Southern gentlemen as are temporarily residing here.

Our latest advices from Bermuda are most deplorable. The yellow fever is making fearful ravages there. All who can leave have left, but the military are suffering fearfully, losing from twenty to twenty-five men a day. H.M.S. Jason has just returned from taking some ten or twelve additional surgeons down, who were sent on from Canada, and she leaves again to-morrow with others. Many of these go to almost certain death.

The prevalence of the yellow fever at Nassau and Bermuda has of course put a stop to the blockade business from those ports and directed it here. Of recent arrivals I may mention the North Heath (now upon the marine railway undergoing extensive repairs), the Little Hattie (also upon the railway replacing a portion of her stern which had been knocked away), the Helen from Bermuda, the Owl from Bermuda, and the Falcon. The latter vessel sailed from this port for Wilmington a few weeks ago, and had passed the outer blockading squadron, when she was chased and obliged to turn about and go to sea again. She returned to this port, and is now awaiting the proper time for another trial. The Helen and the Owl will also sail in a day or two. The Constance returned to port on Tuesday evening. She has been truly unfortunate. Some two or three months ago she came here for repairs, but could not get certain works satisfactorily executed, and at the time she expected to leave port the captain and engineer had to proceed to England to get the work done there. This caused a delay of some six weeks. She finally put to sea a week ago last Wednesday, and was met outside by a Yankee cruiser, chased, and had to put into a friendly harbour to escape. The next day she proceeded on her voyage, and had got some five hundred miles from port when she sprang a leak and put back.

Mrs. Grinnell, the Southern soldier's friend, is here at present, awaiting an opportunity for returning to her self-imposed duty as hospital matron and nurse in the Confederacy.

The Hon. J. P. Holcombe arrived here from Canada last evening.

Gold is advancing again in the North, and is quoted to-night at 244⅜. On the 30th ult. it was down to 232½, falling suddenly to that figure, it is thought, in view of the many rumours of peace. Northern men here say it will advance to 300 before many weeks.

A STATESMAN'S VIEW OF THE AMERICAN QUESTION.—The following extract from a private letter, from one of the most distinguished continental statesmen, has been communicated to us, and we can only regret that we are not at liberty to give the name of the writer:—'I have read a great number of publications brought out by the war in America, and among others Mr. Williams's "Rise and Fall of the Model Republic." I was favourably impressed with its profound exposition of causes of this disastrous struggle, the good sense, and especially the admirable moderation with which so sad and painful a subject is treated. It is assuredly impossible, after reading this book, to be deceived by the language of demagogues who conceal their subversive passions under the cover of an absurd and lying philanthropy. The chapters which treat of slavery are masterly, and crush that revolting modern hypocrisy which is unfortunately the result of the callous egotism of our age and civilisation. In my opinion, the struggle between South and North is the natural and inevitable consequence of an error in the Constitution—a noble error, but still an error. The author seems to suppose that the sovereignty of the individual States could maintain itself. But this supposition is disproved by the facts. It is not intelligence which guides the masses; it is passion which sways and directs them. Every federation tends to the centralisation of power, and the respect for the letter of a Constitution, whether a Washington be its author or not, will always succumb to the principle of unity in the State. Doubtless the war has for the North to-day no other object than that of reducing the South to the condition of a province. Every other motive or object is simply a pretext. That the presidential elections have been the great arena in which the Constitution was first undermined and then overthrown—that passions the most violent, the most infamous in the choice of means, and the most tenacious in their hold, have seized upon this arena—all this is clear, but at the bottom of all this is the lust of power, the desire of dominion, consequently the wish to subjugate those who are thought weaker, and the sole guarantee of whose independence is a paragraph in a treaty or a Constitution. See what is now taking place in Germany on an infinitely smaller theatre. The union between the sovereign States is incessantly attacked by public opinion, which wants the unity of Germany and not the federation. I therefore see for the South no other alternative than to bend its head to the central power of the United States, or to separate from them completely in forming a new federation. In the former case the South would share the fate of the Northern States; in the second, the same evil and the same tendency will torment both confederations until unity in the one or the other is formally established.'

AN ORDER BY GENERAL HILL.—The following order was issued by General Hill, concerning the gallantry of the troops commanded by Mahone in recent engagements: 'Head Quarters, Third Army Corps, Aug. 4, 1864. General Order No. 17. Anderson's division, commanded by Brigadier-General William Mahone, has so distinguished itself by its successes during the present campaign as to merit the especial attention of the Corps Commander, and he tenders to the division, its officers and men, his thanks for the gallantry displayed by them, whether attacking or attacked. Thirty-one stand of colours, fifteen pieces of artillery, and 4,000 prisoners are the proud mementoes which signalise its valour, and entitle it to the admiration and gratitude of our country. (Signed A. P. HILL, Lieutenant-General.)'

GENERAL EARLY ON RETALIATION.

GENERAL EARLY on August 6 arrested six citizens of Hagerstown. One of the number escaped. The remainder were brought into the presence of the General. The following address to the prisoners has been put into the mouth of the General by a correspondent of the Philadelphia Age:—

Gentlemen,—I have had you arrested merely as 'hostages' to secure the release of six gentlemen residing near Hedgesville, in Virginia, who are now imprisoned by the Federal Government in consequence of the burning of the house of a Mr. Cookus by Confederate troops.

I have examined the facts in the case, and am thoroughly satisfied that the burning was purely accidental—that, in burning some railroad property which they had been ordered to destroy, the fire, in spite of their efforts, was communicated to the house of Mr. Cookus, not far distant. And yet those six gentlemen, a Rev. Mr. Tongue, a Methodist preacher in that village, who was remarkable as a pious, good man, who did not interfere with politics, and five other gentlemen in the neighbourhood, who were just as ignorant of the approach or purpose of the troops as any of you, are now in prison in consequence of the burning of that house.

The families were stripped of all their personal property, and having no means of conveyance the daughter of the preacher and the niece of one of the others walked eight miles to my headquarters, and with streaming eyes and sad hearts implored my aid in some manner to afford relief. They first wished me to arrest some of their Union neighbours; but I did not feel it proper for the Southern Confederacy to retaliate upon its own citizens. Those men, however misguided they may be, are still citizens of the State of Virginia, and under the protection of her laws; and we hope and trust they will soon see their errors, and yield a cordial allegiance to her Government. But if they should not, it must devolve on the State of Virginia to deal with them according to her own laws. A mere difference of political opinion ought not and must not subject them to military rule. And therefore, inflexibly opposed as I always have been to the destruction of private property, or the molestation of non-combatant citizens, yet it is always in the power of one army to force the other into retaliation.

To illustrate my own views on that subject, permit me to say that, very recently, a short distance across the river, I approved a very severe sentence of two years in the penitentiary, passed upon a soldier for stealing the horse of a notoriously decided Union man. I will further remark that this is the fifth time I have been in Maryland at the head of an army; yet I believe not one private house has been injured nor one non-combatant molested. Once I marched almost to the banks of the Susquehanna at Harrisburg, and thence down to Wrightsville, when the Federal troops, to escape our pursuit, set fire to the bridge in the middle, whence the flames rapidly extended westward, and from its proximity placed the town of Wrightsville in very imminent peril. My troops had just heard of the burning of the town of Darien, in Georgia, by the Federal army; a large number of my men were from that region, and very naturally felt a strong impulse to retaliation; but at my very urgent appeal they all, with alacrity and energy, joined in a united effort, and actually extinguished the flames in time to save the town, and were richly rewarded by the grateful thanks of its citizens, who also bitterly denounced their own troops for exposing them to such danger.

In York, Pennsylvania, I found two large manufactories engaged in making railroad cars for the Government, which, of course, it was my duty to destroy; but a slight examination satisfied me that to burn these would seriously endanger a large portion of the town; and hence I spared them for a moderate ransom. On my return I partly retraced my advancing track, and was greatly surprised to find so little evidence or trace of the passage of so large an army. In fact, except in horses and forage for the army, very little damage had been sustained.

Recently, in Maryland, the house of Governor Bradford was burned without my orders. But I must add that I approved it: and had I been present would have ordered it in retaliation for the burning of the house of Governor Letcher, whom I know to be a very poor man, and whose family were not allowed five minutes to remove clothing or other valuables. Afterwards, when in front of Washington, some of my troops were very determined to destroy the house of Mr. Francis P. Blair, and had actually removed some of its furniture, probably supposing it to belong to his son, the member of the Federal Cabinet. As soon as I came up, I immediately stopped the proceedings, and I compelled the men to return every article so far as I knew, and placed a guard to protect it. The house of his son, Montgomery Blair, a member of the Cabinet, was subjected to a different rule, for obvious reasons.

General Hunter, in his recent raid to Lynchburg, caused wide-spread ruin wherever he passed. I followed him about sixty miles, and language would fail me to describe the terrible desolation which marked his path. Dwelling-houses and other buildings were almost universally burned; fences, implements of husbandry, and everything available for the sustenance of human life, so far as he could do so, were everywhere destroyed. We found many, very many, families of helpless women and children who had been suddenly turned out of doors, and their houses and contents condemned to the flames; and in some cases, where they had rescued some extra clothing, the soldiers had torn the garments into narrow strips, and strewn them upon the ground for us to witness when we arrived in pursuit.

General Hunter has been much censured by the voice of humanity everywhere, and he richly deserves it all; yet he has caused scarcely one tenth part of the devastation which has been committed immediately in sight of the headquarters of General Meade and General Grant in Eastern Virginia. For example, in Culpepper county, where General Meade held his headquarters, almost every house and building has been burned; very few have escaped the flames, and utter desolation is seen on every hand. Even a small tannery, in sight of General Meade's headquarters, where a poor man tanned a few hides for the neighbours on the shares, to furnish shoes for the poor women and children who were necessarily left there, was burned by the army, and the half-tanned skins drawn from the vats and cut into narrow strips to prevent the possibility of their being useful.

Recently they have burned the residence of Andrew Hunter, near Charlestown, with all its contents, requiring his family to stand by and witness the destruction of their home. They did the same with the house of Edmund J. Lee, near Shepherdstown, and repeated it on the buildings of the Hon. Alexander H. Botelor.

Such things, of course, cannot be long endured, and must provoke retaliation whenever it is possible. Accordingly I lately sent General M'Causland to Pennsylvania. I did not wish to retaliate in Maryland, because we all hope and believe that Maryland will eventually be a member of the Southern Confederacy. I therefore sent him to Pennsylvania, with written instructions to demand of the authorities of Chambersburg a sum which would be sufficient to indemnify those gentlemen, and also pay some other damages which I specified in the order; and on default in their compliance, he was instructed to burn the town, which I learn was done. I was very reluctant, and it was a most disagreeable duty, to inflict such damage upon those citizens; but I deemed it an imperative necessity to show the people of the Federal States that war has two sides. I hope and believe it has had, and will have, a good effect. I saw with much pleasure, since then, an able article in the National Intelligencer, which called upon the North to consider gravely whether such a mode of warfare as they had inaugurated is likely to yield a success commensurate to its cost.

And now, gentlemen, I will repeat my sincere regret that I am obliged to subject you to this inconvenience. I have no object but to procure the release of those six citizens of Virginia who are now wrongfully imprisoned, and, therefore, will make you as comfortable as possible. It is notorious, that many of our most respectable citizens, who have been imprisoned by your Government for similar or less serious causes, have been confined in the same room with condemned malefactors. Gentlemen, you need have no fears of such treatment whilst in my custody. I propose to retain four of you, and release the fifth on his parole that he will use his utmost endeavours to procure the release of those six gentlemen. If he succeeds, you will be discharged at once; but if he fails to accomplish this within two weeks, he must surrender himself again to my custody.

In conclusion, I will add that no citizen or resident of Maryland had any previous knowledge of my purpose to arrest you; that your names were furnished by one connected with my army, and without reference to the greater or less intensity of your feelings. The fact that you are reputed to be Union men causes no bitterness of feeling on my part, for I do not forget that I was a Union man myself so long as I deemed Union possible. I was an old-line Whig, and voted for Bell and Everett. I was a delegate from Franklin county in the Virginia Convention, and zealously opposed and voted against the ordinance of secession from the beginning to the end. But the course of events has since thoroughly satisfied me of my error. I now conscientiously believe that it was an absolute necessity; that the political salvation of Virginia depended upon it.

Question by one of the Prisoners: Is it true, as reported, that you have to-day also arrested Dr. Kerfoot and Dr. Cost, at the College of St. James, for the same cause?

General Early replies: I have arrested them, but for a different purpose. There is in Winchester a clergyman named Dr. Boyd, advanced in years, a venerable gentleman distinguished for his Christian piety, and greatly respected in the community. Many months ago he was arrested by the Federal Government as a hostage for two members of a bogus Legislature in Western Virginia, who had been arrested by the Confederacy. After a long imprisonment, the Confederate Government, considering his age, his family, and other circumstances, consented to an exchange, and Dr. Boyd was released. But, very soon after, he was again arrested as a hostage for a man taken within our lines, in citizen's dress, and whose papers found upon him furnished convincing evidence that he was there under a corrupt agreement with a Federal Provost-Marshal in Maryland to decoy negroes from Virginia, to be used as substitutes or soldiers in the Federal army, the heavy bounties or profits to be divided between them. The Government did not treat him as a spy as it might have done, but sent him to Richmond as a prisoner of war, and Dr. Boyd was arrested as a hostage. After a long and tedious imprisonment, the Confederate Government, anxious to relieve so good a man, again consented to an exchange; but its prisoner was by that time ill with typhoid fever, and finally died in prison, which should, of course, have released Dr. Boyd. But he is still held on the pretext of being a hostage for some other. To effect his release, I have to-day arrested Dr. Kerfoot and Dr. Cost, at the College, but paroled them both, on condition that they procure the release of Dr. Boyd, or, if they fail to do this within two weeks, that they return to my custody.

Question by a prisoner (Rev. Mr. Edwards): General, please allow me to enquire whether there may not some difficulty arise from the fact that you have only five of us prisoners, and yet require the release of six?

General Early: That is very true, sir, but I can hardly suppose the Government will raise such a question, seeing the only effect would be to compel me to pick up a few more, sufficient to equalise the numbers.

The prisoners feelingly urged him to release them all, offering their parole in the strongest possible language. The General hesitated a long while, and was slow to yield. Finally, after long discussion, and several personal friends of the prisoners having vouched for their good faith, they were all released on the same conditions as were prescribed on the release of Dr. Kerfoot and Dr. Cost.

For the substantial accuracy of the report of General Early's remarks as given by our correspondent, he refers to all those who were present, including the prisoners themselves.

In private conversation, and on many occasions in public, in the presence of citizens of all shades of opinion, General Early intimated that he would frequently visit Maryland and Pennsylvania, and that he would pursue the war of retaliation as long and as bitterly as circumstances might require.

CANADA, MEXICO, AND THE UNITED STATES.—The prospect of an armistice in the United States naturally draws attention to the condition of the countries which border on that great Federation. In the extreme uncertainty which overshadows the destiny of the American Continent, in the doubt as to what may be the effect upon the minds of a proud and now almost a military people of their admitted failure to coerce a smaller nation by force of arms, we ask ourselves whether the result will be to disgust the public mind with that vain appetite for military glory which has led the nation into such unexampled calamities, or whether they will seek to avenge the discredit of their arms and compensate themselves for their recent losses by the invasion of neighbouring States. The question is momentous for Mexico and for Canada, and we have endeavoured to discharge our duty by pointing out the necessity of defence, and endeavouring to arouse our own colony to a sense of its danger.—The Times, September 15.

PEACE IN AMERICA.

To the Editor of THE INDEX.

SIR,—Permit me to call your kind attention to the progress of the Peace Address to the people of the United States from the people of Great Britain and Ireland, mention of which was made in your paper last week. This movement may now very properly be termed, without exaggeration, a national movement. The sympathy the address is meeting with in every town and hamlet in the United Kingdom is most encouraging to its promoters, while at the same time it is an all-convincing proof that the war policy meets with no favour in the minds and hearts of the British public. Everywhere the sentiment is the same. Ireland, which has suffered so much in the loss of its brave and generous sons—convinced that the sword can never unite the two peoples—is uttering its counsels in favour of peace.

Having recently spent some time in that island, and having mixed with all classes of its people while there, I am convinced, from the support I met with from the press, and the sympathy everywhere expressed for the success of the movement, that Ireland is not last or least in its earnest desire to see peace again reign over that once prosperous and happy country. On this great question the Irish people are unanimous—here is a platform on which the various parties meet in concord. The Protestant and Catholic both zealously unite to promote its object.

The movement is no less popular in this country. By every mail I am receiving such numbers of applications for blank forms that it is difficult to supply the demand; and these come not from one class of persons, but from all classes. One working man, residing in a town in the south of England, writes and says: 'I shall be very happy to serve the movement in obtaining signatures to the address, as I have relatives suffering from this long, and unfortunate, and butchering war.' After being supplied with forms, he writes: 'The address is being signed at the chapels, the public institutions, and many of the shops in the town.' A leading gentleman in Guernsey writes: 'If you will have the goodness to forward me copies of the forms in favour of peace in America, I shall have much pleasure in obtaining all the signatures I can to so desirable a document.' From another town of some 90,000 inhabitants came the following:—'I beg you will send me the necessary forms, and I will get as many signatures as I can. Send enough to supply the different places of worship. Trusting every success will attend your efforts, I am, &c.—P.S. I think we shall obtain at least 20,000 signatures here.'

The applications for blank forms are not confined to private individuals only. The following is from the proprietors of a leading journal in the West of England:—'If you will forward us forms, we will take signatures at our office to the peace address. Our circulation is very large, and we will comment in our columns upon the subject.' London, determined not to remain a silent spectator of the horrible strife, is speaking in a very practical manner in favour of peace. During the first five days after opportunity was afforded to the people for signing there were a vast number of signatures, including the names of noble earls, baronets, members of Parliament, clergymen, merchants, as well as those of artisans.

Surely this unanimous appeal to the people of the United States from people of the same race, of the same religion—nay, more, from their own kindred—must be heard above the din and tumult of the struggle, and in their counsels when they are deliberating as to who shall be the supreme ruler of their country and their liberties for another four years, the counsel so kindly offered in favour of peace will not be without its due influence. Apologising for trespassing, so much upon your valuable space, I am yours obediently,

JOSEPH PARKER,
Agent to the Society for Promoting the Cessation of Hostilities in America.

ARREST OF THE BISHOP OF NATCHEZ.—The New York Freeman's Journal and Catholic Register publishes the special order for the arrest of the Roman Catholic Bishop of Natchez. His offence was refusing to pray for Mr. Lincoln. The order says:—'First—That the said William Henry Elder, Bishop of Natchez, be expelled from the lines of the army of the United States, not to return without permission, on pain of imprisonment during the continuance of the rebellion. Second—That the Provost-Marshal close and hold military possession of St. Mary's Cathedral, situated in the city of Natchez, and all other houses or places of worship within this command, and under the ecclesiastical jurisdiction of said Bishop William H. Elder, in which the prayer for the President of the United States has heretofore been, but is not now, read. Inasmuch, however, as the said Bishop William H. Elder has requested, in a respectful manner, that any action under said Order No. 31 be suspended "until communication can be had with the authorities at Washington," it is further ordered—That action under said Order No. 31, and the paragraphs "First" and "Second" of this order, be accordingly suspended until further orders; and that, in the meantime, the Provost-Marshal of Natchez cause the said William H. Elder, Bishop of Natchez, to report in person, within twenty-four hours after receiving a copy of this order, to the officer commanding the United States forces at Vidalia, and remain within his military lines under penalty of the immediate execution of the before-named orders. The Provost-Marshals at Natchez and Vidalia respectively will see to the strict observance of this order.—By order of Brigadier-General M. BRAYMAN. J. H. ODLIN, Captain and Assistant Adjutant-General.' The same paper observes: 'Bishop Elder, the Catholic Bishop of the see of Natchez, comprising the whole State of Mississippi, is a prisoner in the hands of negro soldiers under the command of Abraham Lincoln! The crime charged against him is nothing he has done, but it is that he has not conformed the religious liturgy of the holy Roman Catholic and Apostolic Church to the ritual prescribed by the satrap of Abraham Lincoln who commands the negro troops at Natchez! Bishop Elder, for not interpolating that holy office, which is said alike throughout the world, "from the rising of the sun to the going down of the same," with a special prayer for that scourge of the country, Abe Lincoln, has been made a prisoner. No public prayer has ever been said in New York, in a Catholic church, for Abe Lincoln! The Catholic ritual is permitted here, so far, without any Puritan interpolation. Bishop Elder, for performing the Catholic ritual, and prescribing its performances, as it is performed here in New York, has been seized, interdicted, and held a prisoner in Mississippi!'

THE LAST FIGHT ON THE WELDON ROAD.

(From the New York World, August 29.)

THERE is a disposition in official circles to claim the fight of last Thursday on the Weldon Road as a decided Union victory. This claim, however, will hardly bear criticism. It is true the enemy failed in his endeavour to drive our forces entirely away from that road; but it is also true that up to the time the battle ceased the advantages were with the Confederates. It is not to be disguised that there is a very serious and uneasy feeling growing up in the country touching evidences of weakness and incompetency in more than one of the corps commanders and subordinate generals of the army of the Potomac. If one single instance of mismanagement was all that we had to deplore, it might be overlooked, and placed to the credit of accident; but when there is a manifest inefficiency and want o preparedness every time an engagement takes place, it looks as though the whole machinery of the army was out of repair. There was blundering on July 30, when the mine exploded; again more blundering on the north of the James, where after two lines of the enemy's works had been captured, they were lost, owing to supports not being in readiness to sustain the captors of the works. The capture of the twenty-seven hundred men in the Fifth corps, after it had got possession of the Weldon road, was another evidence of a singular want of judgment in the formation of the line; and now this last battle was clearly a surprise. Our men were leisurely destroying a portion of the road, when the rebels unexpectedly swooped upon them, broke through our lines, gobbled up batteries and prisoners, recaptured four miles of the road, and only fell back at night when reinforcements to the Union forces came up. No doubt the enemy lost heavily: attacking parties usually do, as we have found to our cost; but it does not look well that the enemy when they attack should do so with so much more judgment and damage to us than are the attacks of the Union army upon them. They are on the alert to take our corps commanders by surprise, and attack our forces before intrenchments are thrown up. It has been our misfortune never to have surprised the enemy except at Spottsylvania and in the instance of the capture of the Weldon road, and we have a fatal habit of waiting till they throw up impregnable intrenchments before getting ready to attack them.

It is quite time the country was undeceived respecting the superlative nonsense of the administration press in laying such stress upon the occupation of a part of the Weldon road. It is undoubtedly true that it would be a sore inconvenience to the Richmond rebels if the Weldon road, with all its connections down to Savannah, were in the possession of our armies; but it must be remembered that all we have secured is a few miles below Petersburg. The whole of that immense line is in running order except at that one point, and the supplies which would otherwise go right through Petersburg to Richmond have now to be wagoned from a point perhaps twenty miles below Petersburg. The rebel army finds no difficulty in supplying itself at the lower end of the Shenandoah valley, a hundred miles away from any railroad. Early to-day keeps up his supplies of military stores entirely by wagons, and there is no reason at all why Richmond cannot steadily obtain all its customary supplies by means of the Weldon road, only that they are put to the inconvenience of wagoning them from a point below Petersburg, instead of sending them through direct.

The administration press have no right to be fostering these absurd delusions in the public mind. We can never defeat Lee's army or capture Richmond by tapping one end of a line of railroad, or by raiding upon another. If Lee is to be defeated, it is by a general competent to manœuvre him out of his works, and who can beat him afterward, or by one whose engineering talents can make his formidable defences useless. Even if the Weldon road, from end to end, were in our possession, the enemy have still the Danville road; granting that that may pass into our possession, Richmond is still fed by the James River canal, by what remains of the Virginia and Tennessee Road, by the Gordonsville road, by the Central road, and by a district immediately around it of very fertile country. Richmond is a great manufacturing point of army stores of all kinds, and it is quite time that the country and our generals were cured of these fantasies which attribute all the strength of the rebels, not the ability of their generals or to the stamina of their soldiers, but to the chance possession of a few miles of railroad iron. Thousands and tens of thousands of cities have stood sieges before railroads were ever known, and they are capable still of standing sieges, were railroads entirely dispensed with.

GENERAL FORREST AND THE NEGROES.—The Richmond Enquirer says:—'It is known that the negroes of the Methodist congregation at Uniontown, Alabama, recently contributed $1,000 to the Association for the Relief of Maimed Soldiers, and being informed that this contribution was sufficient to constitute a life director, they selected General Forrest for that honour.' The Selma Reporter publishes the General's letter to Dr. Neely acknowledging the compliment, in which he says:—'I am not indifferent to the compliment paid me by the "Methodist Congregation of Negroes at Uniontown." I prize this manifestation on the part of the negro more than I fear the thousand calumnies with which a defeated foe are endeavouring to blacken my name. It has been my fortune to have much dealing with the negro since I arrived at manhood, and I have uniformly treated them with kindness and humanity. Those that have been forcibly taken from me I know are sighing for the happy home from which they have been seduced. Those that heeded not the ridiculous promises of the Yankees, and who still remain with me, fly from his approaching footsteps with the same instincts of fear and danger that they would fly from a leprosy. I predict that, after peace shall have been restored, most of the negroes who have been decoyed from their homes, will gladly and joyfully return, infinitely preferring slavery among the Southern people to freedom in the North. Instead of being guilty of the atrocities charged upon me, I have uniformly expressed my sympathies for the negro. He has been deluded by false promises, and I had much rather make war upon the white man who has deceived him.'

The Weser Gazette states that the ship lately announced in the English papers as having hoisted the Confederate flag at Bremerhaven, is the Osacca, sister ship of the Jeddo purchased by the Prussian Government at Bordeaux, and that there is no truth in her transfer under the Confederate flag. The Weser Gazette intimates that Lootsen, the pilot who took her into Bremerhaven, must have perpetrated a hoax upon Lloyd's at London.

DESCRIPTION OF THE RAM TENNESSEE.

(From the New Orleans Times.)

THE ram Tennessee has been some two years building at Mobile, under the immediate eye of the rebel Admiral Buchanan, assisted by the best shipwrights and engineers procurable inside the Confederacy. No expense or pains have been spared to render her armament the most complete of any war vessel afloat, and for the purpose of harbour defence she was, without doubt, the most dangerous to encounter and difficult to capture of any craft which has ever been put afloat. Her length was about 180 feet, and her hull, which was originally intended for a man-of-war, was put together as staunchly and strongly as it is practicable to build one. Her iron armoury consists of 2½ inch iron plates, in bars eight inches wide, which are crossed and bolted together so as to leave no seam. Inside this iron-plating is 24 inches of solid oak, making about 30 inches of solid work on every part exposed to shot. Forward of and including her forward casemates, which embraces perhaps 15 feet in length and takes in also her pilot-house, this thickness is increased to 6 inches of iron and 30 of wood-backing. It is a noticeable fact that this extraordinary strength of iron and wood enabled her to withstand all the steel shot from our rifled pieces, our 11-inch solid shot from our ships of war, and 15-inch shell from the monitors, not one of which penetrated her ribs of iron, while near fifty shots altogether struck her in the engagement. The nearest approach to penetration was from a 15-inch missile from the Manhattan, which made a deep indentation in her broadside, and, by impaction, stove through her 2 feet of oak backing, causing the splinters to fly promiscuously inside. Though under way when this struck her, she is said to have stopped as if a magic wand had touched her. She was armed with four 6-inch Brooks's rifled guns of English make on her broadsides, and two fore and aft, seven and eight inch of same pattern. These, by the completeness of their carriages, could be handled by a single gunner with the greatest ease. Her ports were closed with shutters made of iron plates similar to her external plating. These were attached at the centre of one of their sides by a pivot, on which they revolved by means of a cog-wheel inside, and turned out of the way outside when her ports were opened. This was, in reality, a defective arrangement, and, in the fight, proved an element of weakness to her. Two of these shutters had their system of ratchets and cogs deranged during the action, and could not be afterwards opened. A third (her after one) was shot away entirely—that is to say, the pivot on which it turned was shot off and the shutter fell to the deck, leaving that port open and exposed to our gunners. The precision with which our gunboats aimed can be appreciated by the fact that some ten shots struck her in the neighbourhood of this port, and it was here that Admiral Buchanan was wounded. One of our shells striking in the edge of this casemate splintered the woodwork badly, and the rebel admiral was directing a gunner about clearing this so as to use the after-gun, when a shot struck the casemate and exploded, literally tearing the gunner to atoms and wounding General Buchanan in the thigh. He fell covered with the blood and brains of the slaughtered gunner. The Hartford had undertaken previously to run her down, the Lackawanna had followed suit, as had also the Monongahela and the Ossipee, but without making the least effect upon her solid walls of iron and wood. The Hartford had poured in a broadside, but her 11-inch shells had bounded off from her side like peas. The whole fleet had rained an infernal hail of iron upon her, fore and aft, and on either hand. The Manhattan had sent the persuasion of her 15-inch shells to add to the din about her head, but she held out until her admiral fell, and then, seeing that nothing more remained, she ran up the white flag and surrendered. Captain Pierre Giraud, of the United States steamer Tennessee, who was at the time on the gunboat Ossipee, was requested by the captain of the latter to go on board, and did so, and received the rebel admiral's sword in behalf of Admiral Farragut. In form the Tennessee resembles the old Merrimac, is doubtless fashioned after that short-lived craft, and is without doubt much improved over her. Her sides are sloped like the Merrimac, while her top is flat, and is composed of a network or grating of iron bars, 2½ by 8 inches, placed so as to leave intersecting spaces about 3 inches broad, and affording a complete ventilation to her gun-room while in action. Her rudder chains were a most serious element of weakness with her, being carried along her deck, and covered only with a plate of half-inch iron. They were, consequently, broken early in the engagement, and her rudder was subsequently managed by means of ropes and blocks, which had been attached prior to the action, evidently with a full appreciation on the part of Admiral Buchanan of this defect. Some stress has been laid on the fact of her smoke-stack having been carried away early in the contest, and the impression has been given that this contributed to her surrender. Nothing could be more unwarranted by the facts in the case. This smoke-stack was set on, and shot away only to a level with the top of the gun-room, and the only effect which could come from its loss would be to perhaps lessen the draught of her furnaces. She was armed with a formidable iron prow, which was intended to do some heavy ramming when other offensive devices failed her, and with this she steered for the Hartford at the beginning of the engagement. The superior sailing qualities of the Hartford, together with the eagle eye of the bluff old admiral, enabled him to out-manœuvre the Tennessee, and instead of receiving her running, the Hartford poured into her a broadside. 'Give her one bell, give her two bells, give her eight bells,' said the impetuous Farragut, and they blazed away accordingly. The balls flew off like hail from her iron sides, but she was brought up standing by the concussion and afterwards grew more circumspect in her movements. Of her engines and machinery much has been said, but barely justice done. The engines originally intended for her were found inadequate, and others of greater capacity substituted. She is not swift as it is, however, though they claim seven knots for her, which is doubtless quite all she is capable of making and perhaps less. Some eighty muskets compose a part of her armament, and she has complete appointments of every kind, which it is surprising where the rebels succeeded in obtaining. Had this formidable craft remained under the guns of Morgan until dusk, and then with her wooden consorts come out to the attack, she might have sunk and destroyed half, if not our entire fleet, inside the bay; as, in the darkness and confusion which would have ensued, our own gunboats would have proved as formidable and mischievous to each other as the rebel boats themselves.

TO OUR FRIENDS AND SUBSCRIBERS.

THE INDEX was established in May 1862, in the darkest hour of Confederate fortunes, by earnest friends of Southern Independence, with the distinctly expressed object of being the representative, in English journalism, of a gallant and struggling people appealing to the world not only for political, but still more for moral recognition. Since accepting this great trust, THE INDEX has unceasingly laboured, by the combined aid of English and of Southern writers, to enlarge and extend the common ground upon which two nations may cordially meet, which need only to understand each other in order to cherish the warmest mutual appreciation and lasting friendship. The chief and almost the sole difficulty has been, and is still, the callous indifference of the British Government on the one hand, and, on the other, the perplexity, to the European mind, of the unsolved and unprecedented problems involved in the management and education of four millions of the African race, intermingled with a population of the highest Caucasian type. This difficulty could be met only by a liberal fairness to every shade of honest opinion, by an inflexible adherence to truth under all circumstances, and by a bold avowal of convictions, even though ill received. THE INDEX does not claim to be neutral, but it claims to be independent in the highest sense of that word. It is because it must reflect and appeal to, at one and the same time, the public opinion of two countries as yet only imperfectly acquainted, that this somewhat unusual self-description is called for.

Thanks to arrangements now in successful operation, by which the Letters of regular Correspondents and Newspapers from all parts of the Confederate States are received within from twenty-five to thirty days from their date, THE INDEX is always enabled to present the very Latest Direct News from the South, as well as a faithful reflex of the tone and spirit of the Southern Press.

All communications intended for publication should invariably be addressed to 'the Editor of THE INDEX, 13 Bouverie Street, E.C.,' and unless authenticated by a responsible name, can receive no attention.

THE INDEX.

THURSDAY, SEPTEMBER 15, 1864.

The Nomination and the Platform.

To our thinking, persuaded as we are that in presence of great questions of principles or of policy the direct road is always the shortest and the boldest course the safest, it would have been better if the Convention at Chicago had presented to the people of the United States the issue of peace or war more clearly, and without the evasions and ambiguities with which it was deemed necessary to screen it. The chances of success in the November election might perhaps have been dangerously diminished, though we doubt that; but even then the moral victory would have outweighed the political defeat, and the minority vote recorded distinctly in favour of 'letting the South go' would have been a far more conclusive demonstration than a majority obtained upon evasive generalities. Yet it should in justice be remembered that the Chicago Convention had to address itself, not to the responsible representatives of a nation or to its select wisdom and political sagacity, but directly to over three millions of voters—in other words, to the national sovereignty in its crudest form. The would-be leaders who seek a following among this capricious multitude, must adopt the arts of the courtier, and long habit has taught them to approach their many-headed sovereign with much the same euphemisms and soothing fictions which, we can imagine, would be employed by the chief Mandarins in urging some extremely unpalatable necessity upon the 'brother of the sun and the moon.' If, then, the Convention has not exhibited all the vigour and directness of purpose demanded by the crisis, it is rather the fault of undiscriminating universal suffrage than its own. Keeping this in view, we confess ourselves, upon the whole, as better satisfied with the results than a week ago we should have predicted.

General M'CLELLAN, for reasons which we have repeatedly expressed, is not a favourite with us, but, in the dearth of really great men at the North, we should have some difficulty in naming many others better fitted for the place. In the coupling of his nomination with that of Mr. PENDLETON, a native of the South, and an honest advocate of peace, for the second office in the nation's gift, we recognise the amicable junction, on fair and equal terms, of the two hitherto antagonistic wings of the Democratic party. The most formidable obstacle to success is thus happily removed, and the Democracy presents an undivided front to the two warring factions of the Republicans. It is, further, an auspicious sign that the deliberations of the Convention have been singularly undisturbed by dissensions, and, what has scarcely ever happened since party conventions came into use, the nominations were unanimous not only in form but in fact. If, then, these nominations are not all that we could have wished, we are nevertheless bound to admit that the cause of peace has already largely gained by them.

Even the 'platform' is entitled to the same qualified approval. Compared with similar documents issued in peaceful times, it is perhaps as outspoken and candid as could have been reasonably expected. In fact, if we judge it by the lenient rules applicable to such party committals, we shall find that it is by no means the worst specimen of its class. There are notable instances of Democratic 'platforms' in which the work of emasculation was done far more effectually than in this case, where a party out of office naturally seeks to make its drag-net catch every size of fish. Unlike many precedents which we might quote, the Democratic platform of 1864 has both assertions which mean something and omissions which mean more. There is one terrible threat in this pronunciamento, and it is not directed against the South, but against the Federal Government. It is the threat that any interference with the approaching election will be considered as revolutionary, and justifying forcible resistance. This is the most significant 'plank' of the platform, though the remarkable unanimity with which it was introduced proves that Democrats of every shade of opinion rely for success mainly upon the intense disgust of the masses with the misrule and imbecile tyranny of the present Administration. The urgency of immediate peace is fully recognised in the earnest recommendation of an armistice. How an armistice can be offered which shall be acceptable to the South, is indeed by no means clear, but if such a one can be devised it is certain that hostilities would not be resumed. The suggestion of a 'Convention of the States,' although of course made with the hope of arriving at reunion, has at least this merit, that it virtually sets the Federal Government aside and resolves the Union that was into its original elements. It is self-evident that many embarrassing technical difficulties in the way of arranging the terms either of a new Federal compact or of peaceable separation would thus be removed. The problem of peace is therefore simplified, and this is another step gained in the right direction. The Southern States could not consistently with self-respect enter such a Convention unless the legality of their several acts of secession, and other acts consequent thereon, were distinctly recognised. But the convocation of the States as such is in itself the most complete acknowledgment of their respective sovereignty and indefeasible political individuality. With this principle of State sovereignty and State independence clearly understood beforehand, the South, firm in its unity of purpose and patriotic devotion, might safely consider an invitation, made by the Northern States in good faith, to meet them on equal terms on the bloodless field of argument. There is not, then, necessarily, anything so hopelessly impracticable as many suppose in the suggestion, although, as in the case of the armistice, the difficulties are many and serious, and will require more moderation and political sagacity than the North has yet manifested during this struggle.

If we read these Chicago resolutions—framed and introduced, as is worthy of remark, by the representative, in the Federal Senate, of a slaveholding State and a native Southerner, although not a favourable type of the Southern statesman—by the light of the deliberations after which they were adopted, it becomes more than ever clear that the key-note of the Democratic policy is conciliation, and this fact is of vastly greater importance than the precise phraseology in which that policy is announced. There is in the various speeches and addresses a significant absence of a threatening alternative. The speakers all profess an implicit confidence that conciliation will result in reconciliation, and they are silent as to the means to be employed in event of failure. We had fully expected a certain amount of 'last man and last dollar'-oratory, and it is in this more than in anything else that the Convention has agreeably disappointed us. We venture to say that, for this reason alone, the Confederate Government and people feel more kindly at this moment towards the Northern Democracy than at any time since the war broke out, and will meet them with as hearty goodwill as it is possible to have for men who still hold the attitude of armed enemies.

In keeping with these gratifying indications, to which we direct attention, is the absence from the debates of the Convention and from its published resolutions of any allusion, even indirect, to slavery. It is not even casually referred to as a possible element of difficulty in the adjustment of the quarrel between North and South. Nothing could be more eloquent than this silence on a subject which the partisans of the North have so sedulously represented as the sole cause and object of the war. If the Democratic party should seize the reins of government, and afterwards unhappily a war fever should again seize upon the minds of the Northern people, they will stand denuded of the last rag of a pretext either to themselves or to the world. Here, then, is another, and perhaps the most hopeful, promise of peace.

Endeavouring to review the action of the Chicago Convention without partisan bitterness, and making allowance for its unavoidable shortcomings, we must give it the credit of having done probably the best that could be done under the circumstances. It has at least had the manliness to make an emphatic and solemn avowal of the hopeless failure of the attempt to restore the Union by any other than peaceful means. So wide an abyss as the unprecedented magnitude of this war has placed between the two peoples, cannot be jumped at a single bound; it must be bridged over, and the Convention might have selected a worse foundation and less available materials for the construction of the bridge. We look hopefully, therefore, to the probable success of the Chicago nominees as a heaven-sent opportunity for bringing about a peace honourable to both parties, and conducive to the safety and prosperity of both. At the same time it behoves the South to strive harder than ever, and not to allow herself to be beguiled into temporary security or remission of exertions. If it is wise, as WASHINGTON said, 'in time of peace to prepare for war,' it is assuredly not less necessary in this instance 'in time of war to prepare for peace.' And the true preparation for peace with the North is to enforce by deeds the truth which the North has been so slow to learn, that of the two the South is the better able to prolong the struggle, and that while the North consumes accumulated resources, the South developes exhaustless ones. If we had ambitious wishes of empire for the South, we should desire, great as the cost of life would be, another four years of war. As self-preservation is its only object, we hope for peace.

The War.

THERE is a suspicious coincidence between Mr. STANTON'S military intelligence and the assembling of the Chicago Convention. It is evident that if anything could weaken the ranks of the Democratic party and destroy the ascendency which the advocates of peace have gained, it would be the announcement of brilliant successes to the Federal arms by sea and land. If President LINCOLN could, in the teeth of the overwhelming majority which nominated M'CLELLAN, point to a series of Union victories calculated again to renovate the hopes of the war party, it is quite possible that a rapid reaction in favour of the Administration would ensue, and that LINCOLN'S chances of reelection would be enormously increased. Up to the present moment Mr. STANTON'S telegrams appear to have been passed by absolutely unheeded, and there is no symptom that the Democrats are wavering, or that the friends of peace are losing ground. Mr. STANTON has missed his mark. The Northern public have been too often deceived by the first accounts of brilliant Federal victories, and it is left to Mr. LINCOLN'S organs in this country to accept with absolute confidence all the spurious despatches published at Washington and turn them into history in England.

Undoubtedly the first impression conveyed by the latest intelligence from the seat of war is unfavourable to the Confederate arms, but much of it was expected and had been already discounted by the Northern press, much of it is false, and much of it has an exceedingly suspicious complexion. The surrender of Fort Morgan was a foregone conclusion. Invested on the land sides, completely cut off from all communication with Mobile, and at the mercy of the overpowering fire of FARRAGUT'S flotilla, its capture was obviously only a question of days or hours. General PAGE, the officer in command, knew that, so far as the defence of Mobile was concerned, all his efforts would be useless; and after a show of resistance sufficient for the honour of his flag and for the destruction of such stores as might be serviceable to the enemy, he hauled down his colours. But Fort Morgan is thirty miles from the city of Mobile; the approaches to the city are reported to be among the most strongly fortified in the Confederacy, and unless General GRAINGER'S force is largely augmented he is as far from the capture of Mobile as he was a month ago. The defence of the town is intrusted to the gallant GARDNER, whose protracted resistance at Fort Hudson cost the Federals so dearly; and in his hands there need be no fear of the result.

The next triumph to which Mr. STANTON lays claim, on the strength of alleged despatches from Generals GRANT, MEADE, and HANCOCK, is the battle of the 25th ult. near Ream's Station. So far as we can interpret the intelligence by the light of common sense, this battle appears to have been one of the most decisive successes of the Confederates. On the morning of the 25th two Federal corps d'armée, under Generals WARREN and HANCOCK, occupied about four miles north and south of Ream's Station on the Weldon Railroad, HANCOCK'S corps being posted to the south and strongly entrenched. Early in the morning a considerable body of Confederates, under the command of General HILL, showed itself in front of the Federal works. Two or three reconnaissances in force were made in order to discover the exact position and strength of the Federal lines; and about five o'clock a furious assault under cover of a heavy cannonade was delivered along the whole line. The Federals, behind their entrenchments, poured a deadly fire on the advancing columns; but the Confederates were not to be denied. With mighty and continuous cheers they rushed upon the breastworks; the Federal centre gave way in confusion, the wings were driven back, and only the arrival of heavy reinforcements saved Hancock's corps from utter rout. As it was, 1,900 prisoners and two or three batteries were captured, and four miles of the Weldon Railroad were regained. It is admitted that Hancock's corps was utterly demoralised and would require total reorganisation, and yet Hancock has the modesty to assert that his losses would not exceed 1,400 or 1,500 men, and to compare the action to the battles at Spottsylvania Court House. There is one point of resemblance, it is true. In both cases the attacking force had to assault strong entrenchments, but the Federals were bloodily repulsed, and the dashing charge of the Confederates was crowned with success. It is hardly possible in the face of this disaster that Warren will be able to maintain his position at Ream's Station for many days.

From Georgia the news is singularly obscure. Two days before the departure of the steamer it was officially reported that Atlanta was occupied by a corps of Sherman's troops; that Sherman's main army had got on Hood's line of communication with the South, and that a great battle had been fought between the two armies, in which of course the Confederates were beaten. Now this may be true, but it is singularly inconsistent with other authoritative statements. In the first place, a considerable Confederate force—the united commands of Wheeler, Roddy, and Morgan—was known to be operating upon Sherman's lines in the neighbourhood of Murfreesborough; this force must have been in possession of Sherman's main line, and had of course cut the railroads. It is not easy to see, therefore, by what channel the despatch of General Slocum reached Mr. Stanton. In the second place, the news eagerly caught at by Mr. Lincoln's partisans was discredited at New York twenty-four hours after its publication; and we can scarcely believe, considering the necessities of the Lincoln Cabinet, that, if Atlanta had really fallen, Mr. Stanton would not have taken pains to authenticate the fact. But even if Atlanta be occupied by the Federals, the result is by no means so disastrous to the Confederates as it would have been six weeks ago. Hood has had ample time to remove the stores and the machinery which constituted the chief importance at Atlanta; he has had time to place in the field, equip, and drill the whole Georgian militia, and to establish another stronghold at Macon. If, therefore, Atlanta has fallen, it is a barren conquest to Sherman. Within eighty miles he has confronting him a large and increasing Confederate army; he is dependent on one line of communication upwards of 250 miles long, for the most part traversing hostile territory, and he has moreover a strong Confederate cavalry force in his rear which may at any moment permanently intercept his supplies and compel a disastrous retreat.

Anglo-Federal Journalism.

It is inevitable that the cause of the North should have some partisans in this country, and it is strong testimony to the justness of the cause of the South that the Federal partisans are so few in number. It has been said that the English aristocracy are the sole sympathisers with the Confederates, and that their sentiment is the result of animosity to the Republican institutions of the United States, it being forgotten that in the South Republican institutions are upheld. The truth is, however, that all sorts and conditions of men in England are pro-Southern; and not only in west-end clubs, but at meetings of working men, the cause of the South meets with almost unanimous support. Or take the case of the English press. We can count on the fingers of one hand the journals which are pro-Northern. Conservative papers, Liberal papers, and Radical papers, are on the side of the South. The Times, the Morning Herald, the Morning Post, the Daily Telegraph, the Morning Advertiser, differing widely on many questions, are perfectly agreed on the American question, and recognise the hopelessness and the wickedness of the attempt of the United States to subjugate the South. Curiously enough the papers which are pro-Northern—the Daily News, the Morning Star, and the Spectator—are more bound, by the political principles which they profess, to support the cause of the South than almost any other English journals. They are for free trade, and free trade is the policy of the Confederate States. Yet we find them taking part with the North, which desires to impose a protective tariff on the South. These pro-Northern journals claim to be the representatives of advanced Liberalism, and the defenders of popular rights; yet we find them advocating a policy of military coercion, and assuming that they are sincere in professing to regard the war as a war of emancipation, we find them advocating the use of the sword for redressing what they call a moral grievance. These journals, especially the Star and Daily News, are vehemently opposed to the preservation of political connections by force; and are so sensitive in this particular, are so anxious that every community should be independent, are so opposed to centralisation, that they ask England to give up her empire in India, and to declare her colonies politically independent of the mother country. Yet these very journals defend a war waged by the United States to hold in enforced political union a territory vast enough to form more than one great empire. These journals are never tired of denouncing the conduct of our forefathers in striving to put down the rebellion of the American colonies by force of arms; yet they think it right that the North should wage a bloody and exhausting war, because Sovereign States choose to secede from a Federal union. It is hard to believe, but still we are bound to believe, that these journals are blind to the inconsistency of their policy in reference to the American question, and that they are sincere in their belief that the cause of the North is a righteous one. If, however, we reflect how these journals give credence to the most absurd statements put forth by the supporters of the Lincoln Administration—how they insist upon calling Federal failures triumphs and Confederate triumphs failures—we shall be able to understand that those who support the North may be deceived, though, happily, they cannot deceive others.

In the Spectator of Saturday last there is an article on President Davis cleverly written, and which would be powerful except that its statements are manifestly absurd. The article commences by pointing out the superior statesmanship of the South, and certainly no one can dispute that in this particular our contemporary does not err. The conduct of Confederate affairs has from the beginning been dignified and eminently successful, whilst the conduct of the Northern Government has been marked by an utter want of decency and the grossest imbecility. Perhaps no nation ever had worthier leaders than the South has; most assuredly no nation ever had more unworthy leaders than the North has. The Spectator, after this exordium, draws a sensational portrait of Mr. Davis. He is represented not only as the leader but the maker of a revolution. But for him there would have been no secession; but for him the North and the South would have had no dispute. It is Mr. Davis who broke up the Union. He plunged the country into war. He forced and still forces the Southerners against their will to fight for fancied rights and for an imaginary independence. He keeps 4,000,000 slaves in bondage. Nay, more, he literally enslaves 6,000,000 white men. But in the midst of all this he is unmoved, and his fell purpose is unchanged. His ambition is insatiable, and he cares not for the misery that has come upon a continent. But let us quote a single passage from the article to which we are referring. The Spectator says, Mr. Davis, who received Messrs. Jaques and Gilmore at Richmond, 'sat there quietly in the clear knowledge that through his initiative at least half a million of men have lost their lives; that that initiative was taken in the deliberate wish to mould a nation into institutions that are essentially incompatible with freedom and popular education; that for this purpose he has still to supply out of rapidly-failing resources the strength of two great armies, to keep up the heart of a weary and ignorant people, and to keep down the heart of one still more weary and ignorant which he retains in servitude; and that the great struggle, the tide of which for four years has gravitated steadily against him, may easily last at least as many more with constantly dwindling hope for this great project, which almost rests on his own life and that of his great military colleague, General Lee.'

The writer in the Spectator is terrified at the vision that he thus conjures up. He is shocked at the sight of such superhuman power conjoined to such a devilish purpose. He is about to succumb to the fascination of the Evil One, and to fall down and worship him. But he is saved by a curious reminiscence. He recollects—that is to say, he thinks he recollects—that in early life this arch-demon of the New World was guilty of a petty crime. Mr. Davis might have imposed his fetters on the editor of the Spectator as well as on the people of the South had it not been for 'the vulgar Mississippi fraud of Mr. Davis's early days.'

Now be it observed that our contemporary does not intend all this for a joke, but puts it forward seriously and solemnly. We will endeavour to treat the matter seriously, and to point out how unnecessary is the Spectator's alarm. And we do so especially because the Mississippi bond consolation is a mistake.

No doubt Mr. Davis occupies a most distinguished position, and he is worthy to be at the head of the Government which manages the affairs of the country at such a momentous crisis of its history. No doubt Mr. Davis has displayed consummate ability, and those high and noble qualities which have fairly made his name a household word in English homes. But it is not true that Mr. Davis made the revolution, and in carrying on the War of Independence he only conforms to the wishes of the Southern people. Does the Spectator never meet with a Southern newspaper? If so, it would see that the President of the Confederate States, though a devoted patriot, is not more devoted to the cause of independence than the people. In the South the prisons are not filled with political offenders, and the press is free. The acts of the Administration are sharply criticised and frequently censured, and the censures are generally directed against what some ardent spirits think is a want of vigour in carrying on hostilities against the North. Mr. Davis, and the eminent men who are joined with him in the conduct of the government, both civil and military, have often been charged with lukewarmness because they have not been swift to avenge the infamous atrocities perpetrated by Federal officers. So far from Mr. Davis being a despot, not even in England is the civil power more supreme or the liberty of the citizen more secure than in the Confederate States. Perhaps under like circumstances, in the midst of a great struggle for independence, and contending against a powerful invader, no country maintained its free institutions so inviolate and intact as the South has done. Mr. Davis is the elect of the Southern people, and his power and influence are due to the respect in which he holds the institutions of the country.

When we are told that Mr. Davis wishes to 'mould a nation into institutions,' we may well ask what institutions. We suppose the Spectator refers to the institution of slavery; but it is a little too bad to charge Mr. Davis with being responsible for that. Negro slavery in the South existed before this war began—nay, it existed before the First War of Independence. It was English Governments, it was the monarchs of England, that, against the will of the Southern people, moulded the South into the institution of slavery.

A few words will be sufficient about 'the vulgar Mississippi fraud of Mr. Davis's earlier days.' It happens that Mr. Davis was not in public life when the Mississippi bonds were issued and repudiated, and had no more to do with the affair than the editor of the Spectator. Long afterwards, when Mr. Davis was Senator for Mississippi, and the State he represented was assailed on account of these bonds, he defended his constituents; and those who know the history of the affair will admit that the validity of the obligations was impeachable, that, though it might have been politic for Mississippi to have paid the bonds, yet in doing so she would have rewarded those who had planned and executed an infamous fraud on the State.

We trust our readers will not suppose that we are so forgetful of what is due to the high character of the President of the Confederate States, as to think it necessary to defend him from such a grotesque attack as that which appears in the Spectator. Our only object is to point out an extraordinary instance of the blindness to the most palpable facts which afflicts the few English journalists who defend the conduct of the United States in their attempt to subjugate the South.

The Nominees of the Chicago Convention.—So great an interest attaches to the nominations for the offices of President and Vice-President of the United States made by the recent Democratic Convention at Chicago, that a word of the selected candidates personally will, we are sure, be acceptable to the general reader. George B. M'Clellan is, perhaps, as widely known in connection with the American war as any other personage, Federal or Confederate, soldier or civilian. His father was an eminent surgeon of Philadelphia, where about the year 1820 the 'Young Napoleon' was born. He was entered at the proper age as a cadet in the United States Military Academy at West Point, and maintained the first rank there for good conduct and proficiency in his studies. It is remarkable that he was a fellow-classmate of Stonewall Jackson, whom he distanced in the competition for graduation honours, coming out as No. 1 at the very head of the list, while Jackson stood No. 13. [Lee and Beauregard both, in their respective classes, came out No. 2.] It is further noteworthy that M'Clellan and Jackson were not known to each other at West Point, but became acquainted for the first time while serving two guns of Magruder's celebrated battery at the battle of Contieras in the war with Mexico. This war gave to both the earliest opportunity for a practical acquaintance with their profession. M'Clellan gained credit for 'gallant and meritorious conduct' on several memorable fields. Subsequently he rose to the rank of major, and in the year 1854 was named, singularly enough, by Jefferson Davis—then Secretary of War of the United States—as first of a commission of three officers who were sent to study the operations of the contending armies in the Crimea. The report of the commission was written by M'Clellan, and was commended as a valuable document. Soon after his return from Sebastopol he resigned his commission in the army and became the president or superintendent of a Western railway—the Illinois Central, if we mistake not—in which office the war inaugurated by Abraham Lincoln found him. Of his active participation in that war, during the first two years of its progress, we need say nothing, as the reader must freshly remember it, from Rich Mountain to Antietam. In person General M'Clellan is about the middle height, his eyes and hair are dark, his expression is somewhat grave but pleasing, and his whole appearance, if not striking, is agreeable. Politically he is known as a War Democrat; that is, he is willing to carry on the war under the Constitution to restore the Union, but will be willing to make peace if thereby he can secure his election.

The candidate for the Vice-Presidency, George H. Pendleton of Ohio, is a Peace Democrat, avowedly and consistently, having deprecated the war from the beginning. He is a native of the State of Virginia, and several years the senior of M'Clellan. In the Federal House of Representatives, while yet the Union survived, he voted always with the Southern men; and, since the dissolution, he has shared the views and spoken freely the sentiments of Vallandigham. In the election of last year, when Vallandigham was defeated, Mr. Pendleton was returned as the representative of the 1st district by more than one thousand majority over his Republican competitor. In private life, we are assured by those who knew him in the old régime, he is an amiable and cultivated gentleman, and his character is therefore in striking contrast with that of many who have filled very prominent positions at Washington since the war began.

Torpedo Batteries.

The immense destructive power of the submarine mine is now one of the well-ascertained facts of military science, but its effectiveness as an engine of war has nowhere been demonstrated with more convincing evidence than in the Confederate States of America, where it was brought into use in the beginning of the war, and has latterly formed one of the principal means of attack and defence in the contest between those States and the Northern Government.

A most striking instance of its successful employment, and one from which we may date its adoption into general use, occurred on the Yazoo River, Mississippi, in 1863, where a Federal ironclad was totally destroyed with nearly the whole of her crew. In the same year in June it was also employed against an attacking squadron in the James River, Virginia. When one of the leading vessels, the steamer Com. Barney was disabled, a portion of her armour torn off, and the fleet compelled to retire down the river with this vessel in tow, in a sinking condition. And again, this year we have accounts of the total destruction of other Federal vessels with nearly the whole of their crews, by means of the submarine mine, viz. one of the vessels attached to the fleet now in the James River, Virginia. The transport steamer Maplelaf, in the St. John's River, Florida, and more recently still the new double-turreted monitor Tecumseh, before the port of Mobile, besides numerous other striking examples of its successful employment in waters tributary to the Mississippi river, Chesapeake, and other bays. Thus we are in possession of abundant proof of the importance of the torpedo as a stationary obstruction, while on the other hand its application and use, when attached to the bows of vessels, by the Confederates has presented to the world a perfectly new feature in naval warfare which promises at no distant day to create an entire revolution in the present system of naval architecture, as well as in the existing methods of coast defence.

This novel engine of war, having been attached to the bows of small wooden steamers, an attack was made by them against the Federal frigates New Ironsides and Minnesota, and so much damaged them by the explosion as to render them unfit for further effective service till docked for repairs.

It was also employed in like manner against the new sloop-of-war Housatonic, attached to the Federal blockading squadron off Charleston, which ship filled and went down in eight minutes after the explosion of the torpedo under her counter. Could the Confederates have valued and brought this system of defence into general use in the beginning of the war, it is much doubted whether they would have lost the rich and productive region of eastern North Carolina, and its valuable inland water communication, so desirable for the support of their armies, as well as some other points, the capture of which gained for the Federal navy its prestige at the commencement of hostilities.

These torpedoes have, without doubt, had a demoralising influence upon some of the crews of Federal vessels while operating near the Confederate lines of defence, from the knowledge, but too well impressed on them, of the fate that awaited those who ventured too near the unseen but terrible instrument of destruction. This terror inspired by the torpedo is not confined to those on board of ships that are liable to run over them, but is shared alike by those who cruise along the coast, or ride at anchor in the roadsteads; for we see by published statements of the 'war correspondents' of American journals, that the Federal 'ironclad vessels anchored before the harbour of Charleston are all surrounded or encased with frames of heavy timber, extending some distance from the vessels, to prevent the approach of the rebel torpedo boats.'

It is necessary to bear in mind that hitherto, in the application and use of the torpedo on board of vessels in the South, they have invariably been small craft, similar to the one described by the war 'correspondent' of the New York Herald of the August 23, as follows:

A TORPEDO CRAFT.

When the first Monitor appeared off the harbour the rebels essayed her immediate destruction, and brought down from Mobile a cigar-shaped torpedo boat that had been prepared in readiness for such a service. While mooring her in the lower bay her boiler exploded, killing one man, scalding another so badly that his life is despaired of, and taking off the leg of her captain. This was the entire crew. The craft is now sunk in Navy Cove, which is in our possession. When our fleet ran into the harbour efforts were being made to raise and repair the vessel, but they were frustrated by our advent. Farragut will doubtless look after the prize when he finds an opportunity.

It will be seen, however, from the following paragraph from THE INDEX, under date of 25th ultimo, that this new and formidable engine of war is being introduced into the Northern navy as a part of the regular armament of their ironclad ships:—

The repeated proofs given during the war in America of the immense destructive power of the torpedoes, or submarine batteries employed by the Confederates, and which are attached by a peculiar apparatus to a number of their vessels, has induced the Federal Government to take a leaf out of the enemy's book in this respect, and a letter from the United States informs us on the best authority that this new and formidable engine of war has been extensively introduced in the Federal navy, and several ironclads are already fitted with the same apparatus as the Confederates employ, or one closely resembling it.

It is unhesitatingly asserted by competent judges, that a vessel properly constructed for the application of the Torpedo battery, and possessing superiority of speed, would prove a formidable antagonist against a number of frigates, although armed with the heaviest metal, for it would present the least surface to their fire, and always under the most acute angles. One especial advantage which it possesses is, that it may be worked at all times: for instance, in a rough sea, when ordinary guns could not be used; while it may be employed with certain success under cover of darkness against an enemy's fleet, disabling, destroying, or driving them away from the coast altogether.

Great economy, simplicity, and safety are further and no less valuable and important qualities claimed for the submarine battery: neither the battery itself nor the men working it are in the least exposed, the apparatus being situated much below the line of flotation. As this destructive agent comes more generally into use, which it assuredly must after the experience of its terribly swift and sweeping effects furnished by the American war, a new field will be opened for the inventive genius of our naval constructors, to devise ways and means to ward off or escape so unpleasant a weapon of attack, more formidable than those possessed by Warriors, Royal Sovereigns, &c., for there is no ship now afloat of sufficient strength to resist its power, nor guns of heavy calibre enough to penetrate the armour of a vessel bearing it, when properly constructed for the purpose.

The Lords of the Admiralty have had this new engine of war under consideration, and referred it to a board of competent officers, who approved and recommended its adoption as an auxiliary for the defence of harbours and roadsteads. Though the authorities may not at present be impressed with the necessity of immediately taking up and applying this new and most important development of naval engineering, the changes which it is destined to bring about in the naval armaments of all countries alike, will assuredly ere long be forced upon them; and the requisite measures for keeping up in this respect with the march of events, must soon enter largely into the general estimates for war purposes.

FEDERAL RULE IN KENTUCKY.—A correspondent of the New York Daily News gives a long account of Federal outrages in Kentucky, from which we extract the following:—'The Hon. Joshua F. Bullitt, now Chief Justice of Kentucky, has been arrested, torn from his home and family, and is now in a Lincoln Bastile. No cause for this, except devotion to constitutional liberty and hatred of tyranny. The Hon. Wiley P. Fowler, a distinguished circuit judge in South Kentucky, has been arrested by negro soldiers and is also in prison. Cause—opposition to Lincoln. The Federal tyrants seem to dread judges and courts. Their policy is to drive all honest men from the bench, and place in their stead their Leavetts, Goodloes, Ballards, and other tools of power. It is currently reported here this morning, that the Hon. Garrett Davis, United States Senator, and Brutus J. Clay, Congressman, have been compelled to flee the State. Cause—opposition to Lincoln. In addition to this I might mention hundreds of other prominent citizens, who have been arrested or driven from the State. No reason whatever except opposition to Lincoln. In the county of Hancock, I am reliably informed that white men, respectable white men, have been stripped and their backs lacerated by their own servants under the order of Lincoln soldiers. From the county of M'Craken and the city of Paducah hundreds of citizens, with their wives and children, have been arrested by negro soldiers and marched out of the State to Canada and elsewhere. Banished without cause, except hostility to Lincoln. More than fifty of these Paducah citizens, I am told, were landed the other day and marched through the streets by negro soldiers, whose demeanour towards the females was of a most insulting character.'

THE LAUREATE'S LATEST VOLUME.*

Few poets have ever had a wider range of thought and sympathy, a more varied power of conception and comprehension, than Alfred Tennyson. And if it be true that the peculiar gift of the poet is to enter with heart and mind into the poetry of other souls and other lives—if men are right in placing in the lowliest rank the writer who can give expression only to the passions of his own nature and the inner experiences of his own being—then assuredly a place among the highest votaries of the divinest art belongs to our present Laureate, whose power to realise all ages, all minds, all creeds—to enter into the spirit of the most different phases of life and belief, and to utter with equal truth, pathos, and beauty, the thoughts that belong to phases of humanity and realms of fancy the most remote from one another—has rarely indeed been equalled, and never surpassed, by man or woman born. Even in his earliest volumes, this diversity of subject—this power of living alike in the most real and homely scenes of earthly existence, and in the airiest and most unreal realms of imagination—was already apparent. We could discern even then the wonderful intuition which made solid ground of the regions of classic mythology or elfin romance, and—a yet rarer endowment—could not so much throw a halo of romance over the most practical doings of daily life, but rather subtilise and beautify that life itself into romance of the purest and most charming kind. Tennyson's most ideal characters are perfectly human—are such that we realise them to ourselves as living creatures, not in their essential nature seeming to 'vary from the kindly race of men;' while the most real and ordinary beings in whom he seeks to interest us become in his hands full of a pathos and poetry which none other could have evolved out of them, and yet which never seems in the slightest degree—never in a single touch, a phrase, or a thought—incongruous or inconsistent. He can realise Œnone: he can spiritualise a miller's daughter; he can give us to comprehend Ulysses as a man, with a character thoroughly complete, individual, possible, and self-consistent; and he can draw poetry from the meditations of a Bohemian over his pint of port wine. Hitherto the staple of his volumes has been ideal in subject and real in treatment. He has given us the deep spiritual meditations that arise in the mind of a sensitive, highly-cultivated, refined scholar in sorrowing over the memory of a dear and valued friend lost in the warmth of youth, when friendship is deep enough for lifelong memory, and sorrow not too deep to be dwelt on and cherished. He has given us some exquisite pictures of the most beautiful or most heroic creations of the Hellenic muse, realised for us the restlessness of Ulysses and the anguish of the deserted Œnone, and, in a few lines, made Telemachus more intelligible than we found him in Homer, and cleared his memory from the associations of pedantic morality in which Fenelon had involved it. He created for the worshippers of female equality a fairyland wherein their doctrines have had fair play, and acquired a scope which it is not convenient to afford them on this workday earth. He gave us, in fragments of a great epic, such a picture of the court of King Arthur as has made the spirit of chivalry dear to many who were wont to scoff at it, and rendered it at once clearer and dearer to those whose dreams had always clothed the age of gold in the garb of knighthood, and sought in the ideal of chivalry the standard of manly perfection. So thoroughly has he understood that ideal, that henceforward it is his King Arthur that will replace in English minds the hero of British legend, and his conception of knighthood that will mould the chivalric dreams of youth for generations yet to come.

But from time to time the Laureate has given to the world poems which showed that his mind did not dwell only in the fairyland of mythology or romance—poems which proved him truly the poet of his own age, entering fully into its spirit, capable of admiring its virtues, and probing its foibles and scourging its vices with no sparing hand. In 'Maud'—sympathising with a reaction that was then carrying the country, awakened from a slothful dream of gold-getting, beyond the bounds of reason and sobriety—he wrote a hasty and overstrained satire on the worst features of this nineteenth century; the greed and selfishness that had grown over the heart of England during forty years of peace. The age read, failed to understand, and has consented to forget, a poem which added nothing to the fame of its one great poet. In his present volume, announced some time ago under the title of 'Idylls of the Hearth,' we have three long poems of domestic life replete with deep pathos, poetic beauty, and tragic earnestness—poems which will touch the hearts of many to whom the sorrows of Œnone are uninteresting and the wretched immortality of Tithonus too unreal to be affecting; which will be fully, deeply, and warmly appreciated by thousands to whom the Princess is a puzzle and Maud a wilderness of extravagances. Out of things that have happened in our own day, and might happen again to-morrow in the bosom of our own families—in one case out of an incident which cannot even be called uncommon—the poet has evolved idylls as touching, as beautiful, and as truly romantic as 'Elaine' itself. And though, belonging as these do to the age, and those to all time, it is possible that the Idylls of the King may perpetuate the name of Tennyson when these simpler lays shall be forgotten, it may well be that among thousands of living Englishmen to whom King Arthur is still unknown Enoch Arden will ere long be familiar as a household name.

The story of the first and principal of these poems—that which gives title to the volume—is very simple, but as intensely tragic as the saddest tale that ever thrilled the hearts and drew the tears of an audience. It is the tale of a sailor who left his home to earn an income which should secure an education for his children and enable them to rise in life; who was wrecked on a desert island; who lay there for years, having seen his two original companions die before his eyes; who was rescued, and returned home to find his wife remarried and his children under the care of a stepfather who had done for them all that he had himself toiled so hard to gain the power to do; and who, after gazing unseen upon the family assembled in their new home, turned away, kept his secret from all, and went back to his lonely lodging to die. The life of all the parties, the wife and her two husbands, is traced from early childhood in lines of perfect simplicity, but of exquisite beauty and truth; the rough, hearty sailor-lad, the sweet-tempered little girl who was playmate and pet of both, and the miller's son, who, richer, more refined, but weaker, was pained by her preference of his young rival, but stung into no ungenerous thought or act. With excellent tact, the poet has taken care to attract our interest and compassion to all three; giving the erring wife and second husband every excuse and temptation that could lessen their error and forbid us to judge them harshly. It is the consciousness of their innocence and their excellence—of the cruel injustice which exposure would have inflicted on them—that reconciles the reader to the still more cruel wrong endured, the painful self-sacrifice so heroically made, by the returning Enoch, and the anguish endured > when the dead man come to life beheld

* Enoch Arden, &c. By ALFRED TENNYSON, D.C.L., Poet Laureate. London: Moxon & Co., Dover Street. 1864.

> His wife, his wife no more, and saw the babe,
> Hers yet not his, upon the father's knee,
> And all the warmth, the peace, the happiness,
> And his own children tall and beautiful,
> And him, that other, reigning in his place,
> Lord of his rights and of his children's love.

So tragical is the story, that it might be thought almost too painful for poetry, had it been told with less of delicacy, tenderness, and calmness than pervade these pages. There is nothing of spasmodic vehemence, no violent outbreak of passion; the whole is toned down to the same spirit of grave, restrained, unutterable sadness in which the outcast father and husband turns from the sight of his lost home, and resolves that no word or sign from him shall break in upon the peace and innocence which he could never restore.

The second poem is of a more ordinary character—a tale of disappointed love and selfish pride, ending in the breaking of two young hearts and the utter desolation of two happy homes. Sir Aylmer Aylmer is the lord of an ancient domain, where his fathers have succeeded one another time out of mind, in

> A sleepy land where under the same wheel
> The same old rut would deepen year by year;
> Where almost all the village had one name;
> Where Aylmer followed Aylmer at the Hall
> And Averill Averill at the Rectory
> Thrice over.

The last rector, Averill, had a younger brother; the last Aylmer an only daughter; and these two had grown up from childhood in an intimacy which at last ripened into passionate love. Discovered at last by the purse-proud father, this love is rebuked and denounced in furious language; the daughter driven to her chamber and the lover from the hall; their correspondence detected and intercepted; suitors of wealth and fortune forced upon her only to be obstinately refused, while he is prosecuting his studies in town in the hope of making the means of maintaining his wife. At last the severities practised on the unhappy girl attain an unlooked-for result:—

> So that the gentle creature, shut from all
> Her charitable use, and face to face
> With twenty months of silence, slowly lost,
> Nor greatly cared to lose, her hold on life.
> Last, some low fever ranging round to spy
> The weakness of a people or a house,
> Like flies that haunt a wound, or deer, or men,
> Or almost all that is, hurting the hurt—
> Save Christ as we believe him—found the girl,
> And flung her down upon a couch of fire,
> Where, careless of the household faces near,
> And crying on the name of Leolin,
> She, and with her the race of Aylmer, passed.

Her lover, that same night, starts from his sleep with a sharp answer to her cry, and, when the tidings of her death are brought to him, is found dead, slain by his own hand. The Rector, his brother, asked by the Aylmers to make reference from the pulpit to their lost child, preaches a sermon on the text, 'Your house is left unto you desolate,' in which, amid the indignant sympathy of the congregation, he denounces the harshness that had bereft them all, and yet cannot but pity the parents whose sin has brought upon them so awful a retribution:—

> May not that earthly chastisement suffice?
> Have not our love and reverence left them bare?
> Will not another take their heritage?
> Will there be children's laughter in their hall
> For ever and for ever, or one stone
> Left on another? Or is it a light thing
> That I, their guest, their host, their ancient friend,
> I, made by these the last of all my race,
> Must cry to these the last of theirs, as cried
> Christ ere His agony to them that swore
> Not by the Temple but the gold, and made
> Their own traditions God, and slew the Lord,
> Your house is left unto you desolate'?

The unhappy and remorseful mother is crushed by his terrible appeal, and carried swooning from the church, followed by her husband—never to return to it till borne thither to find their last home beside their murdered child. The punishment is rarer in these days than the sin; but it may be that if we could learn the secrets of some august homes, we should find parents who have shared the Aylmers' sin living to suffer a retribution even more terrible.

'Sea Dreams' is a pretty domestic idyll; the subject being the visit of a clerk and his wife to the seaside, and her efforts to induce her husband to forgive the man who had induced him to invest his savings in a fraudulent company.

The next two poems have something of a different tone about them. 'The Grandmother,' a woman verging at least on her ninetieth year, having survived her contemporaries and her children, receives the news of the death of her first-born and last surviving son, and pours forth to her grandchild a flood of recollections and thoughts called forth by the event; thoughts of her wooing—of her children, in their childhood and in their manhood, who are all dead, and yet are so present to her fancy that she cannot always remember whether they are living or not; her pride in Willy, who is just gone 'from this room into the next,' and the bitter tears which she had wept over 'the babe that was dead before it was born.'

'The Northern Farmer' is full of humour, mingled with a strange pathos. The old man lies on his deathbed, scolding his attendant for her neglect—apparently a daughter or granddaughter—full of anxiety about the farm, and not merely reluctant to die, but most indignant with Providence—whom he strangely confuses with the parson—for the want of judgment displayed in removing so valuable a man from the world.

> A mowt 'a taäken Jones, as 'ant a aäpoth o' sense,
> Or a mowt 'a taäken Robins, a never mended a fence;
> But Godamoighty a must taäke meä, and taäke ma now
> Wi' 'auf the cows to cauve and Thormaby holms to plow.

Looking back on his life, the old man sees nothing to repent and much to be proud of. He has done his duty by Squoire, and he has done his duty by all; above all he has done his duty by 'the loud,' and he feels sure that Squoire will miss him terribly. He is ill-satisfied with 'parson,' who has brought up his sins to him in a manner that seems to him to savour of ingratitude:—

> Thof a knaws I hallus voäted wi' Squoire and Choorch and Staäte,
> An' i' the woost o' times I wur never agin the raäte.
> And I hallus comed to's choorch afore moy Sally wur deäd,
> An' heerd un a bummin' awaäy loike a buzzard clock ower my yeäd,
> An' I never knawd what a meand, but I thowt a'ad summut to saäy,
> An' I thowt a said what a owt to 'a said, and I comed awaäy.'

But the doctor, who is a ''tottler,' has incurred his extreme indignation by trying to stop his ale:—

> Doctors they knaws nowt, for a saays what's nawways true:
> Naw soort o' koind o' use to saay the things that a do.
> I've 'ed my point o' yaale ev'ry night sin' I bean 'ere,
> And I've 'ed my quart ev'ry market noight for forty year.

Who is to hold the land after him is a subject of great anxiety, for it is to the land that his attachment clings. He hopes it won't be Jones or Robins; or, worse than all,

> Summun ull come ater me mayhap wi' is kittle o' steam
> Huzzin and maäzen the blessed fealds wi' the devil's own team.
> Gin I mun doy I mun doy, and loife they says is sweet,
> But gin I mun doy I mun doy, for I couldn' abear to see it.

Of the 'Miscellaneous' poems the most notable is the exquisite 'Tithonus,' the lament of the aged favourite on whom Aurora had conferred the fatal and irrevocable gift of immortality, which was published some time ago in the Cornhill Magazine. Never was the spirit of a purely classical legend more exquisitely rendered into modern poesy. The volume concludes with some 'Experiments' in various kinds of verse. Two of these are notable—one a hendecasyllabic fragment, in which the tone and voice of Catullus, if we may so speak, is distinctly and perfectly audible—the other a fragment which proves that one living man, at least, is capable of translating Homer into blank verse. The passage is perfectly Homeric, and thoroughly well rendered; and its extreme brevity is its only fault. Of the hundred specimens of translation from the Iliad we have lately seen, none is in the most distant degree comparable to this, which as far surpasses Mr. Gladstone's attempt as that transcends the abominable jingle of Professor Francis Newman.

THE COST OF PEACE.

(From the Richmond Enquirer.)

THE fact that the people of the Confederate States are, and for three years have been, most anxious for peace, and prepared at any moment to make peace, has not been mistaken for a willingness to make peace upon any other terms than those they offered before the war began, namely: the recognition of the Confederate States. No man understands the meaning of the peace professions made by the press and people of these Confederate States better than Mr. Seward. He knows that no necessities have caused these professions, and that, though they may even sue for peace, they are prompted by no fears as to the result of the war. However great may appear the anxieties of these people for peace, Mr. Seward knows they feel no apprehension from continued war.

The people of the United States are beginning to understand these professions; they, too, can readily comprehend how a brave and determined people may most earnestly desire peace, and yet by no means be afraid of war. Our readiness to make peace upon the recognition of these States, together with the fact that Mr. Lincoln, after three years of wasting and ruinous war, has not been able to reduce the terms of peace in the least from what was offered in Washington before a gun had been fired, has aroused into action a large party in the United States for peace. In the words of Mr. Long, of Ohio: 'Peace upon the best terms it can be obtained, that would be satisfactory to honourable men, but, in any event, peace, even if it costs the recognition of the separate and sovereign independence of the Confederate States.' That is what peace will cost, and fortunately that is all it will cost, and cheap to the enemy, dirt cheap at that cost. An army of more than two millions of men, and a debt of two thousand millions of dollars, has been the cost of war; but the cost of peace is—the recognition of the Confederate States.

To the war party the cost of the recognition of the Confederate States is very great; it is the loss of power, the loss of money; it is ruin to many of that party. But to the people of the United States our recognition is merely to establish two republics where one once existed; it is to bring into the family of nations another member. There is nothing more dishonourable in our terms, now submitted, than there was in the terms demanded by our forefathers of Great Britain.

THE CONFEDERATE CAUSE IN FRANCE.

FROM A CONFEDERATE CORRESPONDENT.

PARIS: September 13.

DURING the past week the entire Paris press has been absorbed in one general topic—that of the interview of Messrs. Gilmore and Jaques with President Davis. The object of Mr. Gilmore, in publishing in the Atlantic Monthly his somewhat romantic account of this interview, evidently was to prejudice the public mind against the peace movement, by representing Mr. Davis as inflexible on certain questions, and that there was consequently no reasonable hope whatever of coming to terms with the Rebels. With this aim he has interlarded the close arguments of the Confederate President with ideas of an ambiguous nature, and which are calculated greatly to mislead inattentive readers. He has, however, shown himself to be out in his reckoning, for the statements made by him have met with a very limited reception in the United States, and in France they have proved an utter failure. In according to this interview an exaggerated importance, and taking the language of Mr. Davis as it is related by Mr. Gilmore, the French journalists have deduced highly favourable results for the South. One of the Federal organs at Paris, the Nord, has so misapprehended this matter as to state that Mr. Gilmore's account was a Secessionist document in which the Federal representatives were made to play a foolish part in order to leave all the advantage of the discussion to Mr. Davis.

The France, which last week gave an extract from Mr. Gilmore's statement, continued the subject on Wednesday, and two days later devoted a leading article to its consideration. The Pays has published the document in extenso, and it has been subjected to a rigid analysis by the Presse.

The journal of M. de la Gueronnière has been the most correct in its judgment relative to the document in question, in reference to which it remarks as follows:—

> It furnishes additional evidence as to the true sentiments which actuate the Southern populations, the real motive of their resistance, and the ends which they are seeking to obtain through war, being unable to obtain them either by reason or equity from the Government of Washington. It does justice to the pretexts under which the Northerners still seek to justify this fratricidal contest, in placing it before the eyes of public opinion as an immense effort of civilisation and liberty.
> These truths are now as clear as the day. The conduct of the North towards the liberated slaves, torn from their agricultural employments to be sacrificed by thousands on battle-fields, or to perish of misery and of hunger, has exhibited the pretended philanthropy of the Abolitionists in its true colours. The determined resistance made by the South has proved it to be fighting for a far more important object—for its nationality, its country, its homes, for those generous sentiments which alone prompt to noble deeds of devotion and self-sacrifice.
> Reduce the South by force of arms? It is evident that such an idea must henceforth be regarded as a chimera, and that victories, be they ever so brilliant, must prove utterly futile in face of the heroic energy of the Confederates. As to these victories, they have been vainly pursued during four years past, and that at the cost of the most lamentable disasters. The Northern forces have exhausted themselves against the invincible courage of the South, against the skilful strategy of Lee, of Beauregard, and of those intrepid generals by whom the Confederate army is led.
> Peace is in every prayer, peace is in every mouth; and that which gives an important weight to these pacific tendencies is that weakness is seen everywhere: it is seen in the army, which counts its efforts only by its checks; it is seen in the Government, which is now reaching the term of its constitutional existence, and which the parties of the interior menace and discredit; it is seen in the public finances, and in the embarrassment of the Treasury, which lives from hand to mouth, which is not in the receipt of half its enormous daily expenditure, and which finds itself without any resources in the face of arrears which amount to upwards of 1,500 millions.
> If such a situation as this fails to open the eyes of the Northerners, then truth and reason must be abandoned in despair.

The Pays endeavours to show that it is owing to the interview of President Davis with Colonel Jaques that the question of slavery has been altogether set aside from the American dispute, and observes:—

> It is for their independence, for self-government, for their nationality, that the Confederates are fighting, and for which they will cause themselves to be exterminated to the last man.

The Russian organ at Paris, the Nord, is of a different opinion. According to this journal, it is for the maintenance of slavery that the Confederates are fighting, and the overthrow of this institution can only be effected by the re-establishment of the Union. In this article, which betrays considerable ignorance of American affairs, the Nord seems disposed to quarrel with the whole world; it jeers at Colonel Jaques, raps the knuckles of Mr. Davis, and, in a sprightly manner, presumes to lecture the Pays, from which journal it receives a sharp rejoinder, which terminates as follows:—

> We maintain that if the North could succeed in reducing the South, and in making it an American Poland, to the great delight of the Russian journal, both the whites and the blacks, without distinction, would be subjected to a most horrible slavery—to those tortures of which unhappy Poland has, during the last century, furnished an example—to those sufferings which would no doubt greatly rejoice the journal Le Nord, but which would be the shame and the sorrow of humanity. In a word, we should take part in all those distractions which are the inevitable consequence of a nationality's oppression or overthrow.

You know the French proverb: 'None so deaf as those who will not hear'; and the Siècle has just made a happy application of this proverb with reference to this too-much-celebrated interview. Far behind its compeers, the Siècle, in its turn, takes note of Mr. Davis's remarks, and unable to withhold its anathema from the Confederates, it exclaims, in a tone most pathetic, 'After such remarks as these, how can a pacific solution be possibly hoped for?'

The Pays, which does not suffer itself to be embarrassed even by two opponents, and which on the preceding evening had resumed its comments on the eccentricities of the Nord, immediately replies to the Siècle in the following terms:—

Mr. Davis and the four millions and a half of Confederates have no wish to become slaves. They are willing that the negroes should be free, but they also wish to be free themselves; and as they have not the same chance as these happy blacks, who do not fight themselves, but for whom others fight, they have resolved on their own defence, and to allow themselves to be killed, so that they may at least feel themselves free at the hour of death. These are the words of Mr. Davis.

Then says the Siècle: 'How can you hope to obtain anything from those people? Their aim is their national independence, their liberty; they would rather sacrifice their lives than bend their necks beneath a foreign yoke.' The liberal feelings of the Siècle cannot comprehend such ferocity.

In a description of travels in Africa, a brave Jesuit relates that he has seen gorillas, and, in his way, describes them:—

'These animals,' says he, 'are so ferocious, that if you attempt to kill them they immediately defend themselves.'

It is in the school of this good Jesuit that the Siècle has studied politics.

The Presse and the Nation have also had their word to say on this question. The Presse is of opinion that the two Presidents are too absolute, and that there is a just medium to be taken between the two extreme points at which they place themselves. This just medium, according to the Presse, would be union with the ancient Constitution. The Nord has stated that it considered Colonel Jaques had behaved as a schoolboy towards Mr. Davis; the Presse, on the contrary, is disposed to think that the Confederate President found a worthy interlocutor in the Colonel, 'whose language was that of reason, wisdom, and true patriotism.' In the article of M. Chatard several other opinions, equally ridiculous, are given, and which one is surprised to meet with from the pen of so judicious a writer.

The Nation contents itself with publishing the whole of Mr. Gilmore's statement, remarking that it is indebted for much of its importance to the state of feeling prevalent in the Northern States. But in another long and excellent article, bearing the signature of M. Esparbié, one of the new political editors of this journal, the Nation takes a philosophical glance at the situation of the United States, and describes it in the following terms:—

For our part, the result of the present political movement cannot admit of any doubt. Separation was fatally indicated at the very commencement of the war, and the question was thereupon too vigorously and too energetically debated to imagine for a moment that it would not be productive of heroic effort, and, on the part of the South, a resistance as desperate as the attack by the North was determined and resolute.

The Nation then asks on what conditions this great event is to be accomplished, and thinks that these conditions will be equally profitable to the North and to the South. This journal thus concludes:—

The cause of the Union has long since fallen in the estimation of public opinion in Europe, where there is not to be found a single political mind which has not admitted the right of the South to claim its national existence, its independence, and the benefits resulting from its industry.

The Nation, which was in jeopardy some time since, has assumed new life by dint of a combination which has brought it in three or four hundred thousand francs. M. Ernest Rasetti, the talented manager to whom the Opinion Nationale is indebted for a large portion of its success, has organised this combination. M. Léone Dupont still fills the office of editor-in-chief of this journal, MM. Auguste Callet and Esparbié are his coadjutors for the political portion, and MM. Edmond About and Amédée Rolland for that of literature.

The Nation appears to be the organ, or at least one of the organs, of the Tiers Parti, whose leader is M. Emile Ollivier. The Europe of Frankfort and the Presse have already pronounced themselves in favour of this party, towards which the France also seems favourably inclined.

A great change has likewise taken place in the Journal des Débats. This journal has passed into the hands of MM. Péreire and Michel Chevalier. M. Sylvestre de Sacy is still its editor-in-chief, but three of its principal editors, MM. Weiss, Prévost-Paradol, and Alloury have left it. I do not know what these changes are likely to effect in the policy of this journal; but as M. Chevalier is a member of the Senate, and as M. de Sacy will also soon fill the same office, as M. Péreire is deputy of the Right, and the editors hostile to the Empire have retired, it is more than probable that its policy will become more favourable to the Empire. The Orleanist and Liberal opposition in the Débats is still represented by M. de Saint-Marc-Girardin.

I would call the attention of your readers to one of the best articles hitherto written on the American question by M. Aucaigne. This young writer, who is well acquainted with the American character, and who knows the Americans to be the most practical people in the whole world, directs the serious attention of Europe, and especially of France, to the danger which exists of the North and South making the most perfect peace after having made the most determined war; that is to say 'uniting themselves in opposition to European policy.' He shows that if the South obtains the acknowledgment of its independence from the North, it has every interest in offering to the Yankees the hand so full of riches which it has so often, but in vain, offered to imprudent Europe.

M. Aucaigne refers, in support of his views, which he further strengthens with excellent reasons, to an article in THE INDEX, in which it is shown that neither France, nor England, nor Mexico has done anything to counterbalance the natural influence which gives to the North its quality of nearest neighbour. While altogether denying, for appearance sake, that France has anything to apprehend from the political alliance of the Federals and the Confederates, M. Aucaigne plainly manifests his fears in the next paragraph that concludes this excellent article, which would have attracted a much greater share of attention if, instead of appearing in the Progrès, it had been published in the Patrie.

CONFEDERATE CAUSE IN LANCASHIRE.

FROM OUR OWN CORRESPONDENT.

MANCHESTER: September 14, 1864.

AFTER evening mass last Sunday, a large and very impressive gathering of Roman Catholics in this city was held at St. Alban's Chapel, Ancoats, upon which occasion the Rev. Father Gornall introduced to his congregation Mr. T. B. Kershaw, and bespoke for him a patient and thoughtful hearing from all present. The building presented a somewhat novel appearance, and the crowded assembly of Irishmen, with their wives and families, displayed a most marked interest in what was about to take place. Copies of Lord Edward Howard's speech on 'Federal Emigration' were distributed among the congregation, and tables were set in convenient places for signing the 'Peace Address' to the people of the United States.

The Rev. Father Gornall, in opening the proceedings, said a pacific and benevolent movement was now on foot in the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland, having for its object the cessation of hostilities in America; and it was upon that subject that Mr. Kershaw would deliver an address that evening. The American question was one that undoubtedly concerned every person in that assembly. It was not his (the rev. Father's) intention, nor indeed was that the proper occasion, to state what were his predilections, whether for North or South; and still less would it be his business to set forth the reasons why he held such opinions as he did entertain as to the merits of the opposite parties in that unfortunate war. But what he might say, and what every one who heard him might join in saying, was this—'I wish they would give over fighting.' Whether the North was right in attempting to subdue the South, or whether the South was justified in fighting for independence, it was a hard matter that they could not come to some conclusion. The war had unquestionably been the cause of great suffering, and the longer it continued the worse would be the consequences. But the greatest suffering was not confined to those who had any interest in the quarrel.

We are the people (continued the rev. Father), we and our friends, at home and abroad, across the Channel and across the Atlantic, who have had to bear a sad portion of the consequences of this desolating war. There is nothing, therefore, for which we ought to be so anxious as for peace. With regard to slavery—whatever that may have to do with the war—I consider that those persons who talk upon that subject are merely throwing dust in your eyes. There is nothing in the question of slavery that should induce you to side with the North any more than with the South. One is as much for it as the other, and it was only when the North had a purpose to serve against the South that they pretended this was an anti-slavery war. But, however this may be, we cannot be wrong in wishing for peace, for it is time that we at least should be selfish in this matter. Those of us who may henceforth venture to go to America, let us be on our guard lest we are entrapped into this unfortunate struggle. And let us take thought not only for ourselves, but for our friends—for those who are here and those who are there. Letters, I know, are reaching some of you almost daily from near and dear relatives in that distracted country. Well, if all of you who have friends there were to write to them about peace—tell them as often as you write to leave off fighting, and until they do leave off you will attend to no family matters mentioned in their letters—and impress upon them in every way the desire of your hearts upon that fearful subject of strife—you have only, my friends, to make up your minds to do this, and urge upon all others to do the same, and I assure you a great deal will have been effected towards bringing about peace. Let us never forget that we have done a great deal towards keeping up the war, and therefore it becomes us now not to be silent. And while we cry out against the war, let us be careful we no longer do anything to keep it up.

The rev. gentleman concluded his observations amid tokens of the deepest attention and interest.

Mr. T. B. Kershaw then proceeded to address the congregation. After some introductory remarks upon the solemnity of the time, the place, and, he might add, the occasion, he drew a vivid and forcible contrast between the America of four years ago and the America of to-day—America smiling with peace and enriched above other lands with all the bounties of an indulgent Providence, and America scourged and made desolate by a pitiless and most unholy war. Not fewer than 2,000,000 men had either been killed outright within that brief but fearful period, or had been doomed to drag out a maimed and miserable existence, dependent upon others for their daily bread. Let them reflect for one moment who and what those unfortunate victims were. Many of them were born on this side of the Atlantic, were members of affectionate and warm-hearted households, worshipped at familiar altars, and were a constant joy and delight to the mothers who bore them; but they were led to the field of battle, there was a shock of arms, and they have passed away. He agreed with their reverend Father in thinking that this was no occasion for argument or discussion. Whatever were the differences between the parties to this terrible and unchristian strife, the solution of them should never have been referred to the arbitrament of the sword; but having been so referred, and hecatombs of slain having been offered up without avail, it became the duty of all Christian people to implore earnestly that the sword might be returned to the scabbard. The people of Ireland were interested above other people in praying that the carnage might cease. If they could only have looked at the faces of the slaughtered ones, whose features would they have seen in the greatest number? Of what country were those fathers, husbands, sons? Americans? No. It had been calculated on the best authority that not fewer than 300,000 Irishmen had been struck down in the battle-fields of America. Friends and relatives in the home country did not even yet know the extent of their cruel loss. It would only be when the smoke of battle had passed away and the din of the charge was hushed, and the sod was growing greener over the graves—it would be then that many an anxious mother would realise for the first time that her son had perished in a strange land, fighting in a cause from which the Church has withheld its blessing.

Mr. Kershaw's address, which occupied above an hour in the delivery, was listened to with profound attention, and at the conclusion the lecturer was rewarded with a cordial vote of thanks. The Rev. Father Gornall expressed his regret that the Catholics in Manchester had not enjoyed a previous opportunity of hearing Mr. Kershaw, as he believed many of them would, in that case, be now members of his flock instead of having perished on the field of battle. Considerable sensation was created by the reverend gentleman's remarks, and at the close of the proceedings the congregation thronged to the tables to sign the Peace Address.

In Ireland the Peace movement appears to be making wonderful progress. I have it from a trustworthy source that in Dublin alone the people are signing the Address at the rate of from 8,000 to 10,000 a day. In Wicklow also, and throughout the whole of the north and west of Ireland, signatures are pouring in in the same astonishing numbers.

The movement is also spreading throughout the agricultural districts in England. County gentlemen are bestirring themselves to assist the clergy in the circulation of the Address, and obtaining signatures. The head of the Wiltshire family of the Lees, in volunteering his best service in that county, writes as follows:—

I not only sympathise with the South, and think it a stigma on the Administration of this country that, amidst all the vapouring of Earl Russell and threats against weaker Powers, they should have evaded their duty to their country by abstaining from interference to a just and lawful extent: but I also feel for the South on higher grounds, those of justice and humanity; and indeed I am proud of the valour and determination, in spite of all sufferings, of my relative, General Lee, and his family, whose name may be found in my family pedigree (which is one of the most ancient in England), the descent being traced from father to son from almost the time of the Conquest, and showing the emigration of that branch of which the noble American general is the illustrious representative and head.

Local organisations in favour of the Confederate cause are still springing up in towns far and near. The following straightforward and pithy little 'manifesto' is one of the best I have recently seen:—

We, the undersigned inhabitants of Burslem, being of opinion that the period has now arrived when the independence of the Confederate States of America ought to be recognised, agree to form ourselves into an Association to promote such object.

We take this view from the fact of the Southern States having successfully combated the vastly superior wealth and forces of the Northern States for upwards of three years; from an able, popular, and vigorous Government having been established; and from the impossibility of a spirited Anglo-Saxon united race of people, numbering upwards of 4,000,000 souls, and possessing very many thousands square miles of territory, ever being permanently conquered and subdued.

I need scarcely observe that the recent news by the Asia and Peruvian, in so far as it reads unfavourably to the Confederates, is utterly discredited in Manchester. In the manipulation of dates and facts, and in what is stated and not stated—to say nothing of the colouring—we recognise the work of the familiar hand. We shall see in a day or two how it bears a touch from the disenchanting spear.

THE PROSPECTS OF PEACE.—One of the bloodiest battles of the Peninsular War was fought after peace had been concluded, and it seems as if the great American struggle would be crowned with a similar superfluity of carnage. While the most powerful party in the North was proclaiming aloud its abomination of the war and its resolute demand for peace, the Northern armies in Virginia and Georgia were engaged in the most obstinate and sanguinary conflicts. In Virginia the advantage remained with the Confederates, who had been the assailants; in Georgia the Federals, if the occupation of Atlanta is truly reported, may claim the credit of the day. But, though Atlanta may at last have been occupied, the covering army has not been routed, and a successful combination of Confederate forces threatens Sherman with serious embarrassment. At Mobile Admiral Farragut is displaying that tenacity of purpose which has characterised the Federal tactics throughout the present campaign, and, if his progress be slow, he exhibits at least no signs of discouragement. But in the meanwhile a voice has gone forth which may still the thunder of the cannon. The Chicago Convention has not only declared the principles on which the great Democratic party is prepared to act, but has demanded, in the name of the people, that negotiations shall be immediately instituted for the suspension of arms. An armistice at once, a conference as soon as possible—these are the cries now resounding through the States of the North; and unless they can be disregarded—which is not easy to suppose—we may relieve ourselves from the trouble of further speculations on the events of the war. We trust the public will admit that they have not been misguided by our comments on this obstinate contest. The great fact which we asserted from the first is now placed beyond reach of controversy. We said that the North could never subdue the South, and the North has now proclaimed the same conclusion. After three years of the most desperate efforts, in which no expenditure has been spared and no tactics have been left untried, a preponderating section of the Northern people have put on record before the world their deliberate conviction that the policy of war is mistaken and hopeless, and that it must be superseded by a policy of conciliation and compromise. This is the declaration made by a party presumed to be unquestionably the strongest in the State, and the expression of the principle has been entrusted, not to a successful or triumphant soldier, but to a General who was the first to discover the impracticability of the object on which his countrymen were bent. No one knows better than M'Clellan the barriers which separate Washington from Richmond, and the frightful losses which have been incurred without results by his successors in command have established beyond question the justice of his views. As if to stamp with still deeper censure the policy of the Government, Governor Seymour, of New York, the man of greatest mark among the opponents of Mr. Lincoln, was elected by acclamation to the presidency of the Convention by which these decisive steps were taken.—The Times, Sept. 14.

The whole of the Spanish Ministry resigned on Monday last. The Queen has accepted their resignation, and has deputed Senor Mon to reconstitute the Cabinet. Senor Pacheco will remain Minister of Foreign Affairs.

AFFAIRS FINANCIAL AND COMMERCIAL.

WEDNESDAY EVENING.

MONEY AND DISCOUNT MARKET.

THE state of the money market is, to say the least, very doubtful, in consequence of the fluctuating condition of the foreign exchanges and the prospect of the Indian rates being unfavourable. It was supposed that the late advance in the Bank rate would have stopped the evil effect of the drain, but it is now said the minimum may be at any moment increased to 10 per cent. The apprehension appears to be that the circulation of the bills drawn by the credit and finance companies may create mischief, and as these are very wide spread it is not improbable a severe reaction will take place before long. With the currency laws in their present position, the Bank is likely to lose command over bullion and reserve, and as this is the case, we must wait patiently for amendment. The state of the accounts will for the next few weeks be watched with great impatience, and should the symptoms be discouraging the directors, it is said, will not wait an instant, but forthwith pursue restrictive measures. The bankers and bill brokers have recently been working quite up to the official Bank minimum of 9 per cent., but yesterday prospects were so satisfactory that the terms for 6 months' remittance bills were quoted $8\frac{1}{2}$ to 9 per cent. showing the effect of the slightest symptom of ease. The rate for the very shortest choice paper is not lower than 9 per cent., and it would very soon further advance, if the foreign exchanges were to become adverse, or the money markets on the continent were to approach a general state of stringency. The large discount establishments being well supplied with capital, any balances they are glad to let out from day to day on the Stock Exchange, and, therefore the value of money on Government securities rules at moderate quotations. Though the settlements have latterly been in progress, they have made little difference.

BULLION AND SPECIE MOVEMENTS.

There is not any material change in the state of the bullion market, with the exception that the amount of gold sent into the Bank has fallen off this week, and there having been a withdrawal of 75,000 sovereigns for transmission to the Brazils. The amount taken by the Bank has been only 56,000*l*. The arrivals of specie, however, have been good, the total amounting to 644,829*l*., of which 436,535*l*. was from the West Indies and Pacific, 112,612*l*. from Melbourne, 88,600*l*. from New York, 2,704*l*. from the West Coast, and 88,600*l*. from Vera Cruz. The Magdalena, for the Brazils, has taken out specie to the value of 83,200*l*., of which 75,200*l*. was in gold and 8,000*l*. in silver. The shipments to the East by the Ripon steamer are about 297,850*l*., of which 36,650*l*. is in gold and 261,300*l*. in silver. The market for silver has become rather heavy, and the rates for bar are about $61\frac{3}{8}$d., and the tendency being towards a further decline. There has been very little done in Mexican dollars, and the price remains at about $60\frac{3}{4}$d. per oz.

HOME AND FOREIGN SECURITIES.

There has not been an extensive business transacted in the English stock market during the week, but prices have again fluctuated considerably, though there has been a rally from the lowest point touched. To-day there has been increased heaviness, caused by the promulgation of various rumours, and the belief entertained in some quarters that the bank will be under the necessity of again advancing the minimum rate of discount to-morrow. Consols closed at $87\frac{3}{4}$ to $87\frac{7}{8}$ for money, and $88\frac{1}{8}$ to $88\frac{1}{4}$ for the account, which is declined as compared with the quotations of this day week of $\frac{3}{8}$ per cent. Exchange bills still continue heavy, the June issue being 25*s*. to 15*s*. dis., and those of June 15*s*. to 5*s*. dis. The business in the foreign stock market has been of about an average character, but with the exception of a few of the more speculative descriptions, prices have not greatly varied, though the tendency is towards a further decline. The chief alterations have been a fall of $\frac{3}{8}$ per cent. in Mexican; a rise of $\frac{1}{4}$ in Spanish passives; and of $\frac{5}{8}$ in the certificates. The closing quotations this evening were, Greek, $24\frac{1}{4}$ to $24\frac{1}{2}$; Mexican, $27\frac{1}{2}$ to $27\frac{3}{4}$; Spanish passives, 32 to $32\frac{1}{2}$; ditto certificates, 14 to $14\frac{1}{2}$; Turkish Six per cents. of 1854, 90 to 91; and those of 1862, $70\frac{1}{4}$ to $70\frac{3}{4}$.

AMERICAN SECURITIES.

The market for American Government and Railway securities has again been more active this week, in consequence of the reported increased prospects of peace between the Northern and Southern States. In the early part of the week prices had an advancing tendency, but there has since been a decline in almost all descriptions. The dealings recorded have been in United States, of 1874, at $43\frac{1}{2}$; Virginian State 6 per cents., at 31, 32, $32\frac{1}{2}$, 33, and 32; Atlantic and Great Western Railway, New York section, 1st mortgage, at 72; do. do., 2nd mortgage, at 68; do. do., Pennsylvania section, at 73; Erie shares $100 all paid, at 45, $44\frac{1}{2}$, and 43; Illinois Central, $100 shares, $90 paid, at 42, $42\frac{3}{4}$, and 43 dis.; and do. do., all paid, at 53, $53\frac{1}{2}$, $52\frac{1}{2}$, 52, 53, $53\frac{3}{4}$, $53\frac{1}{2}$, 54, 53, $52\frac{1}{2}$, $53\frac{1}{4}$, $52\frac{1}{4}$, and $52\frac{3}{4}$.

CONFEDERATE COTTON LOAN.

This stock has been remarkably firm during the past week, and, under the influence of continuous purchases, advanced on Saturday to 85. Subsequent accounts from the States reporting the capture of Atlanta caused a partial relapse, but the market closes firm at 83 to 84.

We are able to state positively that the project of a new loan, based on cotton, to be offered to the Confederate States, as suggested in certain advertisements which have recently appeared, is started without the knowledge or countenance of the Confederate Government. Several projects of new loans have at different times been submitted, and the Congress has invariably declined to entertain them. It is extremely improbable that this policy will be changed during the continuance of the war.

A correspondent of the Daily News, in a letter on the Confederate Cotton Bonds, which contains much furious invective and some absurdly erroneous statements—among others the exploded falsehood that Mr. Jefferson Davis is the author of the Mississippi Repudiation—refers to a supposed secret emission of such bonds. Our readers need scarcely be informed that there is not even the shadow of a foundation for this insinuation, and that it bears its own refutation on its face. The only cotton obligations, not comprised in the Erlanger Loan, which have been at any time afloat, were some to a very limited extent issued by purchasing agents of the Government in payment of goods. Most, if not all of these, have long since been redeemed or withdrawn. It was to them that Mr. McRae referred in the letter quoted by the Daily News correspondent.

RAILWAY SECURITIES.

The market for the English railway securities has not been particularly active, and, within the last day or two, business has been materially curtailed in consequence of the preparations for the half-monthly settlement. Prices have been gradually declining, but they close to-day at a slight improvement from the lowest quotations of the week. With the exception of Scottish Central, which from special circumstances shows an advance of nearly 5 per cent., the decline is pretty general. There has been a fall of 2 per cent., in Glasgow and South-Western, and Great Northern; of $1\frac{1}{4}$ per cent. in Metropolitan and South-Eastern; of 1 per cent. in Caledonian, Dublin and Belfast Junction, Midland, London and South-Western, and North Bristol; of $\frac{1}{2}$ per cent. in London and North-Western; and of $\frac{1}{2}$ per cent. in Great Eastern, Lancashire, and Yorkshire, Manchester, Sheffield, and Lincolnshire, and North-Eastern (Berwick). In foreign and colonial railway shares, business has been dull; but prices, although very weak, do not present any material variation.

MERCANTILE SUSPENSIONS.

The suspension has been announced of Messrs. Croskey & Co., of St. Michael's House, Cornhill, railway contractors. Their liabilities are estimated at from 90,000*l*. to 100,000*l*. They have large works on hand connected with South America, and upon the satisfactory management of these, the prospects of assets are said to depend.—The failure of Messrs. Manual and Brillman, diamond merchants and jewellers, is announced. The liabilities are put down at 40,000*l*. to 50,000*l*., arising chiefly from bill transactions, they having been largely connected with Messrs. Croskey & Co.—The suspension is likewise announced of Messrs. Lewine and Morris, who are also said to have been engaged with Messrs. Croskey; they traded as American agents and shippers. The debts are reported to be about 40,000*l*. The books have been placed in the hands of Messrs. Harding, Pullin, & Co.—Mr. James Marks, of Birmingham, merchant, has also stopped payment. The liabilities are 22,271*l*., and the assets are estimated at 22,265*l*., being chiefly due for goods shipped to Melbourne. A meeting of the creditors has been held, and has been adjourned to enable Mr. Marks to obtain security for a composition of 10*s*. in the pound. In the event of his failing to do this, a deed of assignment is to be executed.

MEETINGS OF PUBLIC COMPANIES, &c.

At a meeting of the shareholders of the Imperial Bank of China, India, and Japan, the resolutions passed at a previous meeting, accepting the terms proposed for amalgamating with the Bank of Hindustan, China, and Japan, were agreed to. The affairs of the Bank are to be wound up voluntarily.—At a meeting of the shareholders of the Bank of Hindustan, China, and Japan, the resolutions passed at their previous meeting, authorising the amalgamation with the Imperial Bank of China, India, and Japan, were confirmed, and also another for increasing the capital of the bank to 2,000,000*l*. Four directors of the Imperial Bank of China, India, and Japan, are to be added to the direction of the Bank of Hindustan, China, and Japan.—At an extraordinary general meeting of the proprietors of the Alliance National Land, Building, and Investment Company, it was resolved that the resolutions of a previous meeting, altering the name to the Estates Bank, be confirmed, and that the qualification of each director be increased to 100 shares.—It has been announced by the directors of the Upper Assam Tea Company that a dividend of 20 per cent. has been declared payable on and after to-day, making, with the ad interim dividend of 10 per cent. paid in June last, a total of 30 per cent. on the year's operations ending September 30 last.—The report of the Bank of British Columbia has been issued preparatory to the meeting on the 26th inst. It appears that, after paying all current expenses, the amount of undivided profit at the end of the half-year on June 30 was 11,105*l*. Out of this sum the directors propose to appropriate 5,000*l*. to the payment of a dividend at the rate of 8 per cent. per annum, free of income-tax; to add 4,000 to the reserve fund, which will thereby be increased to 6,000*l*.; and to carry forward 2,105*l*. The directors announce that the supplemental charter which they have obtained authorises them to establish branches at other places in the west of North America, besides British Columbia and Vancouver Island, and to defer calling up the remainder of the capital until such time as they may think it desirable to do so.

PROGRESS OF ENTERPRISE.

The prospectus has just been issued of the United Kingdom Steam Boiler Insurance Company, the object being to provide against the risk and damage to property caused by the explosion of steam boilers. The capital sought to be raised is 100,000*l*., in 20,000 of 5*l*. each.

THE COURSE OF THE PRODUCE MARKETS.

Business in these departments continues dull in consequence of the high rates of discount; and although supplies, as a rule, are not brought heavily to sale, prices are generally weaker, when they are not absolutely depressed. The corn trade has manifested renewed heaviness, and at 1*s*. per quarter decline for wheat only limited parcels have been placed. New American red winter is quoted 40*s*. to 42*s*. The demand for oilcake is less active, the weather having been more favourable for vegetation; but in prices there is very little variation, American being still 10*l*. 5*s*. to 11*l*. 10*s*. per ton, according to quality. Rather a heavy fall has taken place in some kinds of provisions without leading to a clearance of stocks. Foreign butters are fully 4*s*. lower for best and 8*s*. for inferior. Americans are perhaps the steadiest at 90*s*. to 108*s*. per cwt. Irish bacon has declined 2*s*. and 3*s*., and Hamburg 4*s*. per cwt. For American there is a limited enquiry at 45*s*. to 50*s*. per cwt. Bacon middles are neglected. Lard is relatively firm in price, with a fair enquiry. Hams meet very little demand, there being but few fine offering. The sugar trade has been nearly at a stand-still, but to-day there was a movement in floating cargoes, several of which changed hands. The terms are kept secret, but are lower. Coffee meets a better market than most other articles, and at about 6*d*. to 1*s*. decline liberal supplies have again been cleared off. In China teas there is no material variation; but an indifferent assortment of India growth sold at 1*d*. to 2*d*. deduction from previous auctions. Rice, saltpetre, and spices have not engaged attention. New fruits are arriving more freely. Valencia raisins sell at 37*s*. per cwt. Petroleum has been sold to some extent at 2*s*. per gallon cash for American refined crude is quoted 17*l*. to 18*l*. per tun. Seed oils are mostly purchaseable on easier terms, linseed offering at 34*s*. 9*d*. per cwt., pale rape at 46*s*. and brown at 42*s*. per cwt. The prospects of diminished supplies of tallow from the late protracted drought continue to have effect in this market, which is increasingly firm, especially for distant periods of delivery. This evening 42*s*. was the price of Y.C. on the spot, 43*s*. last three months, 44*s*. 6*d*. spring, and 45*s*. March. In drugs and drysaltery articles there has been scarcely sufficient doing to establish quotations. Dyestuffs are dull of sale, in common with most other articles, and cochineal to-day gave way 1*d*. per lb. Hemp moves off slowly at about 31*l*. to 32*l*. for roping Manilla. Jute is further reduced 30*s*. per ton, bringing quotations for common to fine marks down to 11*l*. to 27*l*. 10*s*. per ton. The cotton markets continue depressed, from causes noticed in previous reports. The metal trade is inactive, and quotations are little better than nominal. Scotch pig iron, 58*s*. $4\frac{1}{2}$d.; spelter, 24*l*. 10*s*.; lead, 20*l*. to 22*l*. 10*s*.; Banca tin, 101*l*. cash; Straits, 100*l*.; best selected copper, 97*l*. to 100*l*. per ton.

LIVERPOOL, Wednesday, September 14.—Our cotton market has again become exceedingly inanimate, in consequence of the peace rumours from America, and which are now received with more credence. The transactions have, during the week, been unusually limited, and for most descriptions prices have receded about 1*d*. to 2*d*. per lb., and the market exhibits a further downward tendency. The sales this week have been only 22,000 bales, of which 9,500 were taken on speculation and for export. The total sales this year have been 1,887,310 bales, against 1,691,904 bales to the corresponding period in 1863. There have been imported this year 1,617,238 bales, and to the same period last year 1,058,217 bales. The trade have taken this year 1,168,726 bales, and to the same time in 1863 923,318 bales. The exports this year have been 389,407 bales; last year they were 317,727 bales. There have been taken on speculation this year 318,506 bales, and in 1863 412,484 bales. The estimated stocks at the present time are 346,812 bales, and at the same period last year they were 207,316 bales. The closing quotations this afternoon were, for American descriptions, 27*d*. to $27\frac{3}{4}$d.; Pernambuco, 27*d*. to $28\frac{3}{4}$d.; Maceio, $27\frac{1}{4}$d. to $27\frac{1}{2}$d.; Bahia, 27*d*. to $27\frac{1}{4}$d.; Egyptian, $16\frac{1}{2}$d. to 31*d*.; Smyrna, $17\frac{1}{2}$d. to $22\frac{3}{4}$d.; Surats, 12*d*. to $21\frac{1}{2}$d.; Madras, $13\frac{1}{4}$d.; Bengal, $14\frac{1}{4}$d. to $14\frac{1}{2}$d.; Scinde, 14*d*. to $14\frac{1}{4}$d.; China, 16*d*. to 17*d*.; and Japan, 19*d*. to $19\frac{1}{2}$d.

The markets at Manchester have exhibited even less animation than they did last week, and business has been more restricted than it probably otherwise would have been, in consequence of buyers offering such terms as were not likely to be accepted. Nearly all the purchasers are holding off in anticipation of a speedy drop in values. In shipping yarns there has been nothing whatever doing; some offers have been made which spinners refuse to accept. Home trade yarns are also quite as unsaleable and from the same causes, and in the present depression in the cloth market, manufacturers appear less and less disposed to buy yarns to go on making. Prices are now weaker than they were last week, and the great desire to close mills under the circumstances appears to be fast gaining ground. In the cloth market there is no improvement, and there appears a more determined feeling on the part of merchants to abstain from operations, the high price of money also acting as a powerful deterrent. The few offers that have been made have been at very low rates, and have only led to business in cases where stocks are heavy and sellers pressing to realise. As a rule, however, there is less pressure to sell than might have been anticipated, as manufacturers seem to entertain some hopes of the market partially, if not wholly, recovering firmness through the prospective decrease in production. Annexed are latest quotations:—$\frac{7}{8}$ Grey Printers, according to quality, 8*s*. 6*d*. to 16*s*. 6*d*.; $\frac{9}{8}$ Grey Madapollams, 7*s*. $7\frac{1}{2}$d. to 10*s*. $1\frac{1}{2}$d.; $\frac{9}{8}$ Grey Printers, 11*s*. $7\frac{1}{2}$d. to 18*s*.; $\frac{5}{4}$ Grey Shirtings, 12*s*. 9*d*. to 27*s*.; Water Twist, No. 20, 2*s*. 2*d*. to 2*s*. $9\frac{1}{2}$d.; No. 30, 2*s*. 7*d*. to 3*s*. 1*d*.; No. 40, 3*s*. to 3*s*. 6*d*.; Mule Twist, No. 20, 1*s*. 10*d*. to 2*s*. 8*d*.; No. 30. 2*s*. 3*d*. to 2*s*. 10*d*.; No. 40, 2*s*. $5\frac{1}{2}$d. to 3*s*. 3*d*.; No. 50, 2*s*. 10*d*. to 3*s*. 5*d*.; No. 60, 2*s*. 11*d*. to 3*s*. 7*d*.; No. 70, 3*s*. 1*d*. to 3*s*. 9*d*.; No. 80, 3*s*. 5*d*. to 3*s*. 11*d*.; No. 90, 3*s*. 7*d*. to 4*s*. 1*d*.; and No. 100, 3*s*. 10*d*. to 4*s*. 8*d*.

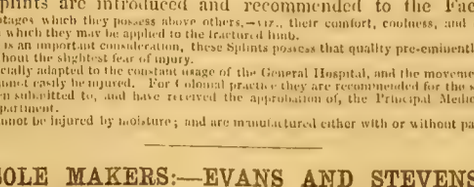
DUNCAN'S PATENT RATAN CANE SPLINTS.



THESE Splints are introduced and recommended to the Faculty for the great advantages which they possess above others,—viz., their comfort, coolness, and durability, as well as the facility with which they may be applied to the fractured limb.
As cleanliness is an important consideration, these Splints possess that quality pre-eminently, as they may be readily washed without the slightest fear of injury.
They are especially adapted to the constant usage of the General Hospital, and the movements of an Army on Service, as they cannot easily be injured. For Colonial practice they are recommended for the same reason.
They have been submitted to, and have received the approbation of, the Principal Medical Officers of the Army Medical Department.
The Splints cannot be injured by moisture; and are manufactured either with or without pads.

REGULATIONS TO CARRY INTO EFFECT THE ACT TO IMPOSE REGULATIONS UPON THE FOREIGN COMMERCE OF THE CONFEDERATE STATES, TO PROVIDE FOR THE PUBLIC DEFENCE, APPROVED 1 FEBRUARY 6, 1864.

I.—AS TO THE SEA.

1. The owners of any vessel intending to sail from a Confederate port with a cargo consisting in whole or in part of cotton, tobacco, military and naval stores, sugar, molasses, or rice, shall, before the lading on board of any such articles, file with the collector of the port from which the vessel is to sail a copy of her register, with a declaration of the names of the owners and officers thereof, the place of their birth, and of their residence for the preceding year, together with the port or place to which the said vessel proposes to sail. The said declaration shall also set forth the quantity and value, in Confederate currency, of the cargo proposed to be taken out, as also the consent of the said owners that one-half of the tonnage of the said vessel may be employed by the Confederate Government for its own use, both on the outward and homeward voyage, at the rate of freight hereinafter mentioned. The collector shall submit a statement as to the owners and officers to the military commandant of the port; and if he shall not object to their loyalty, or to the sailing vessel, for reasons of military necessity, the collector shall grant a permit for the lading of said vessel, one-half for account of the owners, and one-half for account of the Confederate States.

2. Before the said lading shall be completed, the owners of the vessel shall execute to the Confederate States a bond in one-half the value of the vessel, with security deemed adequate by the collector, conditioned that she will pursue the voyage designated, and that she will return with reasonable despatch to a Confederate port, after her outward cargo shall be discharged, with a cargo consisting one-half of articles not prohibited by the laws of the Confederate Government, and the other half of such articles as the Government shall offer for shipment from such port, at the rate of freight hereinafter mentioned.

3. Each shipper of any portion of the cargo proposed to be laden on board the said vessel shall, before the lading thereof, make application to the collector for a permit to lade the same; which application shall declare the articles to be shipped, and the quantity and value thereof in Confederate currency, the port of destination, and the name of the consignee. A permit shall then be granted by the collector, if the application is deemed satisfactory. The lading shall be had under the inspection of a revenue officer, who shall be charged with the duty of seeing that the goods laden conform to the permit.

4. Before the completion of the lading on board, or the granting a clearance, each shipper of any portion of the cargo shall execute and deliver to the collector a bond to the Confederate States, in one-half the value of his shipment in Confederate money, with security deemed adequate by the collector, with condition that at least one-half the net proceeds of said shipment shall be invested in goods or articles not prohibited by law; and said goods or articles shall be shipped by the same or some other vessel to the Confederate States within sixty days from the unlading of said cargo.

5. The freight to be paid by the Confederate States on all cotton and tobacco shipped from a Confederate port shall be fivepence sterling per pound, payable on delivery at the port of destination, in coin or sterling exchange. Return freight shall be at the rate of 20*l.* per ton, payable on its delivery in a Confederate port, in cotton, at twelvepence sterling per pound for middling uplands, and at a proportionate price for cotton of other qualities; or, at the option of the Government, in specie or sterling exchange. In calculating the ton of freight by weight, 2,240 pounds shall be allowed; by measure, forty cubic feet shall be allowed.

6. The rates of freight for articles other than cotton and tobacco shall be adjusted at the same relative rate, and payable in the same way.

7. The Government reserves the right to limit or prohibit the shipment of rosin, turpentine, or any manufacture thereof, whenever deemed dangerous to its own shipment.

8. Upon the completion of the lading of the vessel, and before receiving her clearance, there shall be delivered to the collector, in addition to the usual manifest, another, setting forth the names, ages, and description of the officers and crew, and of every passenger intending to sail in her. The said last-mentioned manifest shall be delivered to the commandant of the port, who shall thereupon cause the entire vessel to be searched; and if satisfied that the parties on board are persons who may safely be permitted to leave the Confederacy, and that the passengers have the proper passports, he shall certify the same on the manifest, and return the same to the collector; whereupon, and not before, a clearance shall be granted to the vessel, and she shall be permitted to sail.

9. The owners of each vessel, and of each portion of a cargo, sailing from a Confederate port, shall be allowed to take up their respective bonds by producing to the collector the certificate of the proper agent of the Confederate Government at the port of delivery, setting forth the particulars, showing that the said party has complied with the obligation of the said bonds so far as the same was practicable; and the collector, upon being duly satisfied, shall be authorised to surrender the said bonds.

10. Nothing in these regulations shall be so construed as to conflict with the proviso of the law which declares 'that nothing in this Act shall be construed to prohibit the Confederate States, or any of them, from exporting any of the articles herein enumerated on their own account,' nor shall a bond be required of a State in any case.

11. The penalties of all bonds executed in conformity with these regulations shall be recoverable in full, on proof of breach of the conditions of the bond, and without proof of any damage suffered by the Confederate States in consequence of such breach; and all bonds shall be executed in such form as to give effect to this regulation.

12. Vessels sent into the Confederacy for the purpose of exporting cotton received in payment of any Confederate bond or obligation, shall be subject to these regulations only so far as relates to such portion of the tonnage, if any, as may remain vacant after the lading of the cotton received in payment as aforesaid.

13. Whenever any vessel shall bring into the Confederate States an entire cargo for account of the Confederate States, the owners of the said vessel and the shippers of her cargo shall be relieved from the bonds previously given to invest and bring in one half of the net proceeds of her outward cargo; and the certificate of the agent of the Treasury Department, at the port of lading, that such cargo was duly shipped in pursuance of the regulations, shall authorise the collector to cancel and surrender the said bonds.

G. A. TRENHOLM, Secretary of the Treasury.
J. A. SEDDON, Secretary of War.

Can England do without American Cotton?

WHILST different commercial men are discussing the probable effects on the cotton market, should the American war be brought to an early close, let us look at the cotton question from another point of view, and consider whether, in the event of the war being continued for another four years, England could do without a supply of American cotton.

We raise this question because we have heard it often said that, if the American war was to continue for a few years longer, England would become entirely independent of the Southern States for cotton.

This idea is founded on the progress made by certain countries in cotton cultivation, stimulated by the enormously high prices which have prevailed since 1861.

To look on the cotton question aright, it is necessary first to understand what is England's demand for cotton. We cannot do better than refer to the consumption of 1860, the last year of unbroken trade. The following figures will best illustrate our idea:—

		Bales.
Estimated stock of cotton on January 1, 1860			469,520
Cotton imports in 1860.—American		2,438,236
" "	Brazilian	99,067
" "	West Indian	1,758
" "	East "	550,663
" "	Egyptian, &c.	113,963	3,203,687
			3,673,207
Cotton exports in 1860.—American		190,912
" "	Brazilian	50
" "	East Indian	289,238
" "	Other kinds	803	481,003
			3,192,204
Estimated stock of cotton, December 29, 1860			594,510
Taken for home consumption			2,597,694
Average weight per bale			424
Pounds weight of cotton consumed			1,101,422,256

With these practical data before us, let us consider the question at issue.

The extraordinary prosperity of the cotton trade in 1860 induced a large extension of cotton machinery in 1860, amounting to no less than 10 per cent. during the past four years.

If, then, we take into consideration the new mills and machinery, which as yet have exercised no influence on the cotton market because of their inactivity through the limited supply of cotton, at 10 per cent., it is clear that Great Britain has a practical demand for no less than 1,200,000,000 lbs. of raw cotton, of a quality and fineness equal to American. As Great Britain in 1860 exactly possessed one-half the known cotton trade, and as the relationship has not been disturbed since, we may put down the wants of the mechanical cotton trade at 2,400,000,000 lbs. of cotton, namely:—

	lbs.
Great Britain	1,200,000,000
Continental Europe	780,000,000
United States	420,000,000
	2,400,000,000

Such is a fair estimate of the present demand for cotton. But to return to Great Britain. If we take up the Board of Trade Returns, and refer to the sources from which she derived her imports of cotton, we find them entered thus:—

	cwts.		lbs.
United States	9,903,309	or	1,115,890,608
Brazil	154,317	"	17,286,864
Egypt and Mediterranean	392,117	"	43,951,061
East Indies	1,822,689	"	201,111,168
West Indies	86,204	"	9,666,048
Sundries	9,382	"	1,050,781
	12,428,478	"	1,391,989,536
Exported	2,235,970	"	250,428,640
Home Use	10,182,508	"	1,141,560,896

The reader will at once perceive how closely the brokers' trade reports and Board of Trade Returns agree for 1860. Both make the consumption of cotton in Great Britain about 1,100,000,000 lbs. Now, if there be any use in discussing the cotton question at all, we conclude it must be on the presumption of not only a return to the condition of 1860, but also that its future progress shall correspond with the past. England has in the East a market of illimitable extent, whose customers may be estimated at 600,000,000, or half the entire population of the world, every one of whom is a consumer of cotton goods. The cotton trade with her, therefore, is but in its infancy. Either she must prosecute the cotton trade with vigour, or it will elude her grasp and pass into the hands of a rival, into whose lap will flow those untold treasures which heretofore have so materially contributed to the wealth and political position of Great Britain. Betwixt 1850 and 1860 England practically doubled her cotton trade, so that it would be no exaggeration to affirm that if in the future she does not progress at the rate of 5 per cent. per annum, the cotton trade will pass into other hands. On this matter we would seriously warn all Englishmen who care to see their country and their commerce flourish. The American war will end some time, and industry and trade again be set free; and it is for peace and not for war that trade estimates should be laid. If, then, we assume the future progress of the English cotton trade to be at the rate of 5 per cent. per annum, we may put her demands thus:—

		lbs.
1865.	English demand for cotton	1,200,000,000
1866.	Five per cent. increase	1,260,000,000
1867.	" "	1,323,000,000
1868.	" "	1,389,150,000
1869.	" "	1,458,607,500
1870.	" "	1,531,537,875

We have only looked forward a few years, and yet we can see a demand for cotton which at first sight seems incredible inasmuch as the quantity equals 3,828,844 bales of 400 lbs. each. The question which comes before us is, Can England obtain such a quantity of cotton without the assistance of the Southern States?

Three years of experience enable us to form an opinion. Under the stimulus of high prices, such as have not been seen for the last fifty years, extraordinary efforts have been made to raise cotton. We have now passed through two-thirds of the year, and the receipts of cotton have been betwixt January and September 17:

East India	937,962	at	380	356,325,560
Egyptian	209,735	"	400	83,794,000
China, &c.	313,632	"	120	37,635,840
Turkey	47,981	"	120	5,757,720
South America	197,104	"	180	35,478,720
United States	143,532	"	450	64,589,850
Italy	2,913	"	100	291,300
	1,886,145			590,530,190

Taking away the imports from the United States, there have been from all other sources 525,940,340 lbs. of raw cotton imported into England during the past thirty-seven weeks, or in the ratio of 739,159,400 lbs. for the entire year. Taking the exports at 200,000,000 lbs., there will remain for home use 539,159,400 lbs., exclusive of American cotton. It is, therefore, clear that as yet the supply is not equal to one-half the demand. We have already seen that in 1860 the supply of cotton from all other sources, except the United States, amounted to 276,098,928 lbs., so that the increase has been equal to 263,060,472 lbs., or, in other words, the supply of cotton other than from the Southern States has been doubled since the commencement of the American war. We confess that we do not share the astonishment of those who regard the result as marvellous, for it must be remembered that India has been so denuded of cotton that the domestic manufacture of cotton cloths has been broken up, and the Hindoo spinners and weavers set to work upon the railways in order that the cotton might be forwarded to England. Even the beds, pillows, saddles, and other articles stuffed with cotton have been emptied, that the raw material might be forwarded, and thus large quantities were suddenly made available for exportation. But these shifts cannot be repeated. As India formerly exported cotton to China, it is difficult to conceive that our imports thence are tempted by anything else than high prices.

The same remarks apply to Turkey and Italy. How far they would continue to send us cotton if former prices prevailed, time alone can show; but as Levantine and West Indian cottons went down in the face of American cottons, this would happen again if there were a return to the prices of 1860 and such must be the case if an adequate supply of cotton be obtained. But as yet we have only obtained enough of cotton to keep half the cotton trade at work. The supply must therefore be doubled, and when doubled it will only suffice for existing machinery; the future will remain unconsidered.

It is computed that 2,500,000 bales will come forward in 1865. Accepting such statement to be true, and the exports to be 500,000, there will remain for home use 2,000,000 bales of about 300 lbs. each on the average, or say 600,000,000 lbs. of cotton, or exactly one-half the required amount. Not until the supply mounts up to 4,500,000 bales of the present size and quality of cotton will prices return to the figure of 1860, and our cotton machinery be fully employed.

Should the supply be extended at the rate of 500,000 bales per annum, it will take four years more to attain the necessary amount of cotton which the British cotton trade demands, should the exports rise no higher than at present. Whether a yearly increase of 500,000 bales can be maintained is a doubtful matter. But we will assume that it can be done, though at a rate of cost and suffering which only English pockets and feelings will tolerate.

It is quite reasonable to conclude that the American war will be over long before Great Britain has secured 4,500,000 bales of cotton from present sources. Should it, however, last four years longer, England may have enough of a certain kind of cotton; but as the Southern States will again cultivate cotton, and as their produce will be offered to the world for use, if England were to repudiate Southern cotton, it would pass at once into the hands of the Germans and the Americans of the Northern States. With machinery equal to that of Great Britain, and a superior raw material, time would soon show that fabrics made from American cotton could push out of the market those made from Indian cottons. The result would simply accord with the sound principles of political economy. When, therefore, English cotton-spinners talk of doing without American cotton, let them remember it can only be done when an article as good and as cheap can be obtained.

Whatever country uses American cotton will carry away the cotton trade, and open to its shores the rich treasures and commerce of the East. For this privilege the Northern States have sighed and striven, and their impression in 1860 was that, within twenty-five years, they would have so progressed in the cotton manufacture as to require the whole of the cotton grown by the Southern States, that the commerce of the world would centre in the waters of New York and Boston. Thus it was the intention of the North to carry away the cotton manufacture through the superiority of American cotton, the very commodity which England hopes and tries to do without. Whatever may be said of Indian cotton, one thing is remarkable, that the Hindoo merchant prefers the cotton cloth made from American cotton, and refuses that which is made from Surat. The inference, then, may be drawn that whenever American cotton is again in the market, the fabrics made therefrom will supersede all others, and that, if England should persist in the rejection of Southern cotton, and let it pass into the hands of a rival, her Eastern trade will begin to decline, and finally pass away from her, and become the possession of a more vigorous and farsighted people.

WHO IS PHILMORE?—Mr. Seward in his speech at Auburn said: 'It remains for me now only to give you the proof that although the way in which the Chicago democracy did what had been agreed upon in their behalf at Niagara was not altogether satisfactory, yet what they actually did was accepted as a full execution of the previous compact.—St. Catherine's, C.W., September 1, 1864.—To Hon. D. Wier, Halifax—Platform and Presidential nominee unsatisfactory. Vice-President and speeches satisfactory. Tell Philmore not to oppose.—Geo. N. Sanders.—D. Wier is a Richmond accomplice at Halifax, and Philmore is understood to be the conductor of the insurgent organ in London.' It is sufficient to state that we have never seen the despatch, and have never heard of Philmore.

Notes on Events of the Week.

AMERICA.

NATURALLY Mr. Lincoln is in real or pretended ecstasies at the fall of Atlanta. Through the long and costly campaign of the summer not a triumph did his generals achieve, and it must be very pleasant to hear at last that a Federal commander has gained 'the object of his campaign.' It is natural too that Mr. Lincoln should, in the face of the coming election, magnify the victory as much as possible, and order the firing of salutes and proclaim a day of thanksgiving. On the other hand, it is not surprising that the Northern people should be less elated. Atlanta held out long enough to enable the Confederates to remove their stores and valuable machinery. Before its surrender the magazines were exploded, and it was evacuated without molestation. The Confederate army remains intact, and Sherman states that it is intrenched thirty miles from Atlanta, and that he does not think it prudent to attack. He says, 'we need rest.' Meantime his line of communication is constantly threatened; and even whilst he was occupying Atlanta, General Wheeler had cut the telegraph lines in his rear. The loss of Atlanta does not affect the military position of the South, nor does it improve the military position of the North. Mr. Lincoln has, we think, greater cause for anxiety than for rejoicing. Nevertheless, the fall of Atlanta will indeed be a serious incident if it should enable the Administration to revive the military ardour of the people, and so be the means of prolonging the war.

The official despatch of General Sherman is very meagre. In a few days we may be in possession of a full and trustworthy narrative. This being so, it is not worth while to criticise Mr. Stanton's edition of General Sherman's despatch. We elsewhere publish a Northern version of the movement.

GENERAL GRANT returned thanks for the success at Atlanta by ordering 'a salute to be fired with shotted guns from every battery bearing upon the enemy.'

SINCE his defeat at Reams' Station we have no news of importance from Grant. He has, however, written a brave letter, in which he declares the Confederates have their last men in the field. According to Federal testimony the Confederates have had their last men in the field ever since the beginning of the war. Grant further declares that to fill their armies 'the rebels have robbed the cradle and the grave.' Of the last-named crime Grant himself at any rate cannot be accused. Mr. Stanton is confident that 100,000 men promptly furnished will enable Grant to finish the rebellion. It is the old dodge. The Federal administration, when sorely pressed for recruits, always pretend that the rebellion is just over, and that the soldiers are merely wanted for a holiday parade. We commend to the attention of our readers an extract we elsewhere print from the Richmond Examiner on the Southern crops and armies.

IT was reported in New York just before the departure of the steamer that Mobile had been surrendered. All things are possible, but this report is too improbable to inspire anxiety.

WE elsewhere publish General A. P. Hill's official report of the fight at Reams' Station. It will be seen that the victory was complete, and that the Confederate loss, instead of being 5,000, as reported by the Federals, was 720, including the missing.

THE Richmond Enquirer of August 31 says that the total number of prisoners in the Libby was 6,576, of whom 280 were officers, and that they were nearly all brought in during the two preceding weeks. On Belle Isle there were 5,541 prisoners. In the hospitals there were 355 prisoners.

THE Northern papers report the death of General Hardee in the fight at Jonesborough. Considerable doubt is thrown on the statement by the despatch of General Hood dated September 3, in which the action at Jonesborough, resulting in the retreat of Hardee's corps, is announced. General Hood makes no mention whatever of the death of General Hardee.

IT is our duty to record the death of the renowned cavalry officer General Morgan, who was killed in an attack made on his command by the Federal General Gilmore.

John H. Morgan of Kentucky was a man unused to war in theory or practice, prior to the breaking out of hostilities. He was a daring rider, of fine physique, and every way fitted to lead men on to deeds of high emprise in irregular warfare; and having early espoused with heart and soul the cause of the Confederates, and gone into the volunteer army of the new republic, he soon found himself by the simple force of his genius at the head of a considerable body of horsemen, which became the terror of the Federal border States. He was thirty-eight years of age at the time of his death. He had been twice married, the last time to Miss Sally Ann Reedy, a young lady of beauty and talent, the daughter of a former member of Congress from Tennessee. In person General Morgan was tall and striking, his eyes were blue, his complexion fair, his hair and beard a light brown, and his horsemanship perfect.

The historian will have much to record of the dashing adventures of Morgan. His raids and escapes, imprisonments and disguises, will give to that portion of the Confederate annals some thing of the attraction and the air of romance. The chivalrous character of the Kentucky partisan, his tender consideration for the wounded prisoner, his forbearance towards the private citizen in the enemy's country, and his courtesy to women and children, make the more noteworthy the rude terms of General Gilmore's despatch in which he states 'I have surprised, defeated, and killed John Morgan,' withholding the title that belonged to the dead hero, and announcing his killing in terms so ambiguous that it leaves the matter at least open to doubt whether the act was done in accordance with the rules of legitimate warfare.

ON Saturday, September 3, President Lincoln signed a proclamation requesting that 'next Sunday' should be observed as a day of thanksgiving for recent victories over 'the insurgent rebels who have been waging a civil war against the Government of the United States.' The same day Mr. Lincoln issued two other proclamations: one to thank Admiral Farragut and Generals Canby and Granger, another to thank General Sherman for the capture of Atlanta. The President ordered salutes of one hundred guns to be fired in honour of these victories.

IT was announced as an item of news in the New York papers of three weeks ago, that Benjamin Howard, the perpetrator of the forgery whereby a bogus proclamation of Mr. Lincoln had been imposed upon the people of the United States, who was imprisoned for some months in Fort Lafayette as a punishment for such lese majesté, had been set at liberty. This Benjamin Howard is an old offender. He it was that, as correspondent of the New York Times, concocted the famous cock-and-bull story of the Prince of Wales having been insulted by a mob in Richmond, Virginia, in October, 1860; an utterly baseless fabrication which Howard was impelled to circulate in his wrath at having been ejected from one of the open carriages prepared for the reception of His Royal Highness's party. The story had a large currency in England at the time, and, though denied officially by the Richmond authorities, was never properly set at rest. Indeed it was referred to more than once in the columns of the Times (we mean, of course, the London and not the New York journal of that name) in disparaging comment upon public manners in the South. The inventive genius of Benjamin Howard has doubtless not slumbered amid the meditations of Fort Lafayette, and we shall probably soon hear of him again in the exercise of his peculiar talent, for which the chicaneries of the Presidential election will afford him facile and tempting opportunity.

MR. LINCOLN has postponed the draft. The reason assigned by the supporters of the Administration is that the quotas are being filled by volunteering. Mr. Seward says that no draft will be necessary. Until after November Mr. Lincoln will avoid any unpopular measure, no matter how much his generals clamour for reinforcements.

MR. R. OULD, the Confederate agent for the exchange of prisoners, has published a circular in which he exposes the bad faith of the enemy. The cartel of exchange was agreed upon on July 22, 1862. The object of it was to secure the return of prisoners of war, and the fourth article provides that all prisoners of war should be discharged on parole ten days after their capture. Until July, 1863, the Confederates held an excess of prisoners, and the cartel was observed. When the Federals held an excess of prisoners, they put aside the terms of the contract, and when they made a delivery demanded an equal number in return. On October 20, Mr. Ould wrote to General Meredith, the Federal agent of exchange, and said: 'More than a month ago I asked your acquiescence in a proposition that all officers and soldiers on both sides should be released in conformity with the provisions of the cartel. In order to obviate the difficulties between us, I suggested that all officers and men on both sides should be released, unless they were subject to charges, in which event the opposite Government should have the right of holding one or more hostages if the retention was not justified. You stated to me, in conversation, that this proposition was very fair, and that you would ask the consent of your Government to it.' On the 29th General Meredith wrote to decline complying with the terms of the cartel, and for an excuse said that if the excess of prisoners was delivered, they would be put into the field before being regularly exchanged. Mr. Ould condescends to declare this imputation groundless, and adds: 'It will be observed that the Confederate authorities only claimed that the provisions of the cartel should be fulfilled. They only asked the enemy to do what, without any hesitation, they had done during the first year of the operation of the cartel.' The Federal authorities would not do what was right, and at length, for the sake of the brave Southerners languishing in Northern prisons, the Confederates determined to abate their fair demands, and on August 10, 1864, Mr. Ould wrote as follows to Major Mulford, the Federal assistant-agent of exchange: 'You have several times proposed to me to exchange the prisoners respectively held by the two belligerents, officer for officer and man for man. The same offer has also been made by other officials having charge of matters connected with the exchange of prisoners. This proposal has heretofore been declined by the Confederate authorities, they insisting upon the terms of the cartel, which required the delivery of the excess on either side upon parole. In view, however, of the very large number of prisoners now held by each party, and the suffering consequent upon their continued confinement, I now consent to the above proposal, and agree to deliver to you the prisoners held in captivity by the Confederate authorities, provided you agree to deliver an equal number of Confederate officers and men. As equal numbers are delivered from time to time, they will be declared exchanged.' Mr. Ould adds: 'I accompanied the delivery of the letter with a statement of the mortality which was hurrying so many Federal prisoners at Andersonville to the grave.' No reply was returned to this or to two subsequent communications until August 31, when Major Mulford wrote, saying that he was not yet authorised to make an answer.

Mr. Lincoln and his Cabinet think it 'smart' to thus flagrantly violate a compact. They are right in assuming that the patriot prisoners of the South are a greater loss to their country than the mercenary Irish and German prisoners are to the United States. Still we think the policy is a mistake as well as an infamy. It is not well to force on a policy of retaliation; nor do we suppose that it will promote Federal recruiting if the Irish and Germans are told that if captured they will not be exchanged, but kept in Southern gaols, where, if they are sick, they must die for the want of those medicines which the Federal Government has declared contraband of war.

FEDERAL officers have queer notions of equity. On August 12 Admiral Dahlgren wrote to General Jones, saying that he was informed that sixteen naval officers were in prison at Charleston, and that they were destitute of many of the necessaries of life, and requesting that he might be permitted to furnish them with the required articles. He then made the following offer:—'I have to inform you that I now hold as prisoners twenty-five citizens of Georgia, captured August 3, at M'Intosh County Court House, Georgia. Their names, as reported by them, will be found in the annexed list. If you feel disposed to exchange any of these persons for any of the naval officers captured in September, 1863, at Fort Sumter, or elsewhere, at any time, within the limits of this command, and will inform me thereof, I will submit the question to the consideration of the Navy Department.' General Jones replied that the prisoners might receive clothing, because a like indulgence was allowed to Confederate officers who were prisoners of war; otherwise he would have refused the request, seeing that the Federal troops have 'stolen or wantonly destroyed all manner of clothing, even the apparel of women and children, and this in many cases by order of the general commanding.' With respect to food, he says the prisoners have the same kind and quantity as the Confederate officers, and he will not allow the blockade to be broken for the benefit of those who maintain it. In reply to the offer of exchange General Jones writes:—

> I know not on what principle you propose to exchange 'citizens,' whom you have caused to be kidnapped and forcibly carried away from their homes and imprisoned, for officers captured in battle, with arms in their hands. You might perhaps, without going as far as the coast of Georgia, have captured men whom you could with propriety have offered in exchange for your officers; but you would have found them armed, and would have been obliged to fight and overcome them before capturing them. You need not trouble the Navy Department with the question, as I do not 'feel disposed' to aid you to profit by your own wrong, by exchanging officers captured in battle for private 'citizens' captured so wantonly, and at so little risk to the captors. But I will exchange the officers you refer to for an equal number of Confederate State officers, prisoners of war, of like grades, rank for rank, or their equivalents, my Government designating its officers to be exchanged. If you think proper to accede to this proposition, you have only to notify me when you are prepared to make the exchange.

ALL parties in the North regard the Chicago Convention as a Peace Convention. Hence its nomination is cordially accepted by the peace party, and the Lincolnites, the shoddy men, bitterly oppose it. In the Western States the Convention is popular because of its peace platform; for it is declared that the verbal ambiguity does not deceive the party, and that the purpose is immediate peace. The Cincinnati Gazette, an Administration organ, says: 'It is essentially a peace Convention . . . It is impossible to overrate the intense hostility to the war. . . . The peace men practically have everything their own way. . . . The only resolutions that were applauded were the peace and armistice resolutions, and the cheers for them were prolonged in proportion as their treason was outspoken and defiant. It may be that when it comes to making a platform prudence may lead to a cautious concealment of these tendencies behind ambiguous phrases; but the temper of the Convention and the real meaning of the Democratic policy have been revealed in these demonstrations, and in a manner as unmistakable as it is alarming.'

THE New York papers publish a card from M. Romero, the Minister of Juarez, in which he thanks the United States press for its sympathy, denies that Juarez has left Mexico, and adds, 'He has no intention of leaving the Republic, and there is not, has not been, nor is there likely to be, any necessity for such a proceeding. Republican institutions are not yet destined to be overthrown either in Mexico or in the United States.'

The Northern press is delighted with a report that the French troops have sustained a reverse in Mexico. This report requires confirmation. We may be sure that the enmity of the North would exaggerate any check sustained by the Imperial forces.

THAT the Federal Administration has no confidence in the 'loyalty' of the West may be seen from the following order issued by General Heintzelman on August 27, two days before the meeting of the Chicago Convention:—

> Headquarters, Northern Department,
> Columbus, Ohio, August 27, 1864.
> General Order No. 53.—During the ensuing sixty days no firearms, powder, or ammunition of any kind will be received, transported, or delivered by any railroad, express, or other forwarding company within the States comprised within the limits of this Department, viz. Ohio, Indiana, Illinois, and Michigan, without a permit from these headquarters: from General A. P. Hovey, Indianapolis, Indiana; General H. E. Paine Springfield, Illinois; or Lieutenant-Colonel B. H. Hill, Detroit, Michigan, unless shipped by or delivered to an authorized officer of the United States Government.

ON September 10, the price of gold in New York was 219. The heavy fall had unsettled the markets and brought about a panic in Wall Street.
